All three networks, and front-page stories in today's major newspapers, reproduced Gates' answer to the question from Democratic Sen. Carl Levin ("Do you believe we are winning the war in Iraq?"). Gates responded, "No, sir." Later, ABC World News (12/5, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, Gates sought to clarify" this statement. Gates was shown saying, "I certainly stand by my statement this morning that we are not winning, but we are not losing. But I want to make clear that that pertains to the situation in Iraq as a whole. Our military forces win the battles that they fight." ABC (Karl) also reported that "all day long, Gates strayed from the White House script, even on the biggest questions of all." Sen. Mark Dayton: "With that benefit of hindsight, would you say that invading Iraq was the right decision or the wrong decision?" Gates: "I think it's too soon to tell." Gates also "identified several mistakes he believes have been made -- disbanding the Iraqi army, underestimating the job of rebuilding the country and not sending enough troops." Gates: "I suspect, in hindsight, some of the folks in the Administration probably would not make the same decisions that they made. And I think one of those is that there clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country." Karl: "Several Senators praised Gates and took shots at his boss." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "Now, in short, should we believe you or the President on the critical issue whether the Administration is really willing to make a change in its policy?" Robert Gates: "If I'm confirmed, I will be independent. I intend to draw my own conclusions. And I'll make my recommendations. But I can assure you that I don't owe anybody anything."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M), meanwhile, summed up Gates' testimony reporting, "The United States is not winning the war in Iraq and there are no good ideas about how to reverse that. Those were some of the answers to the questions that senators fired at the new man for the Pentagon today."

Democratic senators praised Gates yesterday. On CNN's Your World Today (12/5, Frazier), Florida Sen. Ben Nelson predicted Gates will be confirmed unanimously. Nelson said, "Clearly, there is a big change in candor and forthrightness from what we've seen in the secretary of defense and the former Deputy Secretary of Defense

Wolfowitz, where there's been all of this sleight of hand, and head fake and not being straightforward."

On MSNBC (12/5, O'Donnell), Rhode Island Sen. Jack Reed (D) said Gates will "be someone who's going to listen to his military commanders. He's going to listen to advice from across the aisle. And I think he's someone that will take that advice and not simply respond ideologically with fixed positions. He's someone that will learn and will change. And I think that's a very positive development." Reed added, "I've had experience with Bob Gates over several years in a nonpolitical setting. He's someone, I think, whose judgment is good, who brings to this task experience. He's someone, I think, today who demonstrated candor, directness, thoughtfulness. Those are qualities that are needed. And I think those are qualities that'll be very helpful to the administration."

On Fox News (12/5, Hill), Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) said, 'Mr. Gates was asked a question if he thought we were winning in Iraq. He gave a one-word answer. He said, No. I thought that was a moment of refreshing candor. You don't see that very often in Washington. Too bad."

And on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/5, McIntyre), GOP Sen. John Warner was shown saying at a press conference, "America got a good look at this extraordinary nominee. America can take the confidence that he's going to be a very strong adviser to the president of the United States."

The New York Times (12/6, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Gates also "displayed a knack for flattering the committee. 'Secretaries come and go, but the Senate Armed Services Committee remains,' he said. 'If confirmed, I will seek your counsel and take it seriously.'" Gates also told the committee, "We all work for the same boss. … That boss is the people of the United States."

Gates Downplays ISG Report. NBC Nightly News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Gates "downplayed tomorrow's release of recommended options from the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group." Gates: "It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq."

USA Today (12/6, 10A, Kelley, 2.27M) notes Gates "was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group until Nov. 8, when Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination. That panel's recommendations, due to be released today, will be helpful but aren't the only ones to consider, Gates said." On Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Hume), Weekly Standard editor Fred Barnes said, "I think, the truth is, though, what I'm told anyway, he told President Bush when Bush interviewed him a couple days before the election, he said, one, I agree that going into Iraq was the right thing, two, I think victory is what we should go after, not retreat, and I'm determined to pursue that."

Iran Comments Seen As "Shot Across The Bows" Of Neocons. The Financial Times (12/6, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports "Gates was also outspoken on Iran, saying he would only advise an attack on the country as an 'absolute last resort.' … His reservations on military action against Iran were a shot across the bows of weakened but still influential neo-conservatives in Washington who have called for strikes against the Islamic republic's nuclear facilities. Glen Howard of the Jamestown Foundation, a security think-tank, said: 'The neo-cons are regrouping around the Iran threat.'"

Gates Assets Include Defense Contractor's Stock. The AP (12/5, Theimer) reports, "Gates' assets include up to $250,000 in stock in a defense contractor on whose board he serves, a financial disclosure report made public Tuesday shows. If confirmed as defense secretary, Gates will divest his holdings in the company, NACCO Industries, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. He will step away from any Defense Department matters involving NACCO for at least a year." In general, "Gates plans to sell all the stock he owns in individual companies and sever all ties with them if the Senate confirms him as Pentagon chief, Perino said." Like Secretary Rumsfeld, "Gates is a millionaire." The AP lists other sources of income on his financial statement. About 40 sites carried this story.

President's Neocon Advisors "Down To One." Meanwhile, in a piece for Scripps Howard (12/5), analyst Martin Schram writes, "They were all this President's men - Cheney and Rummy and Wolfie and Bolton - neoconservatives, hard-line conservatives, iron-fisted conservatives, unyielding conservatives. ... Now there is only one. Don Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz and now John Bolton have been bulldozed and/or forklifted out of power. ... it seems that Dick Cheney may be on his way to becoming just another one of those veeps who are seldom seen and hardly heard. After all, Cheney's last assigned mission was to be unceremoniously summoned to Saudi Arabia, where not a single public event was held." As for Rumsfeld, after the GOP's election defeat, he "was told his resignation was accepted, so would he please write it?" Rumsfeld's leaked memo "seems intended mainly for our eyes only," Schram says sarcastically. He recounts Cheney and Rumsfeld's intertwined careers and concludes, "The dynamic duo has run its last course."

Baker Briefs Bush On Iraq Study Group Report. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 9, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A very close friend of the Bush family had a power lunch with the current President today. James Baker briefed him on the Baker-Hamilton commission's recommendations on Iraq a day before that report comes out. It's a familiar role for Baker," who "when the Bushes need help…always answers the call." CBS (Plante) added "this President may not be in much of a hurry to accept the Baker commission's ideas. Asked if Baker would be drafted to help implement the recommendation, the President's spokesman said, 'Jim Baker can go back to his day job.'"

The AP (12/6, Loven) reports the report "will be released this morning. The full commission, led by Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, "will give a copy of the report to Bush at 7 a.m. EST." The AP adds, "Following the presentation to the president, the group is to brief Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his team via secure videoconference from the White House." Bush, "to be joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolton, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and other senior White House aides, was to thank the commission but not comment on the specifics of its recommendations, the official said." White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday, "We're going to give it a careful review. … As we have mentioned, there are other ongoing studies within the administration."

USA Today (12/6, 10A, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "After their White House visit, group members will head to Capitol Hill to brief House and Senate leaders. They plan to hold a news conference at 11 a.m., when they will release the report to the public. The rest of the day features a string of television, radio and newspaper interviews of study group members, including its co-chairmen: former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., now director of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington." The interviews "are being coordinated by the Edelman public relations firm, which will continue to assist the institute through appearances on this Sunday's news talk shows." The US Institute of Peace, "which is devoted to global conflict resolution, received a $1 million appropriation from Congress to assist the Iraq Study Group."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/5, Henry) reported, "The White House is bracing for this report." CNN (Henry) said that yesterday's breakfast meeting between and Baker was initiated by Baker to give "a heads up to the president." CNN added, "Snow today was asked if this lunch was the cushion before the blow by James Baker. He insisted this does not have to be adversarial. He said this is a commission not an 'insurgency trying to attack the White House.'"

A number of reports this morning also depict a President on the defensive over the ISG report. The Financial Times (12/6, Sevastopulo), for example, says the report "will increase the pressure on…Bush to adjust US military policy in Iraq," and the Chicago Tribune (12/6, Silva, 617K) reports, "With his unwavering insistence that US military forces must stand, fight and 'win' in Iraq, President Bush has taken on the look of the last man standing. Both inside and outside the White House, voices are calling for at least a new war strategy -- and at most a target date for withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Bush, while acknowledging frustration with the progress of the US mission, so far has refused to fundamentally alter it." The White House "has downplayed the report, saying the president will have no 'snap reaction' to the congressionally mandated review." Yet on ABC World News (12/5, story 2, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said Republicans and Democrats in Congress are also "not going to treat" the ISG report "as a complete answer. They're not going to embrace it whole. They're going to treat it as a Chinese menu. Picking out what they like. Ignoring what they don't like." The President "has two more reports coming out. He's asked his National Security Adviser to do a review. He asked the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to do a review. But the White House is having the President to come before the country, with his recommendation for a new strategy by Christmas."

Roll Call (12/6, Billings) reports "Congressional Democrats will use today's report by the Iraq Study Group as another opportunity to seek validation for a change of course in the region, but they privately acknowledge that they will be careful not to go too far in embracing the study." Democrats "say they want to make sure that the report…doesn't provide cover for the Bush administration over its policies. As part of that approach, both House and Senate Democratic leaders will be driving home the message that the research serves as a strong rebuke of a conflict they believe has devolved into a civil war." Roll Call adds, "A senior Senate Democratic aide said there will be a 'significant attempt' by Democrats to 'embrace as much [of the report] as possible, while calling it a clear repudiation of the Bush administration's failed stay-the-course strategy.'"

Panel, White House Warning There Are No "Dramatic Fixes" In Store. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A4, King, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports "the panel and the Bush administration are broadcasting a similar message: There are no dramatic fixes to end the war or to get US troops home in a hurry." The "long-awaited report, people familiar with the matter say, will describe the situation in Iraq as deteriorating, but will acknowledge that its own recommendations are flawed and far from a magic solution." The panel "plans to put the main focus on the need to launch an immediate effort to gain international support for rescuing Iraq, including from nettlesome neighbors Syria and Iran. At the same time, the group will argue that the US should redouble its effort to train the Iraqi army while diminishing its own military presence there largely to an advising and support role, with an eye toward pulling out all combat units by the first three months of 2008. Tens of thousands of US troops will likely remain."

The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Baker, Linzer, 690K) reports, "The bipartisan Iraq Study Group plans to recommend to President Bush that he threaten to reduce economic and military support for Iraq's government if it fails to meet specific benchmarks intended to improve security in the country, a source familiar with the report said yesterday. … The latest details to emerge from the commission's report help flesh out a plan that also calls for the United States to withdraw nearly all combat units by early 2008 while leaving behind tens of thousands of troops to advise, train and embed with Iraqi forces." The Post also reports, "Much debate in e-mail exchanges among the most outspoken advisers to the study group focused on whether adding troops would help. But most feared that bringing in the large numbers required would break the military, lead to a surge in US deaths and do nothing to better protect civilians. In the end, the experts did not agree on sending additional forces beyond military advisers for the Iraqi national army. They seemed certain that Bush would reject most of their recommendations and that few could work anyway."

USA Today (12/6, 1A, Kelley, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Among the issues to be raised by the commission and others: Withdrawing US troops. The commission is expected to propose withdrawing about 70,000 combat troops by 2008. … Engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran."

ISG Praised For Bipartisanship. David Broder writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "Whatever the final impact of the Iraq Study Group report being issued today, for the 10 commission members this was an exhilarating experience, a demonstration of genuine bipartisanship that they hope will serve as an example to the broader political world." … The nine men and one woman serving on the commission -- five from each party -- represented a wide range of political backgrounds and philosophical views. Several had been on opposing sides in past presidential campaigns." But "as commission member Vernon Jordan, the Democratic lawyer, noted, they were also 'professionals' -- veterans of public service. Jordan has served on presidential commissions of one sort or another since 1965, and said, 'This process has been a lesson in civility.'" The New York Times (12/6, Shenon, 1.16M), meanwhile, profiles Lee H. Hamilton," in a story that calls him "a compromiser who operates above the partisan fray." Hamilton's "disdain for partisan battle, often to the annoyance of fellow Democrats, and his willingness to work toward compromise on national security policy, are likely to be on display again on Wednesday with the release of the findings of the Iraq Study Group."

Baker's Abilities Praised. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 9, 2:55, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "In more than 30 years, he's been both a behind-the-scenes political operator and a very public statesman, much of it in the service of his close friend, the first President Bush." Ken Duberstein, former Regan White House Chief Of Staff: "Jim Baker is always an honest broker. If he can help the family, and help other families, I think he really strikes a two-fer." Plante: "This isn't the first time Baker has helped George the son. Remember six years ago in Florida." Baker: "The Gore campaign refused to accept the vote count on election day." Plante: "It was Baker who was called upon to lead the legal team that opened the White House doors once again for the bushes. Jim Baker's been White House Chief of Staff for two Presidents, Treasury Secretary, and Secretary of State. He helped put together the coalition which joined the US and the Gulf War. And knew enough then to anticipate the dangers of marching into Baghdad and overthrowing Saddam Hussein." Michael Deaver, former Deputy Chief of Staff: "Jim Baker of one of these rare people that comes along once in a while who is smart, smart not only intellectually and from experience, but street smart." Plante: "Street smart for sure. Back in 1990, he convinced Syria to join the Gulf War coalition against Saddam. Now, he wants this George Bush to talk to Syria and Iran, too." Baker: "It's got to be hard nosed. It's got to be determined. You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Kerry Sees Study Group Moving In Direction He Outlined. On MSNBC's Hardball (12/5, Barnicle), Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) said that the Iraq Study Group "is moving in the direction that I and others have been arguing we should be moving in." Kerry added that "if what we've read in the papers is correct, they are going to suggest an alternative course that includes talking to Syria and Iran, a regional kind of conference or a regional engagement with the countries there to get them more involved, and some kind of down-the-road target of some kind that we are going to be withdrawing at some point, we have to begin at some point. And I think it's going to change the debate."

Poll Finds Views On Iraq War At New Low. On its website, the Wall Street Journal (12/5, 2.04M) reports "a majority of Americans say the situation for US troops in Iraq has grown worse and confidence in US policies in Iraq is at a new low, a Harris poll shows. Fifty-eight percent of US adults say the situation for troops in Iraq is getting worse, according to the online survey from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20, 2006, compared with 45% in September and 36% in January. Nine percent said the situation for troops in Iraq is getting better, while 27% said there was 'no real change.' … In addition, more Americans have a negative view of President Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months: 71% said he is doing only fair or poor, compared with 26% who think he is doing a pretty good or excellent job. In September, 64% had a negative view of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 32% rated him positively." Harris Interactive "conducted this online survey in the U.S., Nov. 13-20, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,429 adults."

Democrats May Attach "Conditions" To Iraq Spending. McClatchy (12/6, Talev) reports, "On the eve of the Iraq Study Group's long-awaited recommendations for how to exit Iraq, congressional Democrats were eyeing a different document as leverage for change: President Bush's anticipated request for more money to keep fighting." House Democratic leaders "are considering attaching a series of conditions to the estimated $160 billion supplemental war funding request for Iraq and Afghanistan that President Bush is expected to send them early next year. They wouldn't specify what their conditions would be, including whether they might attach a troop-withdrawal timeline, as many Democratic lawmakers want to do." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, "said the supplemental funding request 'is going to be the turning point' for the direction of the war. 'Those dollars are going to be treated differently,' he said."

The Washington Times (12/6, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports, "Top Democrats in Congress are ignoring calls from within their caucus to eliminate funding for troops in Iraq, a strategy some say is necessary to end US involvement in the war. 'There is only one way in which the United States will withdraw from Iraq prior to the end of President Bush's term,' said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat. 'Congress must vote to cut off funds.'" Democratic leaders "flatly rejected the idea yesterday, insisting they will move to 'change the course' of the war but will continue to appropriate money to support the troops fighting in Iraq."

Reports Highlight "Hidden Costs" Of War. The Miami Herald (12/6, Hall, Montgomery, 286K) reports, "Belt-tightening at the bases is only the beginning. As the United States spends about $8 billion a month in Iraq, the military is being forced to cut costs in ways big and small." The Herald cites multiple examples, including cutback on restroom janitorial services at Fort Hood, TX, and early closings at swimming pools in Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri. The Herald continues, "Soldiers preparing to ship to Iraq don't have enough equipment to train on because it's been left in Iraq, where it's most needed. Thousands of tanks and other vehicles sit at repair depots waiting to be fixed because funds are short." The Herald cites other "hidden" costs, including 73,000 diagnoses of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder, shortage of parts for equipment repair, and suicide attempts by soldiers "haunted by the horrors of combat." The Herald continues, "In January, Nobel Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz released a study that said the true costs of the Iraq war could exceed $1 trillion and perhaps reach $2 trillion. … The Stiglitz report focused on hard-to-measure things such as lifetime care for injured soldiers and the economic effect of higher oil prices as a result of the war. But his final numbers for unofficial costs are on pace to be matched by the official costs -- which don't add the intangibles."

Maliki Seeks To Hold Regional Talks. The New York Times (12/6, A1, Wong, Cooper, 1.16M) reports in a front page article Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Tuesday that he would "send envoys to neighboring countries to plan a conference on Iraq, adding momentum to calls for a regional approach" to quelling violence. The Times notes that "such a proposal is already gaining attention" in the Washington, where the Iraq Study Group is "expected to recommend Wednesday that the American government should approach Iran and Syria to seek their aid in ending the war." Although the White House has publicly "resisted the idea of widening its own diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria," the Times reports that "senior Bush administration officials now say they are working out ways to talk to those countries without the White House appearing to have conceded on its principle of giving them the diplomatic cold shoulder." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Washington "approved" of the proposed conference, calling it "absolutely consistent with what the Iraqis have said -- that they have the reins on their own diplomacy and how they will relate to their neighbors, and how their neighbors will relate to them."

The Washington Post (12/6, A21, Trejos, 690K) notes that Maliki "rejected a proposal from U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan that [the conference] take place outside Iraq." In a statement e-mailed to reporters, Maliki "rebuked" Annan for suggesting that Iraq was not the right venue, saying, "We consider his invitation to hold an international conference about Iraq as just another way to confiscate the will of Iraqis and their achievements that established democracy, a national unity government and the elected Parliament." The Financial Times (12/6, Khalaf) says Maliki has "been trying to take ownership of regional policy ahead of the Iraq Study Group report, fearing that changes in US policy will undermine the elected government."

Meanwhile, the AP (12/6, Abdul-Zahra) reports that Maliki "reversed course" by calling for an international conference, "despite opposition to the plan by some key political allies," including Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and leading Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the Bush administration welcomed the announcement, saying it was "a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Zavis, Moore, 850K) runs a similar report.

Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Rosen) reported Maliki "called for two separate conferences, both to be held in Iraq, and both aimed at stabilizing the country. First, Maliki said Sunnis, Kurds and Shia would hold a long-delayed reconciliation summit later this month" and pledged a regional conference." Fox News (Rosen) also aired video of Iraqi Shiite politician Abdul Aziz al-Hakim saying Monday, "We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue. We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems." Fox News added, "That posture matches the thinking of President Bush and Secretary of State Rice, who not only doubt the usefulness of the US sitting down with Damascus and Tehran, but want to encourage the Iraqis to develop their own solutions in the realms of security and diplomacy, as when the Iraqis last month restored diplomatic ties, after 24 years, with Syria."

US Urged To Address "Refugee Crisis" With Syria. Kenneth H. Bacon, resident of Refugees International, writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "Syria is the last country in the Middle East to leave its borders open to Iraqi refugees. The United Nations estimates that 1.8 million Iraqis have sought refuge in the region, and Syria and Jordan host the largest concentration. It can't maintain its open-door policy without international support. Refugees already strain social services. Yet, the international response to the Iraqi refugee crisis has been dismal." There has been "scant media attention and even less political concern," and the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees is doing little." Bacon adds, "Working through the United Nations or directly, the United States has an opportunity to engage with Damascus to mitigate the suffering of Iraqi refugees and the growing burden on Syria."

Iranian Official Says Iran Will Only Help If US Announces Pullout Schedule. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K) that "a top Iranian official set a tough condition for his country's help in stabilizing Iraq, saying that Tehran isn't interested in such cooperation unless the Bush administration sets a timetable for withdrawing its troops. Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, said in an interview that a US plan for removing 'occupation forces' from Iraq would be considered 'a sign of a change in strategy.' In that case, he said, 'Iran would definitely extend the hand of assistance and would use its influence to help solve the problem.'" Larijani "made his comments after a speech yesterday to a conference…called the Arab Strategy Forum. His remarks were the clearest statement I've heard of how Iran views its role in the region following what he described as the failure of US intervention in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. His tone was triumphalist: In his view, America is bogged down in Iraq and 'in dire need of change,' while a newly confident Iran is positioning itself as a dominant power for the region."

Caldwell Says Iraqis Will Command Own Forces By Spring. AFP (12/6) reports, "Iraq's government will have command of its own armed forces by the middle of next year, a US general has said, revealing details of a deal between the US president and the Iraqi prime minister." Spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell's "announcement came on the eve of a much-anticipated report" from the Baker commission. AFP adds, "Currently only two of Iraq's 18 provinces are under direct Iraqi security control and only two of the country's 10 army divisions answer directly to Maliki rather than to US General George Casey's headquarters." Moves such as increasing the number of Americans serving on transition teams "are among ideas expected to be recommended by former US secretary of state James Baker's Iraq Study Group on Wednesday, but Caldwell said the revised plan had come from the military itself."

On the CBS Evening News (12/5, story 2, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M), Gen. Caldwell was shown saying, "As the Iraqi forces become more capable out there, there is no reason why we would see a necessity for as many US military forces as we have here today. The Prime Minister is very adamant that he's ready to resume control of his country, and if he is, then, we're going to let them step up and be more responsible and provide them back support to help make sure they just don't fail." CBS (Martin) added, "There are a lot of people in the Pentagon who will tell you, look, we had 140,000 troops when there were zero Iraqi troops. Now there are 325,000 Iraqi troops, and we still have 140,000 there. It's time to start pulling our troops out of combat, assigning more trainers and advisers to the Iraqi units to make up the difference."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Richter, 850K) reports Bush "has warned that a precipitate withdrawal would create a terrorism superstate in the Middle East that is rich with oil cash and determined to topple moderate governments around it. But to many US lawmakers, regional experts and Middle East leaders, the chief risk is not a more menacing version of Taliban-dominated Afghanistan, but a Lebanese-style civil war that could result in the deaths of thousands more Iraqis and expand the conflict by drawing in neighboring states."

Gen. Caldwell writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "I don't see a civil war in Iraq. I don't see a constituency for civil war. The vast majority of the people want hope for their families, not to massacre their neighbors or divide their country. A poll conducted in June by the International Republican Institute, a nonpartisan group that promotes democracy, found 89 percent of Iraqis supporting a unity government representing all sects and ethnic communities. No wonder no 'rebel army' steps forward to claim credit for vicious car bombs and cowardly executions of civilians. I see debates among Iraqis -- often angry and sometimes divisive -- but arguments characteristic of political discourse, not political breakdown. … Regardless of what academics and pundits decide to label this conflict, hundreds of thousands of brave Iraqi soldiers, police officers and civil servants will continue to go to work building a free, prosperous and united Iraq. And every day more than 137,000 U.S. servicemen and servicewomen will lace up their boots, strap on their body armor and drive ahead with our mission to support these courageous Iraqis."

US Said To Be Applying Lessons From Vietnam. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/6, 690K), Vietnam War historian Mark Moyar writes, "In moving to swiftly transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqi government, the Bush administration appears to be heeding lessons learned during ... the Vietnam War. In Vietnam, the United States found that indigenous troops were inherently better suited to local security tasks than Americans. ... Recent comments from the Bush administration indicate that America will spend less time telling the Iraqis how to solve their political problems." Detractors "point to the ultimate defeat of South Vietnam. But in fact the South Vietnamese ... ultimately lost because the United States withdrew support while the North Vietnamese enjoyed enough superpower support to mount an even larger offensive in 1975." Iraqi forces "are not going to experience anything resembling the 1975 offensive; they need only end the low-intensity fighting among Iraqis. But this task will require great political skill on the part of Iraq's prime minister. We will find out very soon whether he possesses it."

Fallujah's City Council Persevering Under Tough Conditions. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Peterson, 59K) reports, in a pessimistic article on the challenges of serving on the Fallujah city council, "No other city council operates in the insurgent-riddled Anbar Province. But the embattled [mayor] Bedawi -- whose family, like those of other members, is under threat of kidnapping or worse -- continues to forge ahead in one of the most stressful jobs the city has to offer. ... Two years after US marines invaded Fallujah to force out insurgents who had made the city off limits to US forces, militants are filtering back into the city, despite only six entry points, which are heavily guarded. Since August, they have waged a campaign of intimidation that has left two key councilmen and the deputy chief of police murdered, and a trail of threats against those who persist." One November council meeting "begins with three men who complain about shootings by US Marines - one of them fatal - of their sons and a nephew. They demand prosecution of the 'snipers' involved, and their removal." Col. Lawrence Nicholson promises to investigate. The Marine presence in town has shrunk to "fewer than 300," but the mayor says, "We don't want the Americans to leave until the Iraqi Army and Iraqi Police are rebuilt and well armed, and they kill a lot of people from Al Qaeda, and dismantle militias, and kill extremists."

Marines Expected To Be Charged In Haditha Incident. The New York Times (12/6, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "At least five marines are expected to be charged, possibly as early as Wednesday, with the killing of 24 Iraqis, many of them unarmed women and children, in the village of Haditha in November 2005, according to a Marine official and a lawyer involved in the case." Charges will likely "range from negligent homicide to murder, said a senior Pentagon official." The timing of official disclosure of the charges is "unclear," but officials and defense lawyers "said charges could closely follow a closed-door briefing by Lt. Gen. Richard F. Natonski, the Marine Corps deputy commandant for plans, policies and operations, to the House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday morning." While a "senior Pentagon official" expected five indictments, a Marine officer "said that he expected charges to be brought against one or two additional marines, including one officer," namely, First Lt. William T. Kallop.

The AP (12/5, Watkins) reports, "Lt. Gen. James Mattis has examined the investigations into the killings and has made initial decisions about what action to take, Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Tuesday in a news release. ... A parallel investigation examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up details of the killings. Results of the probes have not been made public."

Baghdad's Ambulance Workers Struggle With Violence. The New York Times (12/6, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "Ambulance workers have among the clearest views of Baghdad's descent into chaos. As the city has disintegrated around them, they have been left to pick up the pieces. They are often overwhelmed, and have increasingly become targets themselves." One of them likens "these three years" to "16 years as a paramedic." Baghdad has "only about 90 ambulances and crews" on "any given day"; in addition, "The capital's maddening traffic, and the fact that most residents ignore sirens, compound the challenges. Ambulance crews are also treated with suspicion by American troops because militants have been known to use ambulances to transport weapons or bombs. ... Emergency workers earn salaries that are often barely enough to live on, as little as $80 a month for new paramedics. ... As they rush to bombings now, a secondary blast is often aimed at them. Eleven emergency workers were killed in 2006. Previously, six others had been killed since early 2004, when the department started keeping track. More than 10 percent of Baghdad's ambulance drivers have resigned in the last three months alone as violence has escalated."

Baghdad Firefighters Endangered By Terrorist Tactics. The Washington Times (12/6, Palmer, 88K) reports, "The terrorists who daily spread mayhem in the capital [Baghdad] increasingly have adopted the tactic of following a suicide bombing with one or two secondary blasts, timed to detonate a few minutes later when a crowd has formed. And that is bad news for the city's 3,500 firefighters, whose job demands that they rush to the scene of every explosion to douse the flames and assist the injured. ... This year alone, at least 30 Baghdad firemen have died in the line of duty and another 55 have been wounded, according to the Interior Ministry, which oversees Iraq's fire departments. Others have been kidnapped by criminal groups or militiamen; still others find themselves in the crossfire of insurgent groups, U.S. and Iraqi security forces, and warring militias."

Use of Body Counts Criticized As Political Device. In a commentary for USA Today (12/6, 21A, 2.27M), surgery professor and former Iraq health sector consultant John Bowersox writes disparagingly of The Lancet's allegation of "more than 600,000 'excess' civilian deaths" since the "US-led invasion of Iraq": "Never mind that editors failed to disclose that The Lancet had taken an anti-war stand on Iraq even before 2003, or that the study used dubious methods to come up with a number many times higher than any reported before. ... Ever since the Vietnam War, civilian and enemy body counts have ranged from educated guesses to pure fiction -- tragic statistics twisted to serve the agendas of whoever is spinning the numbers."

Analysts Think Bin Laden Alive But "Hamstrung." The Washington Times (12/6, Gertz, 88K) reports, "U.S. intelligence agencies think al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri are alive and still plotting attacks ... Both remain powerful symbols for Islamist extremists around the world and the target of scores to hundreds of covert special-operations commandos, regular troops and CIA paramilitary officers." Secretary-designate Gates "said yesterday he plans to review the tactics being used by forces taking part in the five-year hunt for bin Laden, although he noted that bin Laden has become more a symbol to terrorists and less an active planner and organizer of attacks." He predicted, "Just as in the case of Saddam Hussein, one of his own people will turn him in." Counterterrorism expert Dennis Pluchinsky "said bin Laden's low profile is likely the result of poor health or because he is hiding in an ultra-secret location that is too risky to conduct videotaping."

Afghans Mull Reconstruction Of Bamiyan Buddhas. The New York Times (12/6, Gall, 1.16M) reports on the "colossal Buddhas" blown up by the Taliban in 2001: "Five years after the Taliban were ousted from power, Bamiyan's Buddhist relics are once again the focus of debate: Is it possible to restore the great Buddhas? And, if so, can the extraordinary investment that would be required be justified in a country crippled by poverty and a continued Taliban insurgency in the south and that is, after all, overwhelmingly Muslim? ... There have been calls to rebuild the Buddhas, mostly from Afghans who feel that restored statues would provide a greater tourist attraction, and a righting of wrongs." Although Afghanistan is "impoverished," the provincial governor "favors rebuilding the Buddhas using anastylosis, and said she would propose that the central government make a formal request to Unesco."

Senate Not Expected To Act On Minnesota US Attorney Nominee. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/6, Furst) reports, "Nine months after Rachel Paulose was named acting U.S. attorney for Minnesota, and four months after she was formally nominated for the job by President Bush, her appointment is slipping further into doubt." The Tribune continues, "The U.S. Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on the nomination. That would mean that Bush, if he wishes, must resubmit her name to the next Senate, with a new Democratic majority. … 'I am disappointed the Senate will adjourn this year without taking up Rachel Paulose's nomination,' Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a statement Monday to the Star Tribune. 'Ms. Paulose has shown herself to be an extremely competent and capable professional.' He said he expects her to be renominated, 'and I hope we will have the opportunity to confirm her nomination in a timely manner.'" The Tribune adds, "If approved to permanently succeed Tom Heffelfinger, Paulose, 33, would become the state's first female U.S. attorney and the youngest current U.S. attorney. … Her nomination stalled when the GOP-led Senate Judiciary Committee failed to take it up. In an apparent oversight, Paulose and her supporters did not solicit the support of both home-state senators. Without that, the committee typically does not act on a nominee. … Coleman supported her nomination, but Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., took no position, saying it's his practice to meet with any nominee before the choice moves to the Judiciary Committee. However, Dayton said, Paulose never sought a meeting."

DC Federal Court Is Jeffress Family Affair. The Washington Post (12/6, B01, Leonnig) reports, "Each day, chances are good that Bill, Amy and Jon Jeffress will be applying their legal talents just a few doors down the hall from each other in the same stately office building near the U.S. Capitol. … But the father, daughter and son are not racking up billable hours at a white-shoe family firm. … They are reporting for work at the E. Barrett Prettyman Courthouse, Washington's federal court." The Post continues, "On the sixth floor, father William H. Jeffress Jr., 61, one of Washington's most prominent defense attorneys, has been busy with pretrial hearings in a case that has rocked the White House. He represents I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, who is accused of lying to investigators probing the leak of a CIA operative's name. … On the second floor, daughter Amy, 41, has been checking on narcotics cases she oversees for the U.S. Attorney's Office -- including a trial involving a ring that is accused of peddling cocaine and heroin. … And in a magistrate courtroom down the hall, Jonathan, 35, has been representing poor people as a public defender." The Post adds, "In many ways, the U.S. District Court is a kind of family home. … Their personal stories are intertwined with the court's history. Each learned the power of the law here and can trace career trajectories to work they did in the building. Some of their most profound moments of victory and disappointment unfolded in the oak-paneled courtrooms. … All three are former law clerks who returned to practice here. Bill Jeffress, a partner in the firm of Baker Botts, clerked for Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, who presided over many landmark cases, from Watergate to Iran-contra. In 1971, Jeffress was working in Gesell's chambers when the judge famously ruled that The Washington Post could print the Pentagon Papers, a historical assessment of the Vietnam War that embarrassed the U.S. government. … When Amy was growing up, Gesell was her dad's mentor and 'like my second grandfather,' she recalled. Two decades later, when she graduated from Yale Law School -- just like her father -- Amy, too, went to clerk for Gesell." The Post notes, "Although their job choices are different, there definitely is a certain Jeffress way about them. … The three share the same Democratic Party leanings. Bill and his wife have long been active in the party. Amy worked in the Justice Department during the Clinton administration with her future husband. And Jon was an advance worker for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign."

Prospects For DC DA's Office Seen As Bleak. In a column for The Hill (12/6), Arthur Delaney writes, "In two of this year's most pungent national crime stories — the Duke University rape scandal and the JonBenet Ramsey confession scandal — the next biggest stars, after the DNA, are the DAs. This question often comes up: Will the people vote the district attorney out of office as a result of his or her antics in the case? … To somebody who grew up in Washington, D.C., this perfectly normal question is perfectly foreign. We don't get to elect a district attorney. We don't even have a district attorney's office, another of the many quaint differences between the U.S. and its capital city, where only second-class citizens live." Delaney continues, "In July, D.C.'s nonvoting congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), introduced legislation that would create a D.C. district attorney's office. … Norton's District of Columbia District Attorney Establishment Act of 2006 is going nowhere in the Government Reform Committee. … So the local U.S. attorney's office, the largest such office in the country, will continue to be responsible for prosecuting both federal crimes and local crimes committed by adults in the District." Delaney adds, "But wait! There's a third horse in this race: The D.C. attorney general's office. Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty and his nominee for attorney general, Linda Singer, have expressed interest in the attorney general's office taking some of our federal prosecutors' local criminal caseload. … All they've got so far, though, is an embarrassing bitch-slap from a federal judge: 'How could there even be a thought that they could take that on? The D.C. attorney general's office is not adequately or properly handling the cases it has now,' said U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth, according to a Nov. 18 Washington Post story. Lamberth was miffed over the office's apparent mishandling of a case against the D.C. police." Delaney concludes, "Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, in his capacity as D.C.'s unelected district attorney, has the totally unique ability to try local thugs either in federal or local court. For our hometown criminals, this is a matter of life or death — even though you won't find the 'ultimate penalty' in the D.C. Code and voters rejected a congressionally imposed referendum on execution in 1992, federal prosecutors still can seek it against D.C. criminals if their offenses meet the right criteria. … A federal judge recently ruled that the murder and racketeering charges against Larry Gooch qualify him for a capital trial, set to begin in January. It's a fat chance that a D.C. jury will send any man to die, but if it happens — well, score one for the Feds, I suppose."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Charges French Alcatel Executive With Bribing Costa Rican Officials. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Anderson) reports, "A former top executive for the Latin American business of the French telecommunications giant Alcatel-Lucent faces U.S. corruption charges for allegedly funneling millions of dollars in bribes to Costa Rican officials to win lucrative contracts. Christian Sapsizian, a 60-year-old French citizen…was free Tuesday on $525,000 bail after making his initial appearance Monday in federal court." The AP notes, "According to an FBI affidavit, Sapsizian agreed in 2000 to make payments to an unnamed senior official with Costa Rica's state-owned telecommunications authority, the Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad, or ICE. In return, the official would 'vote in favor of awarding Alcatel a contract' and provide other valuable assistance, according to the FBI. … Sapsizian's attorney, Roy Kahn, said Sapsizian will plead not guilty to the charges and added that companies frequently hire such consulting firms for business ventures in Latin America."

2nd Circuit Rejects Class Action Against Banks In IPO Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Koppel) reports, "In a victory for Wall Street securities firms, a federal appeals court said a lawsuit alleging fraud in the pricing of initial public offerings couldn't move forward in its current form as a class action." The Journal continues, "The case alleges that more than 50 Wall Street firms committed fraud by artificially inflating stock prices in IPOs that the firms underwrote in the late 1990s and 2000. … In a ruling, the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said that the trial judge shouldn't have allowed the plaintiffs to pursue the case as a class action, in part because their individual claims are not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. The decision could mean that the thousands of plaintiffs in the litigation will have to take on the banks individually, which is a much more difficult challenge for plaintiffs. 'It's a great win,' says Vince DiBlasi of Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the lead lawyers for the banks. … 'There is no question the court made it hard for us,' says Melvyn Weiss, chairman of the executive committee in the litigation, who plans to appeal the ruling. But 'this is not necessarily a happy day for the [Wall Street] banks, either,' says Mr. Weiss, of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. The Wall Street firms may now be "swamped" with individual suits by some of the class members, who number in the thousands, 'if not millions,' he said."

The New York Times (12/6, Creswell) reports, "The decision was seen on Wall Street as a huge victory. The investment banks faced making payments of billions of dollars to settle the accusations — if they chose not to risk a trial — involving potentially millions of investors, lawyers involved in the case said." The Times adds, "The ruling also raises the prospects that earlier settlements in the case, in particular a $425 million agreement with J. P. Morgan Chase and a $1 billion guaranteed proposed deal with the issuers of the new shares that was still pending approval by the judge in the case, could be nullified. … Nearly all firms on Wall Street were touched by the lawsuit. Described by many as the largest consolidated securities class-action case ever, the I.P.O. lawsuit involved more than 300 individual investors, 309 issuers and 55 underwriters, including Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Credit Suisse First Boston." The Times notes, "Yesterday, a three-judge panel of the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan said the federal judge overseeing the lawsuit had erred in granting class-action status to six 'focus cases' out of 310 consolidated class actions that claimed fraud on the part of many of the nation's largest securities underwriters. … That means investors will probably have to pursue their claims individually, in some cases perhaps through arbitration, lawyers involved in the case said."

Former Comverse CEO May Have Problems With Option Exercise Dates. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Levitz) reports, "Kobi Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., fled to Namibia rather than face criminal-fraud charges alleging he fattened his paycheck by backdating his options grants to low points in the company's stock price, making them more valuable. … But Mr. Alexander might have other problems with options, too." The Journal continues, "Mr. Alexander reported a 1998 option exercise near a notable low in the company's share price. If the timing of that exercise was backdated, Mr. Alexander could have received a substantial, improper break on his personal income-tax bill. … The issue has been referred to the special committee of Comverse directors who are examining the company's grant-backdating problem, according to a person familiar with the matter. The timing of the 1998 exercise was noted in a 13-page Nov. 27 report by Gradient Analytics Inc., a Scottsdale, Ariz., research firm that specializes in the analysis of executive compensation, which Gradient believes can affect share prices. The report was distributed to clients including hedge funds and mutual-fund money managers." The Journal adds, "Gradient didn't conclude that Mr. Alexander's exercise was backdated, and his favorable timing might have been just a matter of luck. … Mr. Alexander said on a form he filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 9, 1998, that he had exercised the split-adjusted equivalent of 675,000 options two months earlier, on Oct. 9, when Comverse's shares closed at a split-adjusted price of $10 each, just pennies above its lowest closing price of the quarter. He didn't report a sale for that same day."

SEC Calls Pequot Probe Thorough, But Attorney Adds Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Hughes) reports, "A second Securities and Exchange Commission official told Congress he had warned agency officials that 'something smells rotten' about the SEC's handling of an insider-trading probe of hedge fund Pequot Capital Management." The Journal continues, "The testimony from Eric Ribelin, who works in the office of market surveillance, provides a leg of support for the claims of former SEC enforcement attorney Gary Aguirre." The Journal adds, "Mr. Aguirre says he was fired in September 2005 after his supervisors reversed course and stopped him from issuing subpoenas to current Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, whom Mr. Aguirre suspected of tipping off Pequot. SEC officials said they fired Mr. Aguirre because his behavior became erratic and he couldn't get along with his colleagues. … 'I have serious misgivings about many decisions made in this investigation,' Mr. Ribelin wrote in September 2005 to Robert Hanson, an SEC branch chief who had supervised Mr. Aguirre. 'I don't know what all has driven the decisions. Something smells rotten, though.' … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) called the hearing to air allegations that the Pequot probe was derailed by political influence. The SEC staff closed its investigation of Pequot and Mr. Mack last week without recommending enforcement action. Morgan Stanley has said Mr. Mack, who testified to the SEC this past August, cooperated in the probe."

The New York Times (12/6, Bogdanich) reports, "Senior officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission vigorously defended the commission's investigation of a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management, telling the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday that its inquiry was professional, thorough and untainted by outside political influence." The Times continues, "In their first detailed public comments about the investigation of Pequot, four current or former S.E.C. supervisors took aim at their former colleague and chief accuser, Gary J. Aguirre, saying his allegations that the agency had pulled its punches were unfounded and came from a fired employee whose temperament and judgment had caused problems in the office. … 'He treated his colleagues with disrespect bordering on contempt,' said Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the S.E.C. 'His investigation of Pequot was poorly thought out, disorganized, and sloppily documented.' … The testimony by S.E.C. officials, including the agency's inspector general, was met with considerable skepticism by Senator Arlen Specter, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Finance Committee. Both panels are investigating the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of the Pequot inquiry."

AIG Settles Some Legal Disputes With Greenberg Firm. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Pleven) reports, "American International Group Inc. and C.V. Starr & Co., a firm led by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, are settling multiple legal cases." The Journal continues, "Mr. Greenberg left AIG last year amid an accounting probe. He has denied any wrongdoing in a resulting civil case. … After Mr. Greenberg's departure, AIG terminated its relationship with insurance agencies controlled by C.V. Starr, which was headed by Mr. Greenberg when he ran AIG and sold commercial policies to large clients. Among other things, the firms have argued about who could use the 'Starr' and 'American International' trademarks. Under the settlement, AIG won't use the Starr or related names in doing insurance business, and C.V. Starr won't use certain AIG-related names." The Journal adds, "The settlement doesn't resolve a dispute over billions of dollars in AIG shares held by investment vehicle Starr International Co. Mr. Greenberg is chairman of Starr International. … The terms of the settlement are confidential, the companies said. A spokesman for AIG said it includes 'no monetary payment that is material to AIG's financial disclosures.' Of his work at C.V. Starr, Mr. Greenberg said yesterday the company has opened offices in recent months in London and Hong Kong and has invested hundreds of millions of dollars since he left AIG."

Siemens Suspect Claims Officials Had Role In Bribes. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B2, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "Siemens AG's troubles with a fraud investigation look set to grow, after a suspect gave German investigators details of a bribes-for-business scheme and alleged senior officials at the conglomerate were involved." The Journal continues, "Munich prosecutors say they are investigating allegations that officials at Siemens' telecommunications division diverted at least €200 million ($266.6 million) to a slush fund held at banks in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein for use to pay bribes. Authorities searched offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November." The Journal adds, "On Friday, prosecutors ordered the release of Reinhard Sickzek, 56 years old, a former sales official in the Siemens telecoms division, after he provided details of a system of bribes paid to potential customers in Africa, Russia and the Middle East, according to Mr. Sickzek's lawyer, Wolfgang Kreuzer. Mr. Sickzek also named at least one board member in the Siemens telecoms division as the supervisor of the scheme, Mr. Kreuzer said. … Mr. Sickzek's statement to Munich prosecutors, which encompasses hundreds of pages, raises questions about Siemens's determination to prevent corruption. Mr. Sickzek told police that a member of the Siemens Compliance Department advised him on how to prevent detection of the bribery operation. … Siemens says it is cooperating in the investigation as a witness."

Countrywide Financial Settles Spitzer Probe Of Lending Disparities. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B10, Davies) reports, "Countrywide Financial Corp., one of the nation's largest home-mortgage lenders, has settled an inquiry by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, into alleged discriminatory pricing practices and agreed to establish a $3 million consumer-education fund and implement other reforms." The Journal continues, "The settlement comes as other banks involved in the inquiry continue to resist Mr. Spitzer's efforts to obtain information about their lending practices." The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer launched the inquiry into lending by seven large banks -- including Citigroup Inc., HSBC Holdings PLC, and Wells Fargo & Co. -- in April 2005. Mr. Spitzer was elected governor of New York in November and takes office next month. .. .The inquiry began after a review of federal Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data showed that black and Latino customers were more likely than whites to receive high-priced loans in New York in 2004. … Mr. Spitzer sent the banks letters seeking loan-pricing data, such as credit scores, used to set interest rates and fees. .. .The banks sued Mr. Spitzer, contending that as federally-chartered institutions they are shielded from state scrutiny. A federal district court sided with the banks, whose position was backed by the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which joined the suit. The case is on appeal before the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan."

The Washington Post (12/6, D02, Day) reports, "Countrywide, which denied any wrongdoing, has agreed to review the loans in question to make sure the customers were charged the same rate as white borrowers with similar financial histories. The company made 20,000 mortgages in New York in 2004, including the 4,500 to black and Hispanic borrowers." The Post adds, "Neither the company nor Spitzer knows how much will be repaid until Countrywide's review is complete, but company spokesman Rick Simon said it wouldn't involve many loans or much money. 'We do not think there will be a lot of payments. We do not expect this to have great impact,' he said. He declined to be more specific." The Post notes, "The Calabasas, Calif., company said it consented to the agreement to avoid the cost and inconvenience of a longer investigation by Spitzer's office and possible litigation. The agreement also requires Countrywide to pay $200,000 to cover the cost of Spitzer's probe, beef up monitoring of its lending practices and invest $3 million in consumer education."

Congress Pushing Legislation To Make Pretexting A Federal Crime. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B1, Conkey, Rogers) reports, "Spurred by the Hewlett Packard Co. scandal, Congress is moving toward passing legislation this week that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval." The Journal continues, "The measure targets so-called 'pretexting' tactics, where investigators use various schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy earlier this year in a now-infamous investigation into who leaked information to reporters." The Journal adds, "About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there's currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P executive Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws. … The federal legislation under consideration, which passed the House in April and may clear the Senate before Congress adjourns for the year, would make pretexting for phone records a federal crime, and spell out new federal criminal penalties for both those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records." The Journal notes, "Individuals and organizations that purchase confidential records -- knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent -- could be subject to fines of up to $500,000 and imprisonment for up to five years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes, or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen. … The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies."

SEC Plans Database To Crack Down On Hedge-Fund Insider Trading. Bloomberg (12/6, Westbrook, Scheer) reports, "The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission plans to have a database in place by next year that will help it crack down on hedge-fund insider trading, a senior agency official said. … 'The SEC presently does not have an electronic system to aggregate referrals based on the identities of the specific traders involved,' SEC Enforcement Director Linda Thomsen said before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. 'We anticipate implementing a new case tracking system by mid-2007.'" Bloomberg continues, "Illegal trading by hedge funds 'remains a substantial concern' to the SEC as the $1.3 trillion industry's influence over financial markets grows, Thomsen said. Hedge funds, which are loosely regulated private pools of capital, manage about 5 percent of U.S. assets and account for about 30 percent of U.S. equity trading volume." Bloomberg adds, "Today's hearing is the third convened by Senator Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee's chairman, in six months to examine oversight of insider trading. The Pennsylvania Republican circulated draft legislation aimed at halting illegal buying and selling of stocks that would require hedge funds accepting money from pension funds to submit to random inspections by the SEC. … His measure would also force hedge funds, which allow managers to participate substantially in the gains of money invested, to set up ethics codes and compliance programs and allow the Justice Department to give private citizens rewards for helping in prosecutions of insider trading cases."

Regulators Break Deadlock On Revising Audit Rule. The Washington Post (12/6, D01, Johnson) reports, "Regulators have reached an agreement in principle on how to revamp a contentious accounting rule that cost businesses millions of dollars more than anticipated, removing a pair of major stumbling blocks attacked by consumer advocates." The Post continues, "The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, plans to meet Dec. 19 to present its revised version of the regulation, officials said yesterday. The rule, which mandates that auditors review corporate financial controls, is the most disputed part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress in 2002 after frauds at Enron and WorldCom." The Post adds, "Businesses had objected to the cost of complying with the law's stricter audit provision. The accounting board's chairman, Mark Olson, said the new proposed guidance, which attempts to focus auditors on areas of highest risk, would more closely align the costs of the measure with its benefits. … Accounting board officials had clashed with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission over the issue in recent weeks. But a visit to the board's office Friday by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox helped put the process back on track." The Post notes, "Cox had floated the idea of requiring small companies to develop financial controls, which help prevent fraud and mistakes, but forcing auditors to test the controls only on a narrow and limited basis, in a memo that was leaked two weeks ago. But investor groups howled that the proposal would gut the law. … That idea now appears to be off the table, in part because of a report issued last week by a panel supported by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, funded by business interests, advocated a broad overhaul of U.S. regulation and urged new protections against shareholder lawsuits. But the panel rejected the notion that small companies could evade regular testing of their internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reportedly Probing Threats To Rep Renzi. The Arizona Republic (12/6, House) reports, "Rep. Rick Renzi says the FBI is investigating several 'death threats' directed at him, as well as incidents of gunshots and other vandalism to his Flagstaff office. … 'I'm very concerned about a series of calls we've gotten - one we're taking very seriously,' said the Arizona Republican, in an interview today." The Republic continues, "A Justice Department official in Phoenix would neither confirm nor deny a pending investigation into the incidents described by Renzi. … Renzi, who was elected to his third term on Nov. 7, said incidents of vandalism dates from several months ago, and include instances of golf balls and firecrackers thrown at his congressional offices. … But concerns over the vandalism heightened last week, after gunshots were fired at the congressional office on North San Francisco Street, either late on Nov. 28 or early Nov. 29. .. .Along with the vandalism, there's been a series of threatening telephone calls to the office, including death threats to the congressman, said Renzi. … One call, in particular, is prompting the most concern. Renzi declined to provide the details of that message. … The FBI is conducting interviews regarding the calls and the shooting, Renzi said."

Pennsylvania Man Could Face Federal Death Sentence In Murder-For-Hire Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/6, Simonich) reports, "What began as an extramarital affair for an Aleppo man is now a federal criminal case that could cost him his life." The Post-Gazette continues, "Grand jurors in Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday indicted Eugene Talik Jr. on a murder-for-hire charge in the death of his lover, Kelly Jo Elliott. … Mr. Talik, 38, also was charged with conspiracy and interstate domestic violence. The grand jury alleges that he hired an acquaintance to kill Ms. Elliott, 28, so word of their affair would never reach his wife." The Post-Gazette adds, "Prosecutors say Mr. Talik himself strangled Ms. Elliott after the man he hired decided he could not go through with the killing. … The second man has not been identified by federal prosecutors or the grand jury. He is cooperating with the U.S. attorney's staff in Wheeling as it prepares its case against Mr. Talik." The Post-Gazette notes, "Mr. Talik could face a sentence of life in prison or death if he is convicted. For prosecutors to pursue a capital case against him, they would need approval from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Mr. Gonzales earlier this year authorized the death penalty in a case similar to the one against Mr. Talik. It involves Donna Moonda, of Hermitage in Mercer County, who is charged with hiring a man to murder her husband, a wealthy physician."

US Seeks Disqualification Of Attorney In Utah Grant Funds Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (12/5, Manson) reports, "Prosecutors are seeking to disqualify the lawyer for a Layton (UT) couple accused of stealing federal grant money from Davis School District, claiming he gave legal advice to witnesses in the criminal investigation." The Tribune continues, "The defense attorney, Paul Gotay, denies that his actions have caused a legal conflict that would require him to step down and is fighting to continue his representation of Susan G. Ross and John D. Ross. … 'My head was put in the vise, and they tried to squeeze it,' Gotay said Monday after a hearing in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, where the disqualification motion was discussed. 'It's a good thing I have a hard head.'" The Tribune adds, "Magistrate Brooke Wells has set a hearing for Monday to hear arguments on the disqualification motion and Gotay's request for transcripts of grand jury testimony by the witnesses. … In the disqualification motion, filed late Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that as early as May 2005, Gotay appeared with the Rosses at the office of the FBI, the agency investigating the alleged fraud that drained the district of millions in Title I money meant to help disadvantaged students. … Then, when agents attempted to interview two witnesses they believed had knowledge of the scheme - Keith Evans and Terry Applegate - both men said Gotay was their attorney, the motion said. … In addition, Gotay himself, by engaging in 'multiple financial transactions with the defendants,' has personal knowledge relevant to the case and is likely to be a witness in the prosecution, according to the motion." The Tribune notes, "Gotay has said the attempt to disqualify him stems from the fact that the Rosses paid him a fixed fee for his representation after they came under investigation in the spring of 2005. The couple's assets were frozen when they were indicted Nov. 21 by a federal grand jury."

Alabama Amber Alert Canceled As Boy's Mother Charged In Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Reeves) reports, "A north Alabama woman who claimed that someone stole a car with her 5-year-old son asleep in the back seat was charged Tuesday afternoon with hindering prosecution, and her boyfriend was charged with capital murder in the boy's death. An Amber Alert was issued Monday morning when Shalinda Glass reported that her son had been abducted outside an Albertville convenience store. A massive search was conducted by police and members of the FBI and the Alabama Bureau of Investigation. It turns out Glass was lying." Etowah County Sheriff James Hayes "said Glass told police that her son, who was in kindergarten, died from a beating after he brought home a bad progress report from school Friday."

USA Today (12/6, 4A, Koch) reports, "An Alabama mother's report that her slain 5-year-old son had been asleep in a car when it was stolen was a hoax, and she and her boyfriend have been charged in the boy's death, police said Tuesday." USA continues, "The body of the kindergartner, Geontae Glass, was found early Tuesday in the trunk of the car, which was parked outside a house owned by the mother's boyfriend, said Capt. Michael Jones of the Etowah County Sheriff's office. "They came up with a plan to disguise the homicide," Jones said of Shalinda Glass, 25, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles. … Towles has been charged with capital murder and Glass with hindering prosecution." USA adds, "The story could be the latest in a string of hoaxes, from 'runaway bride' Jennifer Wilbanks of Georgia, who faked her own kidnapping, to Sarah Everson, a Missouri woman who collected donations by pretending to be pregnant with sextuplets. Some appear aimed at financial gain or avoiding prosecution — or marriage. Others are odder: John Mark Karr claimed to have killed JonBenét Ramsey until evidence showed otherwise. … 'In Alabama, Jones says, police concluded that Glass' story was false after interviewing her and others. He said Glass has no prior criminal record but Towles, who runs a barbecue restaurant, has a record of drug offenses. … Glass, who also has a 7-year-old daughter, told police Monday that the boy was sleeping in the back seat of a car that she left running when she went into a convenience store in Albertville, about 80 miles northeast of Birmingham."

DOJ Creates Team To Review Prince George's County Prosecutors' Office. The Washington Post (12/6, Castaneda) reports, "A team of current and former state prosecutors from across the country is meeting this week with Prince George's County prosecutors, police, judges and defense attorneys to assess how well the state's attorney's office is performing and what it can do to improve." The Post continues, "The broad independent review is being conducted at the request of State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who will begin his second term in January. Ivey, who was reelected without opposition in the November general election, said no event or case prompted the review." The Post adds, "In an interview, Ivey said he wanted to conduct such a review from the time he first assumed the office in December 2002 but was unable to because of budgetary constraints. … He said the review is being conducted at no cost to the state's attorney's office." The Post notes, "The team of four current and former prosecutors that will be reviewing the office was put together by the Bureau of Justice Assistance, which is part of the Justice Department. … The review team will be supported by two staff members from the bureau, said Joseph Trotter, an official with the bureau."

Homeless Louisiana Man Charged With 23 Murders. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Foster) reports, "A near-broke nobody who lived with his sister before moving into a homeless shelter," Ronald J. Dominique "went willingly, leaning heavily on a cane, when officers came to get him last week. … Even with a meek persona, investigators said, Dominique bound and strangled or smothered 23 men and teenage boys in south Louisiana in what the FBI considered its most urgent serial killing case." The AP notes, "Dominique, 42, was arrested Friday at a homeless shelter in Houma and charged with two murders. On Monday, authorities filed nine more counts against him and said more charges were possible. … FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said FBI profilers felt this was the most significant current serial killer case in the country in terms of the number of victims and its time span – the killings took place from 1997 to 2005. 'A serial killer like this hides in plain sight,' Bernazzani said. 'They do not disturb people. That's why they are so effective.'"

Jefferson Faces Voters Saturday With Backdrop Of Bribery Allegations. Under the headline "Katrina Struck District, Scandal Struck Dem," USA Today (12/6, 8A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago. Now weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer. Rep. William Jefferson, a Democrat, has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime." USA adds, "Saturday's vote will write the epilogue on the past two years' scandals in Congress." Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said, "He asks voters to consider him on his record," adding "that Jefferson 'has brought home billions' of dollars in federal aid since Katrina struck. 'Now is not the time to send someone new, who doesn't know anyone and who can't negotiate our needs.'"

Under the headline "The $90,000 Question," the New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/6, Alpert) reports, "Judith Woods and Dwight Garrett know all about the $90,000 FBI agents say they found in…Jefferson's freezer, but they are of different minds on how the federal probe…should influence voters in Saturday's runoff." Garrett, "an insurance broker and adjuster and self-described community activist, admits he was 'shocked' when he heard about the $90,000. But he said he's decided to stick with Jefferson because the government's case 'apparently isn't very strong or they would have indicted him by now.' Jefferson, he said, wouldn't be the first African-American politician wrongly tainted with false charges." Woods, "a social worker, said she has voted for Jefferson in the past but can't conceive of what Jefferson has in mind when he promises an honorable explanation for the allegations against him." The Picayune adds that "perhaps more than any other issue, including the federal government's continued role in hurricane recovery efforts, how voters see the federal probe…will determine whether Jefferson is elected."

Reputed Chicago Mob Boss Asks Judge For Larger Cell. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Robinson) reports, "A reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family pleaded with a federal judge Tuesday for more space in jail while he awaits trial on charges of plotting 18 slayings going back three decades. 'I'm taking 15 medications and my back is killing me,' Frank Calabrese Sr., 69, told U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel. He said overcrowding on his floor at the Metropolitan Correctional Center is so bad that he can't concentrate on court papers and study the charges against him. … 'All I want to do is be in a two-man room so I can study my case,' said the portly, bearded defendant." The AP notes, "Zagel was holding a hearing on complaints by a number of the defendants charged in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets that their health and related problems are not being met in the MCC."

The Chicago Tribune (12/6, Bush, 617K) reports, "Zagel and federal prosecutors said that they would look into the matter but stopped short of promising any quick relief. Zagel said that getting Calabrese into a different room might require putting him on a different floor, which in turn could bring him into contact with other defendants in the case—something federal prosecutors have sought to avoid. 'I would be reluctant to interfere with the separation order,' the judge said."

Memphis City Council Fails To Remove, Censure Indicted Councilmen. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/6, Jones, 163K) reports, "At the end of the day, Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete remained in their seats on the Memphis City Council dais. … Despite federal bribery charges against the two, the council failed to muster enough support Tuesday to ask them to resign or to censure them." The Commercial Appeal notes, "The resolution asking Ford and Peete to resign failed on a 6-6 vote during a morning executive session. A separate motion to initiate censure proceedings on the pair failed by a 3-5 vote in the council's personnel, intergovernmental and annexation committee. Peete did not attend committee meetings, but showed up for the full council meeting in the afternoon. Ford, however, attended meetings all day and voted against the censure motion and cast a 'no' vote that doomed the resolution requesting he and Peete step down. … Earlier he told The Commercial Appeal 'This is about color.'"

MySpace Developing Method To Keep Sex Offenders Off Site. The New York Times (12/6, Richtel) reports, "MySpace.com, the social networking site, said Tuesday that it was developing technologies that would help combat the use of its site by sexual predators by cross-referencing its more than 130 million users against state databases of registered sex offenders." The Times continues, "The Web site, which is owned by the News Corporation, said that within 30 days it planned to deploy the technology, which will seek to identify known sex offenders not just by their names, but also by date of birth, height, weight and ZIP code. …. If the automated system finds a potential match between a MySpace user and a registered sex offender, employees will try to verify the match or determine if it is a false positive. Users who are registered sex offenders, MySpace said, will be denied access to the site and, depending in the circumstances, be turned over to law enforcement." The Times adds, "The system, which MySpace executives said was the first of its kind, comes as the site has faced scrutiny and criticism by advocates of children's safety. Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said the technology was a potentially useful step in slowing the incidence of sexual solicitation of minors."

California Prison On Lockdown As FBI Investigates Attack On Guard. The AP (12/6) reports, "The federal penitentiary in Atwater will remain on lockdown as the FBI investigates the stabbing of a prison employee, a prison spokesman said. The facility has been locked down since an inmate attacked an employee Nov. 28 with a homemade knife, U.S. Penitentiary Atwater Executive Assistant Jesse Gonzalez said. The staff member was treated at a hospital for non-life threatening injuries and returned to work, Gonzalez said." The AP notes that the "inmates will remain in their cells as investigators find out how the prisoner made the knife, said FBI Supervising Special Agent John Gliatta."

Spammers Keeping Ahead Of Anti-Spam Law Enforcement. The Washington Times (12/6, Rowland) reports, "Three years after the federal Can-Spam Act went into effect, unsolicited commercial e-mails are assaulting inboxes at record rates as spamming technology grows more sophisticated. … 'I think the majority of the industry would say that spam levels are at the highest they've ever been,' said Scott Chasin, chief technology officer at MX Logic Inc., a Colorado-based Internet security firm." The Times continues, "In September, unsolicited commercial e-mail messages accounted for more than 77 percent of all e-mail filtered by the company. Of that amount, only a fraction -- 0.27 percent -- was in compliance with federal anti-spamming law. … 'Spammers are creative and industrious,' said Michael Davis, a lawyer with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which is responsible for enforcing the act. 'Because of their dedication and their technological sophistication, they have found ways to stay oftentimes one step ahead of law enforcement.'" The Times adds, "Under the Can-Spam Act, marketers are allowed to send unsolicited commercial e-mails as long as they include a truthful subject line and routing information; an opt-out mechanism; a notice that labels the e-mail as an advertisement; and a valid postal address. … 'The challenge of enforcement does not stem from a lack of teeth. Can-Spam allows the FTC to seek civil penalties of up to $11,000 per violation, plus further fines for spammers who unlawfully "harvest" or extract e-mail addresses from Web sites or Web services. The law also gives the Justice Department authority to seek criminal punishment for violators who falsify header information or hijack a computer to send e-mail without a user's consent. … So far, the FTC has filed 26 lawsuits for violations of the act, Mr. Davis said. In those cases, federal courts have awarded civil penalties totaling more than $10 million."

Barr Urges Limits On Government's Use Of Cellphone Taps. In an op-ed for the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/6), former Rep. Bob Barr writes, "Modern cellphones are nothing more than miniature computers with small but sensitive microphones attached. Law enforcement agencies are discovering the significant benefit of drawing on that powerful combination of technology, by increasingly seeking court permission to use cellphones in the hands of suspects as surreptitious listening devices. Unfortunately for anyone who happens to be nearby, cellphones thus utilized as listening devices will pick up their conversations as well." Barr continues, "This latest example of electronic snooping should draw attention to the need for comprehensive national legislation to more clearly define the privacy rights of American citizens. Thus far, Congress has shown itself completely uninterested in addressing such fundamental civil liberty issues, much to the delight of the administration of George W. Bush, which continues to push the envelope of electronic snooping as far as possible." Barr adds, "I first became aware that the federal government wanted to outfit regular phones — so-called 'land lines' — with devices that could be activated remotely by government investigators to allow agents to hear whatever was being spoken into or near the receiver, about 10 years ago, shortly after I was elected to Congress. … At the time, the Justice Department was trying to require telecommunications companies to incorporate technology in their phones to enable the government to engage in such surreptitious listening. The law the government was trying to use to do this was passed in the early 1990s and called the Communications Assistance to Law Enforcement Act. … We stopped the government from such heavy-handed and privacy-invasive directives at the time, but in the post-Sept. 11 world, with a Congress almost completely submissive to executive branch entreaties to increase its powers to invade citizens' privacy, such efforts appear now to be quaintly outdated." Barr concludes, "We should also force Congress to place limits on the extent such technology might be employed in circumstances where private and lawful conversations might be picked up. In the absence of such limits, it is only a matter of time, for example, before the government starts asking courts to allow it to surreptitiously take photographs with cellphones thus equipped. Perhaps it already has."

Meanwhile, ABC News' The Blotter (12/5, Walter, Kjellman, 3:38 p.m.) reported on the Genovese case ruling and noted, "The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off. … 'The courts have given law enforcement a blank check for surveillance,' Richard Rehbock, attorney for defendant John Ardito, told ABC News. Judge Kaplan's ruling said otherwise. 'While a mobile device makes interception easier and less costly to accomplish than a stationary one, this does not mean that it implicated new or different privacy concerns.' … 'It does not invade zones of privacy that the government could not reach by more conventional means.'" ABC added, "The FBI maintains the methods used in its investigation of the Genovese family are within the law. 'The FBI does not discuss sensitive surveillance techniques other than to emphasize that any electronic surveillance is done pursuant to a court order and ongoing judicial scrutiny,' Agent Jim Margolin told ABC News."

FBI Twice Has Interviewed Former LANL Employee About Classified Data. CBS News (12/5, Attkisson) reported on its Web site, "The FBI has conducted two interviews and may schedule a third with the woman who walked out carrying classified documents from what's supposed to be one of the most secure facilities in the world, the Los Alamos National Laboratory, CBS News has learned. … Sources say 22-year-old Jessica Quintana was hired to archive data from weapons tests, and even had access to information on how to deactivate the locks that keep nuclear weapons from firing. Somehow, she managed to leave the laboratory with hundreds of pages of classified documents and several portable computer storage devices known as 'thumb drives.' CBS added that Rep. Ed Markey "plans to fire off a scathing letter to the Energy Secretary demanding answers. 'These are secrets that could be valuable to al Qaeda,' Markey tells CBS News."

Questions Raised About Milberg Weiss Indictment. The ABA Journal (12/6, Neil) reports, "Secret cash payments. falsified court documents. Behind-the-scenes deals between favored clients and their counsel. … All the elements of a John Grisham potboiler are present in the case of United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman." The Journal continues, "The nation's leading plaintiffs securities class-action law firm is on the receiving end of the first criminal indictment filed against a major law firm in U.S. history. The New York City-based firm—which has been both celebrated and vilified for its ferocious attacks on alleged corporate wrongdoing—lost about 40 percent of its 128 lawyers in the five months after its indictment and may be fighting for its very existence." The Journal adds, "Lost in the spectacle, according to critics of the government's case, is the question of whether prosecutors have gone too far. Even if Milberg Weiss is found guilty, indicting an entire law firm causes more harm than good, they contend. … The federal government's controversial tactic of getting corporations that are under investigation to surrender their attorney-client privilege in order to avoid prosecution is now being applied to law firms, with disastrous results for the legal profession and clients, the critics say. … And they are concerned that more law firms will be viewed as fair game for the same kind of aggressive criminal prosecutions the U.S. Department of Justice has pursued against a number of high-profile corporations in the post-Enron era." The Journal notes, "Even if the allegations are proven, the government has failed to exercise appropriate prosecutorial discretion, according to Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. 'The government obtains little or nothing by indicting the firm, when only a small number of attorneys allegedly were involved in the wrongdoing,' he says. … If the Justice Department is concerned about deterrence, says Gillers, 'the threat of criminal prosecution and the indictment of two prominent plaintiffs class-action lawyers is plenty chilling. I don't think you have to indict the firm to bring home the point that lawyers are at risk for this kind of conduct or alleged conduct.'"

US Agrees To $500,000 Settlement In VA Cancer Study Case. The Albany Times Union (12/5, Lyons) reports, "The federal government agreed to pay $500,000 to settle the first of seven federal lawsuits brought by the widows of veterans who died in a corrupt cancer research program at Stratton VA Medical Center Hospital, the Times Union has learned." The Times-Union continues, "The six other widows, who still have lawsuits pending against the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, are finding the government less willing to admit their husbands were used as guinea pigs in the tainted drug studies." The Times-Union adds, "The Justice Department has not agreed to settle the remaining cases, in part because it's never been determined -- or publicly disclosed -- that more than one veteran died as a result of the corruption. The government's position has been that the men had advanced stages of cancer, so it is impossible to determine what killed them, attorneys in the case said. … But in at least one case it was clear, and Justice Department lawyers recently settled with the family of that victim, James J. DiGeorgio, a 71-year-old Air Force veteran from Brunswick who died at Stratton in June 2001. The settlement comes a little more than a year after a former hospital researcher, Paul H. Kornak, was sentenced to nearly six years in prison for his role in the scandal. … VA officials and federal prosecutors have portrayed Kornak as an out-of-control researcher who forged medical records to push cancern-stricken patients into drug studies that allegedly paid the hospital thousands of dollars. But attorneys for the families and people familiar with the hospital's operation contend the corruption was widespread and Kornak was following orders from oncology doctors."

Former Springfield, MA, Mayor To Testify In Suit Against FBI. The Springfield (MA) Republican (12/6, Barry) reports, "Former Springfield Mayor Michael J. Albano is among witnesses scheduled to testify in Boston federal court on behalf of four men and their families suing the government for an FBI-sanctioned frame-up in a 1965 murder." The Republican continues, "Albano, once a Massachusetts Parole Board member, joins two former governors, notorious gangster-cum-informants and corrupt federal agents as witnesses for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the estates of the late Louis Greco and Enrico 'Henry' Tameleo. … The four - two of whom died in prison - were wrongly convicted of the murder of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan, who met a shower of mob bullets in a dark alley in Chelsea. They were falsely identified by onetime hit man Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza, whom the FBI wooed as a top-level informant in the 1960s. The three initially received death sentences in 1969, later commuted to life in prison. … What's more, the government knew it, even ignoring chatter about the then-proposed hit picked up on a secret FBI wire tap before Deegan's ambush, according to once-secret bureau records presented to bolster the plaintiffs' case." The Republican notes, "Reports on the matter were made public during a 2001 U.S. Justice Department probe that exposed collusion among former Boston agents and their informants. Limone and Salvati were released after 30 years; Greco and Tameleo were pardoned posthumously. Their families are suing for malicious prosecution and conspiracy."

California High Court Considers Key Tobacco Case. The California Recorder (12/6, Mckee) reports, "More than 40 years ago, at age 13, Leslie Grisham was already hooked on smoking, convinced doing it would make her part of the cool crowd. … Even as subsequent scientific evidence revealed smoking could cause serious health problems, the Los Angeles-area woman claims she was misled by industry ads proclaiming cigarettes safe." The Recorder continues, "Five years ago, however, Grisham's faith was shattered when she was diagnosed with severe periodontal disease, which doctors said had been caused by toxins in cigarette smoke. She sued Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., accusing them of deceiving her for four decades about the safety of their products. … Today, the California Supreme Court will hear arguments in Grisham's case to resolve an unsettled point of law in the vast realm of smoking suits. At what point, the court must decide, are longtime smokers who relied on manufacturers' false safety claims required to file suit -- when health problems emerge or much earlier, when smokers realize they're addicted?" The Recorder notes, "Millions of dollars in damages hinge on the court's decision. If the justices find that the statute of limitations tolls upon awareness of addiction, thousands of already sick smokers could be left with no recourse, while manufacturers' exposure to damages would be sharply limited."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probing Conditions At Seattle Jail. The Seattle Times (12/6, Carter) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has opened a civil-rights investigation into the King County Jail in Seattle, focusing on sexual abuse of inmates and on allegations of inadequate suicide prevention and contagious-disease control." The Times continues, "Lawyers from the department's Special Litigation Section met with jail and public-health officials Monday and will conduct a wide-ranging investigation that may be expanded beyond those topics. The county learned of the investigation in a letter received by King County Executive Ron Sims last month. … 'I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail,' said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. 'Beyond that, I cannot comment.'" The Times adds, "The investigation will focus on the jail in downtown Seattle and will not involve the Regional Justice Center in Kent. .. .Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial after a jury failed to reach a verdict. The assaults surfaced in April 2005 after a female inmate was transferred to state prison and spoke up about the assault."

The AP (12/6) reports, "Jail and public-health officials met with Justice Department lawyers on Monday, and they plan to cooperate fully with the investigation, said jail director Reed Holtgeerts." The AP adds, "Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates, while another is to be retried following a hung jury. Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999 -- three hangings, two poisonings, a suicide by jumping, plus a carbon-monoxide poisoning by an inmate on home confinement, according to the county. The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus, or MRSA, commonly called 'Mersa.' .. .Two weeks ago, the county released a report it commissioned which found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication were among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (12/6, Castro) reports, "The past year has been a tough one for the King County Jail with corrections officers caught sexually abusing inmates, suicides and reports of contagious diseases. … Now, the federal government has begun an investigation into jail operations." The P-I adds, "Monday, investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice visited the King County Jail to meet with staff and tour the facility, said Carolyn Duncan, spokeswoman for King County Executive Ron Sims. … 'We're cooperating,' Duncan said Tuesday. 'Whatever suggestions they make, we're obviously going to be making changes.'" The P-I adds, "In an Oct. 30 letter to Sims, the Justice Department told the county it would be examining the incarceration and treatment of inmates housed at the main jail in downtown Seattle, which has a bed capacity of 1,697. … 'Our investigation will focus on the protection of inmates from harm, including, but not limited to, custodial sexual misconduct, inadequate suicide prevention measures, and inadequate contagious disease prevention measures,' wrote Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim, who oversees the DOJ Civil Rights Division. … The letter went on to suggest the federal government may actually be able to assist King County in its efforts to improve conditions at the jail and the government may be able to provide financial assistance."

Atlanta Police Provide Few Details On Use Of "No-Knock" Warrants. The AP (12/6, Bluestein) reports, "Atlanta police often offer only cursory details when asking judges for so-called 'no-knock' warrants that allow them to burst into homes unannounced, like the one used when an elderly woman was killed in a shootout with plainclothes officers as they stormed her home, according to an analysis by The Associated Press." The AP continues, "Police Chief Richard Pennington called for a review of how his agency uses the warrants after Kathryn Johnson died and three officers were wounded Nov. 21 in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnson's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnson was 92 years old; authorities claim she was 88." The AP adds, "An AP review of all no-knock warrants filed in Atlanta's Fulton County this year found that authorities often give scant detail when applying for the warrants, which are typically used to search for drugs and weapons. The special warrants are intended to prevent suspects from getting rid of evidence or to protect officers from suspects who can show a threat of violence. .. .In an August affidavit, an officer pursuing a suspect named 'Kabuki' offered a two-line explanation for the no-knock warrant, claiming that an informant said people at the home 'always carry pistols' and could store guns. In others, officers only detailed their years of experience with the police force as justification for no-knock powers. … Critics of no-knock warrants say Atlanta is no anomaly when it comes to judges granting the special search warrants to police on few details."

Federal Prosecutors Face High Hurdle In Police Shooting Trials. Newsday (12/6, DeStefano) reports, "While federal officials said they are only monitoring developments in the fatal shooting of Sean Bell, new data indicate that making criminal cases against law enforcement officials such as cops is still a difficult task for the Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Office, the office that would have jurisdiction if the case shifted to the FBI. … Tuesday attorneys for the wounded men signaled they would be waiting to see what happens to the Brown case before going to federal prosecutors." Newsday notes, "Nationally, data show that 96 percent of civil rights cases are not prosecuted." Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse "statistics for fiscal 2005 showed that weak or insufficient evidence and lack of evidence of criminal intent were key reasons for tossing the cases." Additionally, "said one federal prosecutor yesterday who didn't want to be named," is the high standard for proving criminal intent. The official "added that the issue of self defense in a police shooting could make a federal case harder to prove."

New York Village Challenges DOJ's Stand On Election System. The New York Journal News (12/6, Sadler) reports that the village of Port Chester "is challenging the federal government's claim that its election system illegally disenfranchises Hispanic voters, possibly paving the way for an expensive legal battle." The News continues, "The Board of Trustees voted unanimously tonight to notify the U.S. Department of Justice that it does not believe the village's at-large election system violates Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act, as claimed by the Justice Department. The board reached the decision after reviewing data the Justice Department provided the village. … 'The federal government's data does not credibly support their allegations and contentions,' Mayor Gerald Logan said before the vote. 'I speak for the entire Board of Trustees when I say that we are shocked. The federal government has been working on their case for the past three years. I can only imagine the waste of taxpayer dollars.'" The News adds, "Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, said he had already notified the Justice Department of the board's decision and 'they've indicated they will get back to us.' Piscionere said he could not speculate about whether a lawsuit is imminent. … Tonight's decision came in response to an April 20 letter from the Justice Department to Village Attorney Anthony Cerreto that threatened to sue the village unless it switches to district voting. The letter called for a districting plan that includes a majority Hispanic district and concluded that 'voting patterns in Port Chester are polarized by ethnicity.'"

Divided 9th Circuit Panel Upholds Hawaii School's Admissions Policy. The New York Times (12/6, Liptak, 1.16M) reports the Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, "private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7." Students "may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled, citing what it said were unique factors in the history of Hawaii, the plight of Native Hawaiians and the schools' distinctively remedial mission, which Congress has repeatedly endorsed." The schools "are the only beneficiary of the enormous legacy of a 19th-century Hawaiian princess. They have an enrollment of some 5,000 students, from kindergarten through 12th grade, on campuses on three islands. Admission is a great prize, as students pay about $1,800 in annual tuition for an education worth about $20,000." The suit "argued that the admission policy ran afoul of a Reconstruction-era law, the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The court, splitting almost entirely along partisan lines, ruled that the prohibition did not apply to the schools' admissions program. (The eight judges in the majority were appointed by Democratic presidents. All but one of the dissenters were appointed by Republicans.)"

The AP (12/6, Kravets) reports, "The decision by a 15-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned an earlier ruling by three of the same judges that the Kamehameha Schools policy amounted to unlawful discrimination." The AP adds, "In Tuesday's decision, the majority noted that the case was unique because Congress has singled out the plight of native Hawaiians for improvement, just as lawmakers have done with Alaskan natives and American Indians. … The policy 'furthers the urgent need for better education of Native Hawaiians, which Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary,' the court said." The AP notes, "Admission to the elite school is first granted to qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings available. .. .Only one in eight eligible applicants is admitted to the schools, which serve about 5,400 students at three campuses. … The decision came a day after the Supreme Court suggested during arguments in a different case that it might ban the practice of race-based admissions in public schools, even if the policy was intended to create racial harmony."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Weinstein) reports that "a sharply divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that a private school can favor Native Hawaiians for admissions in an effort to 'counteract the significant, current educational deficits' experienced by the islands' indigenous population. In an 8-7 ruling, the US 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco held that the admissions policy of Hawaii's Kamehameha Schools is constitutional because it is narrowly tailored to remedy a well-documented problem and does not unnecessarily trammel on the rights of other students." This case is distinguished from and "nothing like" the current Supreme Court case about public schools in Seattle and Louisville because Kamehameha "is private; Seattle and Louisville are public. Kamehameha involves remedial preferences; Seattle and Louisville involved diversity;" and while Kamehameha "involves preferences of a kind explicitly adopted by Congress; Seattle and Louisville do not."

The New York Times (12/6, Liptak) reports that the Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, "private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7. Students may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled;" but Eric Grant, the plaintiff's lawyer, "said he would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case" and "the closeness of the vote, he added, made Supreme Court review more likely."

LATimes Calls On Justice Kennedy To Uphold Affirmative-Action Plans. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/6, 850K) opines that it was "clear" that the outcome of the Supreme Court's affirmative action cases "hangs on the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy." The Times editorializes, "Some of Kennedy's comments from the bench Monday were ominous for the school districts. But if Kennedy views Brown in the proper perspective, he will provide a fifth vote to allow school districts, including the Los Angeles Unified School District, to experiment with ways to bring children of different races together in the classroom."

Professor Calls For "Race-Baiting Language" To End In Affirmative-Action Dialogue. In a column appearing in USA Today (12/6, 21A, 2.27M), Jonathan Turley, the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest law at George Washington University, notes that the Supreme Court "once again ventured into the quagmire of affirmative action" in two cases it is now considering. Turley writes, "Even after many decades, affirmative action remains one of the most contentious issues in our society. Yet, like abortion, there appears to be less, not more, true dialogue. … All too often, critics of affirmative action are dismissed as racists." Turley continues, "Most Americans are neither racist nor hostile to the ends sought by affirmative action. It remains a question of means." After reviewing varying stances and rationales on affirmative action, Turley writes, "It is time to have a substantive dialogue about the promise and limits of affirmative action — free of race-baiting language."

Egyptian Investigator Sues Over Contractor's Allegedly Racist Emails. The New York Times (12/6, Rashbaum) reports that an anonymous Egyptian-born analyst, part of a New York City Police Department "elite undercover unit of Middle Eastern and Asian investigators who use their foreign-language skills online to search out potential terrorist threats against the city," has filed a discrimination lawsuit , charging that "he was subjected to hundreds of blistering anti-Muslim and anti-Arab e-mail messages sent out by" Bruce Tefft, who "worked for Orion, a company that provided the department with counter-terrorism information culled from its massive database, including news articles and other materials known as open-source intelligence." The Times adds, "According to the suit, the briefing messages were preceded by commentary from Mr. Tefft that included virulent anti-Muslim and anti-Arab statements." Department spokesman Paul J. Browne "said in an e-mail message that the department moved to stop the e-mail messages when it became aware of a complaint about them."

Panel Calls For Standard That Would Phase Out Paperless Voting. The Washington Post (12/6, A9, Barr, 690K) reports, that the Technical Guidelines Development Committee "voted yesterday to begin developing a national standard that could result in the gradual phasing out of the paperless electronic voting machines in use across the Washington region and in many parts of the country. … 'This seems to mark the end of an era' for paperless electronic voting, said Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan organization that tracks changes in the country's election systems." The Post adds, "Some politicians indicated yesterday that they would move more quickly to add verification systems -- also known as paper trails -- to voting systems that lack them."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft "Resets" Technical Documents In Compliance Dispute. IDG News Service (12/6, Gross) reports, "A U.S. district judge on Tuesday praised the schedule set up in a revamped technical documentation project that's part of the 4-year-old antitrust settlement between Microsoft Corp. and the U.S. government." IDG continues, "Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, hailed a new plan that would deliver 58 documents related to Microsoft's software communication protocols by Dec. 15, with more documents coming in February, April and May." IDG adds, "Kollar-Kotelly in May approved a two-year extension to parts of her antitrust judgment against Microsoft because of ongoing problems in the technical documentation for Microsoft's software communication protocols. … 'I hope this approach works,' Kollar-Kotelly said during Tuesday's antitrust compliance hearing. 'We seem to be on the correct time table.'" IDG notes, "Kollar-Kotelly, in an antitrust settlement approved in November 2002, ordered Microsoft to create the technical documentation so that competing software companies can buy licenses to Microsoft's communications protocols and make products that work with Microsoft software. .. .The judge expressed support for the new plan after numerous delays and past complaints about the quality of technical documentation. 'We'll have to see if this achieves the [results] that have eluded us so far,' she said after Microsoft representatives explained the technical documentation 'reset,' as they called it."

US Air CEO Will Abandon Delta Bid If Management Balks. USA Today (12/6, 1B, Adams) reports, "US Airways will give up its proposed takeover of Delta Air Lines if management there can't be persuaded of the benefits, US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Tuesday." USA continues, "Parker said he's not prepared to fight Delta's management in bankruptcy court by submitting a merger plan to the judge without the backing of Delta officials. … 'We have to get to a point where we are all working together on this, or it's not going to happen,' Parker said at a meeting with editors and reporters at USA TODAY. 'This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense.'" USA adds, "US Airways has made an unsolicited takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock to acquire Delta, the USA's third-biggest carrier. … Delta's management has rebuffed the offer, saying it's too risky and that Delta is better off as an independent airline. Delta declined to comment on Parker's remarks. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein has repeatedly voiced opposition to the merger proposal since US Airways announced it Nov. 15." USA notes, "In a memo to employees Tuesday, Grinstein said Delta, 'is making crucial progress toward becoming a strong, independent, stand-alone company.' … But because Delta is in bankruptcy, its management does not have complete control of the company's fate. Its creditors must approve Delta's post-bankruptcy business plan before the airline can exit. Delta executives plan to unveil the plan this month."

Delta CEO Says He Will Resist Merger. The Washington Post (12/6, D01, Wilber) reports, "The top executive at Delta Air Lines said he would vigorously defend his company against an unsolicited takeover bid, insisting that the Atlanta-based carrier would be a stronger company and better for consumers if it remained independent." The Post continues, "In his first interview since US Airways Group announced its merger proposal last month, Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said he was confident that creditors would accept his reorganization plan. He also said it would be difficult for a combined company to overcome internal and regulatory hurdles. … 'Whenever you go from having two carriers to one, or three carriers to two, that is going to have a consumer impact,' he said. 'There will be a loss of service in some smaller communities. There will be an increase in fares. . . . There is no question that there are antitrust issues that won't be quickly or easily resolved.' .. 'I think the track record of good mergers is hard to find' in the airline industry, he said." The Post adds, "Delta and US Airways are battling to convince creditors, regulators and legislators of the virtues of their competing plans. US Airways has dominated the early rounds. Its stock price soared the day the merger proposal was announced but has since retreated slightly. … Many outside analysts and airline executives think the industry needs to consolidate to improve its financial outlook. .. .Several analysts and executives at other airlines said US Airways appeared to have lost momentum, as investors and creditors look more carefully at the merger proposal. Among their concerns are the reaction of regulators, the new Democratic-controlled Congress and the short time available for US Airways to complete a deal. US Airways hopes to do that before Delta leaves bankruptcy protection, which is expected next year. Otherwise, US Airways would lose some cost-cutting advantages it could gain in the bankruptcy process."

Critics Knock FCC Chair's Attempt To Break Telecom Deadlock. USA Today (12/6, 5B, Cauley) reports, "If you can't settle through negotiation, why not try a different approach? … So it goes these days at the Federal Communications Commission, which is using legal maneuvering to break its 2-2 deadlock on the pending AT&T-BellSouth merger." USA continues, "The $80 billion deal just needs FCC approval to close. It already has received the other necessary approval, from the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions. … Last week, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin asked the panel's third Republican to cast the tiebreaking vote on the deal. The commissioner, Robert McDowell, has recused himself because he worked as a lobbyist for a trade group opposing the deal. McDowell also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association. … An official can be unrecused if the FCC's general counsel determines that the need for his or her participation outweighs public ethics concerns." USA adds, "Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers' Union, which opposes the deal, calls the move 'the most unusual thing I've ever seen in my entire career.' .. .Kimmelman says he was helping to negotiate an agreement among AT&T and the two Democrats and Martin when the chairman pulled the plug. … 'We thought we were making progress,' Kimmelman says. 'It's just bizarre.'" USA notes, "In moving to unrecuse McDowell, Martin, who declined to comment, cited legal precedent in a case involving the National Association of Broadcasters. But that request to break the FCC stalemate came from the U.S. Court of Appeals after a two-year impasse. … In the AT&T case, the request is from an FCC chairman who openly favors approval with no conditions. And it comes after a stalemate of just two months. … Tuesday, McDowell issued a statement that he is prepared to get up to speed quickly on the AT&T merger should the general counsel unrecuse him."

The AP (12/6, Dunbar) reports, "Two powerful Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday night sharply questioned a move by the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to allow a fellow commissioner who had claimed a conflict of interest to vote on the nation's largest telecommunications industry merger. … Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote FCC Chairman Kevin Martin expressing 'disappointment' in Martin's 'apparent willingness to waive government recusal rules' to allow former lobbyist and current commissioner Robert McDowell to vote on the proposed merger of San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp." The AP adds, "Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., along with Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., sent a letter to the FCC's general counsel asking 15 pointed questions about past precedent of such recusals and other issues. … Their dismay takes on added significance because the Democrats will take control of Congress in January. Inouye will be chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and Dingell will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Both committees oversee the FCC."

EU Regulators Back NYSE-Euronext Merger. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C3, MacDonald, Lucchetti) reports, "One of the last major hurdles to a merger of the New York Stock Exchange and Euronext NV was removed yesterday, after European regulators gave their provisional clearance, pushing the first major trans-Atlantic stock-exchange merger toward the finishing line after a six-month battle." The Journal continues, "NYSE's likely success will heap further pressure on its fast-growing rival, Nasdaq Stock Market Inc., to do a deal. Last month, Nasdaq made a bid for London Stock Exchange PLC, but London rejected its approach. Nasdaq has acquired a 29% stake in the London exchange since April, but says its bid is a final offer, unless London agrees on a deal or a rival bidder comes in." The Journal adds, "The Euronext deal still needs approval from the Dutch finance minister, because the exchange is incorporated in Amsterdam, though operated from Paris. Also, shareholders in Euronext and NYSE Group Inc., which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will vote on the deal in about two weeks. Neither the finance minister nor shareholders are expected to block the creation of what would be a $28 billion company. A spokesman for the Netherlands Finance Ministry said Finance Minister Gerrit Zalm is expected to decide in January. … NYSE-Euronext Group, as the combined company will be called, will have stock exchanges in New York, Paris, Brussels, Lisbon and Amsterdam, as well as a London-based market in the fast-growing sector of derivatives."

Icahn's Withdrawal From Reckson Bid Shows Changing M&A Climate. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Pulliam, Forsyth) reports, "For years, financier Carl Icahn has been a prominent 'activist' investor, attempting to push companies to make changes in a bid to boost their stocks. Now he's being forced to change his game plan in using this brand of investing." The Journal continues, "This week Mr. Icahn's partners pulled out of a $4.6 billion bid for Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust. Mr. Icahn initially pressed ahead with the Reckson bid on his own. Late Monday night, the Reckson board rejected Mr. Icahn's offer in favor of a merger with SL Green Realty Corp., a rival real-estate trust. Yesterday, Mr. Icahn said he would back out. … 'The offer is pretty much done,' Mr. Icahn said in an interview. 'It's a minor disappointment.' Reckson shareholders must decide whether to approve SL Green's cash and stock offer, valued at about $45.56 a share as of yesterday's market close." The Journal adds, "The development illustrates the complications for even the savviest shareholders in mounting corporate challenges. These days, companies are launching ever-more aggressive legal and public-relations efforts, among other things, to block such efforts. Competition from industry players is intense. … Real-estate developer Harry Macklowe and Mack-Cali, a real-estate investment trust, both dropped out of the partnership with Mr. Icahn over the weekend. Now, Mr. Icahn said he is returning to his roots as a solo financier, bringing him full circle in his approach to 'activist' investing. Until a couple of years ago, when Mr. Icahn began joining forces with other investors to prod corporate managements to change, he largely had operated on his own."

Ryanair Offers To Sell Airport Slots In EU Review Of Aer Lingus Bid. Bloomberg (12/6, Newman) reports, "Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, has offered to sell slots at eight airports, including London's Heathrow, to win European Union antitrust approval to buy Aer Lingus Plc." Bloomberg continues, "Ryanair told the European Commission, the EU's antitrust authority in Brussels, that it would sell as many as four Aer Lingus slots at Heathrow if its bid for the carrier succeeds, according to a document submitted to the regulator last week. It also offered slots at Stansted Airport near London and airports serving Frankfurt, Paris, Milan, Rome, Bratislava and Barcelona. … 'The purpose is to allow one or more entrants to operate a new or additional non-stop scheduled daily frequencies on the 8 identified relevant airport pairs,' said the document, which was obtained by Bloomberg News today." Bloomberg adds, "Ryanair Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary has pursued the 1.48 billion-euro ($2 billion) hostile takeover of Ireland's flag carrier to add routes to the U.S. The Irish government and Aer Lingus employee shareholders, who together control almost 40 percent of the carrier, have rejected the offer, which expires Dec. 22. Ryanair said on Nov. 21 that it won't raise its offer."

South Korean Ship's Crewmen Pleads Guilty To Oil Dumping Cover-Up. The AP (12/6) reports, "The chief engineer and second engineer of a South Korean cargo vessel have pleaded guilty to environmental crimes and obstruction of justice for covering up illegal dumping of oil residue at sea, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The owner and operator of the vessel, Sun Ace Shipping Co., based in Seoul, South Korea, previously pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to pay a $400,000 fine and $100,000 to New Jersey environmental organizations." The AP adds, "Chief engineer Chang-Sig O pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice for maintaining a false oil record book and lying to the Coast Guard about his knowledge of hoses used to bypass shipboard pollution control equipment. … Second engineer Mun Sig Wang pleaded guilty to violating the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships for presenting a false oil record book to Coast Guard inspectors who boarded the ship in Camden on Jan. 3. … Inspectors learned that crew members had dumped oily waste into the ocean at least two times on their voyage from South Korea, the Justice Department said."

Activists Using Research In Environmental Justice Battles. USA Today (12/6, 13A, Jones) reports, "Neighborhood activists from California to Washington, D.C., are using a growing body of research on how pollutants exacerbate illness to block the building of facilities, relocate residents from contaminated communities and gain other concessions from large firms. … 'One of the problems with all environmental struggles, but particularly when you have the overlay of environmental racism, is the community always has the burden of proof of harm,' says Elizabeth Crowe, an organizer with the Kentucky Environmental Foundation in Berea, Ky. Now, 'we have much more definitive information as to how bad this stuff is. … So the science is catching up to the experiences of folks on the ground, and it helps prove the point.'" USA adds, 'Among recent developments: … A group in Port Arthur, Texas, signed an agreement on Nov. 6 with Motiva Enterprises under which the oil company will pour up to $3.5 million into the impoverished neighborhood as it expands a refinery there. The money will help fund new local businesses. … A plan to build a nuclear waste storage facility on the Skull Valley Goshute Indian reservation in Utah was scuttled in September by the federal Bureau of Land Management and Bureau of Indian Affairs. The agencies were concerned that it would have a negative impact on the reservation, says attorney Paul EchoHawk, who represented tribal members opposing the project. … From Sept. 24 to Oct. 1, representatives of more than 70 social justice and human rights groups toured the nation by bus caravan, visiting communities where residents face health problems associated with pollution." USA adds, "The environmental justice movement took root in the South in the early 1980s, when activists, church leaders and residents complained that toxic waste sites and other polluters often were located in poor and black neighborhoods. Their protests merged the struggle for a clean environment with that of civil rights."

NYTimes Says Bush Should Not Rescind Order Protecting Bristol Bay. The New York Times (12/6, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "President Bush is thinking about rescinding a longstanding presidential order that specifically prohibits oil and gas drilling in Alaska's pristine Bristol Bay. He should resist the impulse to do so, no matter how powerful the entreaties from his friends in the oil business. Drilling in Bristol Bay would threaten one of the nation's most productive fisheries without appreciably strengthening the nation's long-term energy security."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Report Says DOJ Should Regroup Following Failed Effort To Update Evidence System. Federal Computer Week (12/5, Sarkar) reported, "Although the FBI is forging ahead with establishing an interoperable fingerprint system with the Homeland Security Department, the Justice Department needs to regroup following a failed $1.18 million effort to modernize a system that manages evidence, according to a semi-annual report released by Justice's inspector general." The IG report "also provided updates with respect to the Federal Information Security Management Act (FISMA). A review found that systems within the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive (ATF); the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA); and the Justice Management Division (JMD) were all certified and accredited, security controls were tested and evaluated in the past year, and contingency plans were in compliance with FISMA. However, the FBI, ATF and DEA did not perform electronic authentication risk assessments, and the FBI and ATF did not fully implement Justice's process for tracking system vulnerabilities and corrective actions, the IG report adds."

FBI Says Computer Database System On Budget. The Washington Times (12/6, Seper, 88K) reports, "The FBI says a new computer system -- introduced last year as a replacement for a failed case-file program -- is within cost and on schedule to be fully operational by 2009, despite criticisms in a report this week by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. … 'The FBI appreciates the Inspector General's continued interest and assessment of the Sentinel program,' the bureau said. … 'The total project cost for Sentinel was budgeted at a cost of $425 million and that figure remains the same. Characterizations to the contrary are misleading,' the FBI said." The Times notes FBI Director Robert Mueller has said of the new system, "Sentinel will support our current priorities, including our No. 1 priority: preventing terrorist attacks."

Federal Probe Yields Arrests Of Chicago Gang Leaders. The AP (12/6, Tareen) reports, "Twenty alleged street gang members have been arrested on charges of running of sophisticated drug trafficking operation in the culmination of what officials said was a three-year undercover investigation, authorities announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "Since the investigation began, 38 alleged members of the Latin Kings street gang have been charged and at least 20 individuals - including several men believed to be top leaders - are in custody on drug and weapons charges, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said during a news conference. … The charges are included in 13 separate federal complaints filed or unsealed Tuesday. … 'We pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side,' said Andrew Traver, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the main agency involved in the investigation."

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago (12/6) reports, "Federal agents moved in on the gang on Tuesday. … 'Operation Broken Crown' started when a member of the Southside Latin Kings began cooperating with ATF agents."

Gang Kingpin Among Those Nabbed. The Chicago Tribune (12/6, Coen, Bush) reports, "A Chicago man described by federal authorities as 'the CEO of the Latin Kings Nation on the South Side' was taken into custody early Tuesday, capping a three-year investigation into the operations of the violent street gang." The Tribune continues, "Fernando 'Ace' King was among 18 gang members whose arrests were announced Tuesday by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald. King had the title of 'Supreme Inca,' running the gang's drug empire on the city's South Side and the south suburbs, officials said. There are only a small circle of leaders above him, including Gustavo 'Gino' Colon, the gang's imprisoned head, officials said. … 'It may seem pretty cool to be a Supreme Inca when you're the leader on the street of a gang until the title "Supreme Inca" becomes "lead defendant,"' Fitzgerald said." The Tribune notes, "The Latin Kings operate in seven regions in Chicago, including the southwest and northwest suburbs, authorities said. … King is one of 38 members and associates charged in the case after investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives used wiretaps and undercover drug purchases to crack the gang's operations. He was charged with intent to distribute cocaine as part of 'Operation Broken Crown,' which is billed as the most significant federal effort against the Latin Kings since the takedown of Colon in 1998."

Eight San Francisco Gang Members Sentenced To Prison. Bay City News Wire (12/5) reported, "Eight members of San Francisco's Down Below Gang will spend years in prison after pleading guilty to federal racketeering and drug-dealing charges Monday, according to the U.S. attorney's office. The gang…has been involved in criminal activity such as selling crack cocaine and intimidation for years, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan. … For their crimes, Don Johnson, 20, agreed to 23 years in federal prison; Robert Calloway, 22, agreed to more than 17 years; Dornell Ellis, 25, agreed to almost 16 years; and Ricky Rollins, 21, agreed to 15 years." BCN notes, "The pleas are the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the San Francisco Police Department. Ryan thanked the two organizations in a statement." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/5, Gordon, 384K) added, The four other defendants pleaded guilty to drug-related charges, according to federal prosecutors. They are Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24. Their sentences will range from 21 months to 77 months in federal prison."

New Jersey Gang Member Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison. The Cherry Hill Courier-Post (12/3, Strupczewski) reported, "A Camden gang member who cooperated with federal investigators was sentenced Friday to 10 years in federal prison for his role in a drug trafficking organization, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. U.S. District Judge Freda L. Wolfson said she recognized the need to reward Lamont Powell, also known as 'Mont G,' 29, for his cooperation. Had he not cooperated, Powell would have faced a sentence of anywhere from 30 years to life." The Post noted, "Powell was a member of the 'Tuten Organization,' a notorious drug gang. After his arrest, he cooperated with federal investigators to convict other gang members, including one of the organization's leaders, Leonard Paulk of Camden.

Tandy Notes DEA's Position On Handling Painkiller Cases. In the Orlando Sentinel (12/6), Karen Tandy writes about Dr. Freddie Williams who she says "was diverting so many OxyContin pills to abusers and traffickers that after Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents and our partners arrested him, the street price of OxyContin nearly doubled in the area because of the significantly diminished availability of OxyContin." Tandy adds, "These few doctors cause grave harm and contribute to the alarming prescription-drug-abuse problem in our country. … There is much debate within the medical community about how chronic pain should be treated, how aggressively and with what medications. The DEA doesn't enter into that debate except to ensure the drugs aren't being diverted for illegal purposes as we are required to do by federal law. Doctors need to practice medicine as they have been trained to do and as they are sworn to do: to help their patients. The DEA in turn will do what we are sworn to do: to protect the American public by putting dealers like Williams out of business."

Hearing Set For San Diego Chargers Safety In Cough Syrup Case. On its Web site, KGTV-TV, San Diego (12/5) reports a Feb. 7 preliminary hearing "was set Tuesday for a Chargers player accused of getting codeine-based cough syrup from a friend who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and trying to ship it to his home state of Texas. Terrance Kiel faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of five felony charges…said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine." DEA agents "said they intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the codeine-based cough syrup in June and September. Prosecutors alleged Monday that Hope Devina Vines, 30, was stealing codeine-based cough syrup from her employer, Sharp Rees-Stealy, and giving it to Kiel."

KFMB-TV, San Diego (12/6) reports on its Web site that according to drug enforcement agents, Vines "was arrested Thursday afternoon. She worked at Sharp Rees-Steely in the downtown area, where a large number of bottles of cough syrup were reported missing."

Boxer Suspended After Positive Meth Test. The AP (12/6) reports WBC light flyweight champion Omar Nino "was temporarily suspended Tuesday after testing positive for methamphetamine after last month's title bout, Nevada boxing regulators said. The 30-year-old Mexican fighter retained the 108-pound title Nov. 18 with a majority draw over former champion Brian Viloria of Hawaii. … The Nevada Athletic Commission decided to keep Nino out of the ring until it could hold a formal hearing, probably in January, commission executive director Keith Kizer said."

NFL Player Suspended For Violating Steroid Policy. The AP (12/6) reports New Orleans Saints defensive tackle Hollis Thomas "was suspended yesterday for the final four games of the regular season for violating the NFL's steroid policy. Thomas, supported by the club, appealed the suspension, which he said was caused by asthma medication. He uses an inhaler daily and it apparently contained a banned steroid."

Seattle Officials Concerned About Mounting Gun Violence, Gang Activity. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (12/6, Gutierrez) reports, "The slaying of King County sheriff's Deputy Steve Cox is another harsh reflection of resurging gun violence and gang activity plaguing Seattle and cities around the country, law enforcement officials say." The P-I continues, "Cox was shot and killed early Saturday as he interviewed witnesses in connection with a shooting and beating outside a party at a White Center home. The felon and gang member who apparently shot him, Raymond O. Porter, is thought to have killed another man in SeaTac Friday night. … 'Gang members are more dangerous, they're more armed, than other criminals and that fact alone means we're going to run into more people and things like this,' Sheriff's Sgt. John Urquhart said Monday. … 'But I don't believe (Porter) killed Deputy Cox because he was a gang member. I believe he killed Deputy Cox because he was armed,' Urquhart added." The P-I adds, "Cox's death comes after a year in Seattle in which gun assaults were up by 25 percent, similar to national trends, according to law enforcement. Police say shootings are becoming much too frequent, whether gang-related or not. Even as deputies responded to the gun blasts that killed Cox in White Center, Seattle police were busy Saturday hunting for another shooter in Rainier Valley who wounded another man in an unrelated case. … In October, Seattle police gang detectives lamented in a Seattle P-I story that they had already investigated more gang cases than in all of 2005. An estimated 30 to 60 street gangs are operating in the Seattle area. … The Sheriff's Office does not field a gang unit, which means gangsters pushed out of Seattle likely work their way into the suburbs and unincorporated areas such as White Center, Urquhart said." The P-I notes, "The reasons for the latest surge in violence vary, according to law enforcement and gang experts. Some experts say it's stoked in part by gang-bangers who went to prison in the early 1990s and now are finishing their sentences. … Earlier this year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised $30 million to buttress anti-gang programs nationwide, calling street gangs 'an increasingly deadly threat to the safety and security of our citizens.' Locally, agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives teamed up with Seattle police, the Sheriff's Office, the state Department of Corrections and others to form a Violent Gang Task Force."

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court Restricts Deportation Of Immigrants For State Felonies. The New York Times (12/6, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "rejected the government's interpretation of immigration law on Tuesday, ruling that a noncitizen is not subject to mandatory deportation for a drug crime that, while a felony in the state where the crime was prosecuted, is only a misdemeanor under federal law." The 8-to-1 decision "restored to one category of immigrants, caught in the nearly impenetrable maze where immigration law and criminal law meet, the ability to avoid automatic deportation and the other dire consequences of being guilty of an 'aggravated felony.'" The category is "made up of immigrants convicted of simple drug possession in states that treat those offenses as felonies. Federal law treats possession in most instances as a misdemeanor. But in the government's view, possession when deemed a felony under state law became a 'drug trafficking crime,' which under federal immigration law is an 'aggravated felony' that strips an immigrant of the right to seek relief from automatic deportation, to seek asylum, or ever to return legally to the United States." Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter "said the government's interpretation was based on a strained and implausible reading of the definition of 'drug trafficking crime' in the federal criminal code."

USA Today (12/6, 4A, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the "8-1 decision could affect thousands of permanent legal immigrants, often known as green-card holders, who, because of certain state convictions, face deportation without a chance to plead their case before a judge." The decision, "drawing the dissent of only Justice Clarence Thomas, rejected a position taken by the Bush administration and resolved a split in views among lower courts."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Savage, 850K) reports, "Immigrant-rights lawyers said the resounding 8-1 decision will allow noncitizens who have a family, a job and an otherwise clean record to appeal to immigration judges to stay in this country, despite a drug conviction." Noting

"Humpty Dumpty's use of words to mean whatever he wanted them to mean in author Lewis Carroll's 'Through the Looking-Glass,' the justices said it did not make sense to interpret the words 'aggravated felony' and 'drug trafficking crime' to mean simple drug possession." Justice David H. Souter, "who wrote the opinion, said the government's interpretation was incoherent and is 'just what the English language tells us not to expect, and that result makes us very wary of the government's position.'"

The Washington Post (12/6, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports the "decision came in one of several cases the justices are considering to reconcile conflicting lower-court decisions on when immigrants convicted of crimes must be deported. After announcing yesterday's decision, the court heard arguments in a separate case from California in which a Peruvian immigrant was convicted on car theft charges."

The AP (12/6, Yost) reports, "The issue before the Supreme Court was the interpretation of the federal Immigration and Nationality Act, which says immigrants found guilty of aggravated felonies are subject to deportation. … Conduct that is a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under the Controlled Substances Act is not a felony for purposes of immigration, stated the ruling by Justice David Souter. … Jose Antonio Lopez, a 16-year permanent U.S. resident, was deported to Mexico in January 2006, but could return to his wife and two children, who are U.S. citizens, one of his lawyers has said. … Even then, Lopez, who had operated a grocery store in Sioux Falls, S.D., still could face deportation, but an immigration judge would have discretion to allow him to remain in the United States." The AP adds, "In opposing the immigrant's legal position, the Bush administration said that Congress left the door open to counting state felonies as felonies under the federal Controlled Substances Act, which would make them a crime that could trigger deportation under the Immigration and Nationality Act."

Democrats May Plan Crack Down On Illegal Immigrants' Employers. The Hill (12/6, Joseph, Cusack) reports the "selection of Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) to head the Intelligence Committee may be an indication that Democrats will press the Bush administration to crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants." Reyes, "a former Border Patrol agent, is one of the most outspoken proponents of enforcing these types of employer sanctions and appears to have an ally in Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who will be the House caucus chairman next year." In a previous interview, Emanuel said "many Democrats want to focus on employer sanctions as a way to stem illegal immigration. He accused the White House and the Republican-led Congress for letting 'its guard down when it comes to employer sanctions.'"

TAX:

DOJ's California Tax Probe Ensnares Nebraskans. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (12/6, Lindenberger) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is seeking a preliminary injunction against California accountant Lowell Baisden, who is currently under investigation for promoting an illegal tax fraud scheme." The Telegraph continues, "The motion, which was filed Nov. 29 in U.S. District Court, asks for a preliminary injunction to prevent Baisden from preparing any federal tax returns for his clients and from representing them before the IRS." The Telegraph adds, "Court documents indicate seven North Platte practitioners have been investigated by the IRS in connection with Baisden's scheme. They are doctors Michael Trierweiler, Chris Johng and Walter and Deborah Weaver, along with anesthetist Burt McKeag and nurse anesthetists Evan Geilenkirchen and Kathryn Snoozy. … According to the court records, Baisden helped his clients set up phony corporations to significantly reduce their tax liabilities. He also allegedly prepared their tax returns to perpetuate his scheme. Many of these clients were referred to Baisden by his brother-in-law, Michael Koning, a former North Platte anesthesiologist now living in Montana." The Telegraph notes, "The tax scheme allegedly involves creating sham corporations to which the client's income is assigned. Baisden would then allegedly claim large illegal deductions for non-deductible personal expenses. The remaining income would then be reported as royalty or rental income, which is not subject to self-employment and social security taxes. … According to the complaint from the Justice Department, 'several of Baisden's former customers have sought new representation, filed the past-due returns and conceded that the tax returns filed by Baisden are incorrect.'"

DOJ Turns Over Bank Documents To Attorneys In KPMG Suit. The New York Times (12/6, Browning) reports, "Federal prosecutors who are investigating Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters have been turning over internal bank documents to lawyers defending former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a separate criminal case." The Times continues, "The providing of the Deutsche Bank documents, which began in earnest earlier this year and has accelerated in recent months, was disclosed in a court filing late Monday by John M. Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the case against the indicted KPMG employees. His office is also overseeing the investigation of Deutsche Bank." The Times adds, "The judge in the KPMG case, Lewis A. Kaplan of United States District Court in Manhattan, had previously criticized prosecutors for tardy production of evidence. The trial of the 16 former KPMG employees had been scheduled to begin in January, but last month Judge Kaplan postponed it indefinitely, citing concerns that the defendants, who include an outside lawyer and investment adviser, would not be able to pay their legal bills." The Times notes, "In his filing, Mr. Hillebrecht wrote that prosecutors were turning over the Deutsche Bank documents in part because the Deutsche Bank case had 'substantial overlap' with the KPMG employees case, which prosecutors call the largest criminal tax case ever. .. .Mr. Hillebrecht also disclosed that prosecutors had asked Deutsche Bank to provide additional assistance with the documents for the defendants in the KPMG case, in which Jeffrey Stein, a former KPMG executive, is the lead defendant."

IRS Tries To Seal Gaps In State Business Laws. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (12/6), Tom Herman writes, "Escalating its assault on cheating, the Internal Revenue Service is turning up the heat on tax dodgers who conceal taxable income by exploiting gaps in state business-formation laws that allow hidden ownership or control." Herman continues, "The IRS is focusing on individuals or small groups whose tools include use of corporations, trusts, partnerships, limited liability companies and other types of business structures. Some people may form a company, conceal their ownership and use it to claim phony expenses, an IRS official says. Other cases involve outright fraud. IRS officials say some people have created sham, one-person, tax-exempt religious corporations to dodge taxes." Herman adds, "Officials say the problem appears to be particularly severe in Nevada, where recent investigations into promoters of corporations there have turned up widespread abuses. As a result, the IRS has begun expanding the number of audits of people involved in forming Nevada corporations, says Steven Burgess, director of examination for the IRS's Small Business/Self-Employed Division. … The IRS also is considering additional investigations of promoters, Mr. Burgess said at a recent Senate hearing. Even if promoters aren't guilty of wrongdoing, their client lists could be valuable in unearthing evidence of cheating, he said." Herman notes, "For years, law-enforcement officials have expressed concern about widespread use of offshore tax havens to hide or shelter taxable income. But now IRS officials and senators are also focusing on the exploitation of onshore havens. … While laws vary from state to state, a report earlier this year by the U.S. Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative arm, said most states don't require companies or third-party agents representing them to disclose ownership information when companies are being formed or in periodic reports."

WSJournal Proposes Scrapping IRS Code, Keeping AMT. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Fans of political irony will appreciate that Democrats in Congress are saying they now want to address the 'wealth gap' even as they deplore and want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, or AMT. It was a previous crusade against the wealthy that created the AMT. Haven't we learned anything about the perils of tax policy rooted in political envy?" Somehow, Democrats "never raised a peep over the years when the AMT was whacking mostly Republican voters. But the tax has now become the monster that ate Marin County, to pick just one of the blue state redoubts where the AMT hits especially hard. This year it will strike four million Americans, and next year without a change in law it will snare 23 million -- one in four tax filers." The "latest data indicate that the eight states with the highest percentage of tax filers subject to the AMT all voted heavily Democratic in 2004 and 2006 -- including Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Rhode Island. Those voters are now screaming for relief, and the question for Democrats is where they'll find the money. Eliminating the AMT would cost about $50 billion for one year and $1.2 trillion over 10 years, according to the Treasury Department." The journal proposes a "possible deal between the Bush Administration and the Pelosi Democrats: Junk the IRS code and use the AMT as the basis for tax reform. The AMT provides at least the crude framework for a much simpler tax code, because it eliminates almost all deductions and special interest carve-outs. It requires only about one-tenth as many tax forms as the regular code. It has a broad tax base and only two tax rates, 26% and 28%."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Meet With Blue Dogs, New Democrats. The Hill (12/6, Hearn) reports, "President Bush has invited leaders of the conservative Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House Friday to discuss areas of 'mutual cooperation' in the words of one Democratic Congressional aide. The outreach comes at a time when Bush's image on Capitol Hill and around the country has taken a serious beating." Reps. Alan Boyd, Dennis Moore and Mike Ross will represent the Blue Dogs, and Reps. Joe Crowley), Artur Davis, Ron Kind, Adam Smith and Ellen Tauscher are set to represent the New Democrats.

Lawmakers Seen As Unlikely Replacements For Bolton. The Hill (12/6, Schor) reports that as President Bush begins vetting candidates to succeed UN Ambassador John Bolton, "as many as five departing lawmakers have surfaced as players in the Beltway's nominations guessing game." Iowa Rep. Jim Leach said he is "flattered and honored by the bipartisan effort on his behalf but is making other plans for his future," spokesman Gregory Wierzynski said. Another "surprise on several U.N. shortlists" is Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), but he is reportedly "leaning toward taking an academic or policy position after leaving the Hill." In addition, former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell told CNN yesterday that Bush would seek to replace Bolton with a Republican.

Missed Opportunities Seen In 4th Circuit Vacancies. The Legal Times (12/6, Schwartz) reports, "Chief Judge William Wilkins, who has presided over the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the past four years, sent President George W. Bush a letter last week announcing his plans to step down in June. … Though Wilkins, a South Carolina native who will turn 65 in March, will still hear cases as a senior judge, his quasi-retirement creates a fourth official vacancy on the 15-member bench. (Technically, there are five openings, but Judge H. Emory Widener Jr., who announced plans to retire in 2003, has pledged to stay active until the nominee for his seat -- Defense Department general counsel William Haynes II -- is confirmed.)" The Times continues, "The large number of vacancies during a Republican administration is particularly striking given the 4th Circuit's reputation as one of the most stalwart conservative courts in the nation. The circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and North and South Carolina, also is the key appellate arena for the administration's terrorism cases, largely prosecuted in the Eastern District of Virginia. … 'You'd think they'd want to fill them and fill them as quickly as possible,' says Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law." The Times adds, "Though the Bush administration has tried to fill a few open seats, it has faced stiff opposition even during the Republican-controlled Congress. U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle's nomination to the 4th Circuit has languished since 2001, and senators have blocked Haynes' confirmation over questions about his involvement with the Justice Department's infamous "torture memo." It's unlikely the administration will fare any better under the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress."

Administration Withdraws "Open Skies" Plan. USA Today/AP (12/6, 7B, Sniffen) reports, "Already rebuffed by a Republican-controlled Congress, the Bush administration on Tuesday withdrew its plan to give foreign investors more management control of US airlines." Announced yesterday by Transportation Secretary Mary Peters, "the decision follows a department review of public comments about the proposal, and votes by the Senate and House this year to prevent the plan from going forward. 'It was clear from reviewing the comments that the department needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits of allowing more international investment,' Peters said in a statement."

The Financial Times (12/6) reports the Administration is "bowing to pressure from Congress, labour unions and airlines," while the Wall Street Journal (12/6, A8, Meckler, 2.04M) says the move "underscored the rising protectionist sentiments in Congress and throughout the country." It "will have an impact on negotiations over a long-sought agreement that would allow U.S. and European airlines to fly without restrictions across the Atlantic." The Journal adds, "The 'open skies' agreement also would provide greater access to London's popular Heathrow airport for US carriers. Europeans had said they wouldn't finalize that agreement if the US doesn't liberalize the foreign-investment rules on US airline operations.

Republicans Lay "Legislative Landmines" For Democrats As They Postpone Spending. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A8, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Like a retreating army, Republicans are tearing up railroad track and planting legislative land mines to make it harder for Democrats to govern when they take power in Congress next month. Already, the Republican leadership has moved to saddle the new Democratic majority with responsibility for resolving $463 billion in spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. … The unstated goal is to disrupt the Democratic agenda and make it harder for the new majority to meet its promise to reinstitute 'pay-as-you-go' budget rules, under which new costs or tax cuts must be offset to protect the deficit from growing." The Journal adds, "The collapse of the appropriations process will be felt soon in the Justice and Commerce departments, food-safety agencies and veterans' health care."

The Hill (12/6, McCormack) reports, "As time runs out in the Congress, politics can trump policy in deciding which bills become law. Even if a bill has more than enough support to pass if brought to the floor, powerful members and long-held vendettas can determine a bill's fate. Some lawmakers file discharge petitions to get their bills out of committee, trying to attach their legislation to appropriations bills or wage last-ditch efforts to get their objectives pushed through." The Hill cites several examples of stalled bills, including WI8 Rep. Mark Green's (R) bill to "crack down on abuses against animals," which has 324 cosponsors; PA3 Rep. Phil English's (R) bill to "repeal Medicare's outpatient therapy caps;" and CA51 Rep. Bob Filner's (D) proposal "that would allow World War II Merchant Marines and Naval and Army transportation personnel to be eligible for benefits."

Republican Leaders Won't Allow Vote On DC House Member. The Washington Post (12/6, B10, Sheridan, Woodlee, 690K) reports, "Republican congressional leaders decided yesterday not to bring to the floor a bill giving the District a full voting member of the House, dooming the measure's chances in this legislative session." GOP Rep. Thomas M. Davis, "the bill's author, had appealed to his party's leadership to cram in a vote during Congress's lame-duck session, which could end as soon as Thursday. But in a closed-door meeting, House leaders rejected the request." The Washington Times (12/6, Emerling, 88K) notes "the DC Voting Rights Act would give the overwhelmingly Democratic District a full vote in the House and create a fourth House seat for predominantly Republican Utah."

The New York Times (12/6, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "A spokesman for the chief backer of the plan, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said Mr. Davis would push for reconsideration. Failing that, the spokesman said, Mr. Davis would reintroduce the package in the next Congress, which the Democrats will lead."

GOP Majority Ends "With A Legislative Whimper." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Levey, Simon, 850K) reports, "Twelve years after Republicans stormed into power on Capitol Hill with ambitious plans for action on energy exploration, abortion and other key issues, the GOP wraps up its run at the helm this week with a legislative whimper." The Times adds, "With Democrats slated to take control of Congress in January, proposals to expand oil drilling and reduce abortions are unlikely to see the light of day during the next two years. Instead, they will join other mainstays of the Republican agenda — such as abolishing the estate tax, limiting medical malpractice lawsuits and banning gay marriages — on the legislative sidelines. GOP lawmakers express resignation as they contemplate seeing many of their cherished goals consigned to oblivion, replaced by priorities near and dear to the hearts of Democrats.

Incoming House Chairmen Jostle Over Committee Structures, Jurisdiction. The Hill (12/6, Bolton) reports, "Incoming Democratic House committee chairmen" are "edging toward a turf war" between themselves and with the Senate as they press "to reverse structural changes made to their panels by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and other Republican leaders." Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has said there will not likely be any changes of jurisdiction between committees."

"Seniority Ruled" In Selection of First Committee Chairmen. The Hill (12/6, Hearn) reports, "As expected, seniority ruled the first round of selections for House committee chairmen yesterday afternoon, despite Democratic leaders' repeated insistence that seniority would be only one of many factors weighed in choosing panel leaders. In the first of what will be many decisions the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee will make in coming weeks, the panel met to select the chairmen of four 'exclusive' committees: Appropriations, Ways and Means, Energy and Commerce and Financial Services. The leader of the fifth exclusive committee, Rules, is appointed by House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Although the results of yesterday's meeting were expected — Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) will chair Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) Energy and Commerce and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) Financial Services — the gathering raised an obvious question among House Democrats: whether committee chairmen would cooperate with Democratic leaders or whether some would chart their own course on certain issues."

Black Caucus Members Hold Key Chairmanships In Next Congress. The Washington Times (12/6, DeBose, 88K) reports, "The Congressional Black Caucus today will announce its leadership team and agenda for the 110th Congress with Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, the group's chairman, expected to refocus on urban and poverty issues." The Times says she "could be one of the most effective CBC chairman in 20 years because many caucus members are likely to lead key House committees -- Judiciary, Homeland Security, Administration, and Ways and Means." The Times adds, "Almost every piece of legislation that Democrats bring to the House floor will have to pass the approval of a CBC member. The group, composed of Democrats, also will benefit from almost 17 subcommittee chairmanships and former CBC Chairman James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, as the House majority whip." MO5 Rep. Emmanuel Cleaver (D), one of the caucus's incoming vice chairmen, "said he soon expects the group to announce its legislative agenda for the first 100 hours of Congress to go in tandem with the issues House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has said will be done in that time."

Republicans Hold To Term Limits For Minority Committee Heads. The Hill (12/6, O'Connor) reports, "Republicans renewed their six-year term limits on top committee posts yesterday, dealing a blow to three outgoing chairmen who lobbied for a rules change to head their respective panels in the minority. … Republicans are set to decide which members will head select panels during Steering Committee meetings today and tomorrow, and members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) will also decide their next chairman in a bruising race between Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.)."

Democrats Divided On Extent Of Promised Ethics Overhaul. USA Today (12/6, 6A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "Less than a month after sweeping into office on the promise of a major ethics overhaul, Democrats are divided over just how much change is needed." Several Democrats, "citing the corruption scandals that beset Congress in the past year, want tougher standards than their leaders have proposed. The major points of contention: Whether lawmakers should police themselves and how much to clamp down on earmarks, the special projects that lawmakers, often anonymously, insert into spending bills to benefit hometown or special interests." Sen. Joe Lieberman "was among a small, bipartisan coalition of lawmakers who on Tuesday promised a broad array of changes. Specifically, they backed the creation of an Office of Public Integrity to launch and carry out ethics probes. That power now resides with the House and Senate ethics committees, which the lawmakers slammed as failing to act on corruption charges." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has pledged to make changes to ethics rules the first order of business when the new Congress convenes. Under a proposal she unveiled this year, Democrats would eliminate a wide array of lobbying practices — from banning lobbyist-funded travel and gifts to barring former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and the members-only gym. The proposal would require greater public disclosure of some earmarks."

Liberal Coalition To Unleash PR Campaign For Democratic Agenda. The Washington Post (12/6, A6, Birnbaum, 690K) reports a "large group of liberal organizations is planning to wage a national lobbying and public relations campaign to press for passage of the House Democrats' legislative agenda next year, taking a page from longtime corporate practices." The Change America Now coalition, "or CAN, met yesterday at AFL-CIO headquarters to outline the many methods it will use -- including the release of research papers and e-mail and phone bombardment of Congress." The goal is "to persuade on-the-fence lawmakers in more than 80 congressional districts to vote for the 'Hundred Hours' agenda, a list of legislation that Democrats hope to approve in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress. The agenda includes an increase in the minimum wage and an effort to reduce the cost of Medicare prescription drugs." The campaign "will largely target Republican moderates and Republicans who were narrowly elected in November."

Democrats Plan Longer Congressional Work Week. The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Layton, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "labor issue most on the minds of members of Congress yesterday was their own: They will have to work five days a week starting in January. The horror." Incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, who is "writing the schedule for the next Congress, said members should expect longer hours than the brief week they have grown accustomed to." Hoyer told reporters, "I have bad news for you. Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the 4th." The Post adds, "For lawmakers, it is awful, compared with what they have come to expect. For much of this election year, the legislative week started late Tuesday and ended by Thursday afternoon -- and that was during the relatively few weeks the House wasn't in recess." Hoyer said that in 2007, "members of the House will be expected in the Capitol for votes each week by 6:30 p.m. Monday and will finish their business about 2 p.m. Friday." With the "new calendar, the Democrats are trying to project a businesslike image when they take control of Congress in January. House and Senate Democratic leaders have announced an ambitious agenda for their first 100 hours and say they are adamant about scoring legislative victories they can trumpet in the 2008 campaigns."

The Washington Times (12/6, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that with Republicans "on Capitol Hill trying to spend like Democrats and Democrats trying to be as tough as Republicans in the war on terror, the grand difference between the two parties may come down to a matter of scheduling, reports Charles Hurt of The Washington Times." Republicans "prefer to keep lawmakers out of Washington, since that's usually where they do all the damage, and Democrats want members chained to their desks so they can churn out innumerable pages of new federal laws."

Lawmakers Ask GAO Administrator To Halt Plan To Privatize Auditing. The Washington Post (12/6, A9, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports, "Three federal lawmakers yesterday called on the new administrator of the General Services Administration to halt her plan to replace government auditors in the agency's inspector general's office with private auditors, saying in a letter that the change could lead to less oversight of contractors. The letter to GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan followed a report in The Washington Post on Saturday that described Doan's plans to cut $5 million in spending on audits and shift responsibility for contract reviews to small, private contractors."

State Department Honors Employees' Charitable Works Overseas. The Washington Post (12/6, A23, Williamson, 690K) reports on Tuesday "five State Department employees and spouses were recognized for charitable works abroad -- and two of them were men." This year's "uber-volunteers" included spouses, full-timers or both serving in posts in Afghanistan, South Korea, the Dominican Republic, Swaziland and Greece.

Marcus Suggests Bipartisan "Clinton-McCain" Panel To Address Social Security. In her column in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), Ruth Marcus writes, "I have high hopes for the Clinton-McCain Commission to Fix Social Security. Haven't heard of it? Actually, neither have Hillary Clinton and John McCain. It's my long-shot scheme for tackling the problem." She writes, "The political system right now is too broken, and relations between President Bush and congressional Democrats too frayed, to deal with the truly daunting entitlement issues, Medicare and Medicaid. Social Security is entitlement reform on training wheels. … As the front-runners for their parties' presidential nominations, Sens. Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) have a shared interest in getting Social Security off the presidential plate before January 2009." Marcus adds, "The president should issue an order creating the commission, announce, LBJ-style, that he wants Clinton and McCain at the helm, and impose a tight deadline -- six months at most. … Then he should set up the commission in a way that's doubly tilted against him."

WPost Repeats Call For Senate To Require Electronic Campaign-Finance Reports. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/6, A24, 690K) notes that three years ago, it "decried the senseless and costly loophole under which people running for the Senate -- alone among federal political candidates and committees -- aren't required to file campaign finance reports electronically. In an age when such reports can be filed with the click of a mouse, Senate candidates submit their disclosures on paper, with weeks of delay before they are transferred to a form available and searchable on the Internet." The Post writes, "Three years later, the situation remains unaddressed. … It would be easy to change the rule, and the Senate should do so in the final days of the 109th Congress."

Senate GOP Criticized For Backing Schumer New York Project. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "You would think the last thing Senate Republicans would want to do in their final lame-duck days this week is approve a new $682 million subsidy gift to Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat who just cleaned their electoral clocks." GOP tax writers "are preparing to award Mr. Schumer this money for 'transportation infrastructure projects.' One of the projects to be funded: a new train from Manhattan to John F. Kennedy Airport. Why people in Oshkosh or Olympia should have to pay for this urban choochoo is a mystery." What "makes this project especially objectionable is the creative financing conjured up to pay for it. This earmark hangs like a Christmas ornament from a must-pass bill to extend certain annual tax credits. And how's this for a misnomer? The subsidy is called the 'New York Liberty Zone Tax Credit.'" The result is "a new $2 billion hole in the budget. Our Congressional sources say this is the first time this kind of tax credit has been provided for a city or state to pay for infrastructure pork."

OTHER NEWS:

Reports Paint Mixed Picture Of US Economy. The Washington Post (12/6, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The US economy can't seem to make up its mind. It keeps showing strength and weakness, with fresh data yesterday providing still more mixed signals -- and fueling a debate over whether the housing slump is dragging the nation into a recession." The "conflicting data could be a sign that the economy is turning, with what was at first a mild growth slowdown about to give way to a harsher downturn, some analysts said." But "others echoed the Federal Reserve, countering that the worst news is still coming from businesses involved in housing and automobile production while the rest of the economy is holding up." The Post adds, "The situation has left many investors confused and queasy; stock prices rose yesterday after falling Friday, as did the dollar." The "pessimists could point yesterday to the Commerce Department's report that new orders to U.S. factories fell 4.7 percent in October, the steepest decline in six years. … But optimists noted that the much larger service sector of the economy -- which includes health care, finance, education, travel and entertainment, accounting for 87 percent of the nation's economic output -- grew more briskly in November than in the month before, according to an index published yesterday by the Institute for Supply Management."

The Washington Times (12/6, 88K) reports "activity in services accelerated in November, indicating that the economy was able to shake off the effects of a deep housing slump more easily than many economists expected, according to a report from the Institute for Supply Management. The rise in the institute's service index to 58.9 from 57.1 in October contrasted with a fall into recession territory in the organization's closely watched manufacturing index reported on Friday, and provided a positive offset to a spate of weak economic news last week. … Many economists had expected the services index to decline to 55.5. Readings above 50 indicate an expansion in industries such as retailing, banking and construction." But "manufacturing remains a question mark."

The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A6, Conkey, 2.04M) says "US labor costs have been rising at a much slower rate this year than previously thought, suggesting the nation's tight labor market is less likely to stoke inflation in the months ahead." The Labor Department "reported yesterday that unit labor costs in the nonfarm business sector -- a measure of how much employees are paid to produce a single unit of output -- rose at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, considerably less than its earlier estimate of 3.8%. In addition, the department said unit labor costs fell at a 2.4% rate during the second quarter, rather than growing at the originally estimated 5.4% pace."

The Wall Street Journal (12/6, lp, 2.04M) also reports, "Federal Reserve officials -- unlike bond investors -- think the economy is a lot sounder today than at the end of 2000 and in early 2001, when the Fed abruptly reversed course and began a string of interest-rate cuts. Yet Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's effort to convey the message that today's conditions are different is hampered by the Fed's lack of candor back in 2000." Fed officials, "who have universally voiced concerns about inflation, are expected to keep short-term interest rates steady at 5.25% at their policy meeting next Tuesday. But bond markets have priced in a small chance of a rate cut next week and three one-quarter percentage-point cuts over the next 12 months." Markets "anticipate those cuts in part because they see parallels to 2000."

Dow Nears New High. USA Today (12/6, 6B, 2.27M) reports, "The Standard & Poor's 500 index scored its second-consecutive six-year high Tuesday after a report showing unexpected strength in the key services sector renewed optimism about corporate profit growth. The benchmark S&P added 5.64 points, or 0.4%, to 1414.76 for its highest close since Nov. 7, 2000. The S&P now is up 13.3% this year. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points, or 0.4%, to 12,331.60, which is just 11 points from a new all-time high. The Dow is up 15.1% this year. The Nasdaq composite remained the relative laggard, rising 3.99 points, or 0.2%, to 2452.38 for an 11.2% 2006 gain." The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports on the stocks markets under the headline "Upbeat Data Lift Street's Spirits; Stocks Climb."

US Manufacturing Seen As Thriving. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 6, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With all the reports about American jobs being shipped overseas and so many US industries taking a real beating, our next story may surprise you. Because it turns out American manufacturing is still the envy of the world." CBS (Regan) added, "They're part of the American landscape... Caterpillar, or Cat, is the number one maker of tractors and earth-moving machines all over the world. So when Panama wants to expand its canal, it turns to Cat. And when China mines nickel, Cat again. CEO Jim Owens says the company ships $9 billion worth of machines overseas every year. What surprises you the most about how Americans perceive manufacturing here in the US?" James Owens, CEO Cat: "I guess it surprises me that Americans thinks we're losing." Regan: "We're not. Last year, America produced $1.79 trillion worth of goodies, almost twice as much as second-place Japan. The key to success in factories like this comes down to one thing -- a steady increase in worker productivity. In other words, it's not your grandparents' assembly line. Every year for the last decade, American workers have increased manufacturing productivity by more than 4%. And it's because of employees like Jack Morgenstern. He figured out how to take minutes off parts distribution on Cat's engine line in Peoria, Illinois." Jack Morgenstern: "I would say there's at least 25 to 30 parts that each assembler uses at each station. So my idea was to coordinate them in the kits where the first assembler would not have to reach for anything, they could tame them off the top." Regan: "That idea has resulted in two more engines a day." Owens: "We're more competitive with our manufacturing in the United States than we were 15 or 20 years ago because we've broken through a lot of those hurdle where's people had tightly-defined jobs and didn't work together." Regan: "Caterpillar's products are the number one or two best sellers on every continent, proving that made in the USA is a very valuable label."

US Dollar's Slide Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Trumbull, 59K) analyzes the effects of a US dollar slide, pointing that "prices are rising for foreign goods, but a falling greenback could help balance the world economy and fix America's trade deficit. … A weaker dollar, over time, could help the world economy become better balanced -- with America less reliant on borrowing and Asia less dependent on exports to fuel development. But currency realignment also holds risks. It would impose some hardship on Americans, and on the many nations that sell goods to them. A sudden shift could jolt US consumers with higher prices at a time when some economists worry about a possible recession." In an editorial, the New York Times (12/6, 1.16M) says that "the great unknowables are the timing and steepness of a sustained dollar decline. Over the past few years, investors who bet on a weakening dollar have lost money." But "the current swoon is a reminder that no nation, even the United States, can borrow forever without facing up to economic consequences. The government has been assuming -- correctly, so far -- that the United States is too big to fail. Administration officials seem confident that the Chinese, in particular, will continue to finance the nation's deficits, because doing so helps their exports. They also assume that China and other countries won't sell off chunks of their huge dollar holdings, lest they drive the dollar down, and with it, the value of their remaining dollar-based assets."

Jennings Presses Case For Challenge In Florida's 13th CD. Roll Call (12/6, McArdle) reports it "could be well into the 110th Congress before a Member from Florida's 13th district is seated by the House — and the next several weeks could prove to be explosive as the fight plays out in the courts and on Capitol Hill." Democrat bank executive Christine Jennings "is in Washington, D.C., this week, meeting with party leaders and drumming up financial support as she continues to dispute the results that appeared to hand auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) a 369-vote victory." Although Jennings "already has filed suit in a Florida circuit court seeking a revote, she said in an interview Tuesday that she also intends to contest the result with the House Administration Committee — which has oversight over federal elections — by the Dec. 20 deadline. Jennings and her attorneys already have met with Democratic staff members from the committee to discuss the filing process." Jennings said she "still held out hope that the Florida courts might order a revote for the entire 13th district or just in Sarasota County, where Jennings insists malfunctions with the electronic voting machines produced 18,000 undervotes — and changed the outcome of the election." Filing an "official protest with the House Administration Committee will automatically make the Jennings/Buchanan case one of the first indicators of just how partisan the 110th Congress will be, and observers won't even have to wait until the new year to begin to see the fissures."

The Hill (12/6, Blake) reports Jennings was "in Washington over the last two days renewing her call for a revote in her race against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), as government and independent reviews failed to support her case." Jennings said she "would do everything she could to see the legal challenge through. She set up shop at Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee headquarters and was to meet with lawmakers including Reps. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) and Rush Holt (D-N.J.). She was also asking for financial support and continuing to push her case to the news media." Jennings's visit "came as state officials continued their audit of the touch-screen voting machines in Sarasota County, where an abnormally high number of ballots cast were 'undervotes,' meaning they failed to register votes in the congressional race for the 13th District." The audit has "yet to produce any evidence of machine errors, and a review by a local newspaper published Tuesday points to ballot design as the leading cause of the undervotes."

House Urged To Declare 13th CD Vacant, Requiring Special Election. In a Roll Call op-ed (12/6), Richard L. Hasen of the Loyola Law School says, "The elections last month brought us the 2006 version of the butterfly ballot. This time, it appears that poor ballot design or machine malfunctions with electronic voting machines caused thousands of voters to skip the race for Florida's 13th Congressional district, leading to a 369-vote victory by the Republican candidate over the Democratic one. Once again the matter is in court, and once again the courts are not likely to give a remedy. But this time there's another option. The House can — and should — declare the seat vacant, requiring the seat to be filled by a special election."

Mail Voting Seen As Alternative To Flawed Election Process. In a New York Times op-ed (12/6), Ruth Goldway, a commissioner on the Postal Rate Commission, says that on election day, there was "one state where all went well: Oregon, where everyone votes by mail. Since Oregon adopted Vote by Mail as its sole voting option in 1998, the state's turnout has increased, concerns about fraud have decreased, a complete paper trail exists for every election, recounts are non-controvertible and both major political parties have gained voters. Moreover, in doing away with voting machines, polling booths, precinct captains and election workers, the state estimates that it saves up to 40 percent over the cost of a traditional election. Vote by Mail could offer real advantages if it were adopted nationwide."

Jefferson's Fate To Be Decided In Runoff For Louisiana's 2nd CD. USA Today (12/6, 8A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago." Now, the "weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer." Democratic Rep. William Jefferson "has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime. In an open primary election last month, he placed first with 30% of the vote. None of the 13 candidates got a majority, so he faces Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter in a runoff election Saturday." Jefferson has been "outraised financially and was stripped of his most powerful committee assignment by Democratic leaders, but few here count him out." If Carter "wins, Jefferson will be the only Democrat to lose his seat this year for any reason."

Vilsack Sees Energy Security As Key'08 Issue. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Feldmann, 59K) reports on outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's appearance at a Monitor breakfast. Vilsack "knows he's a long shot. He says so. But he has an answer to the inevitable question: How does an obscure Midwestern governor get past the Hillary Rodham Clinton juggernaut and now 'Obama-mania,' as the junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, also considers a run?" Vilsack said, "You have to work longer, and you have to work smarter, and that's what we intend to do." There is "nothing flashy about Vilsack," and when "asked about Obama-style charisma, he countered with his own version: 'There is a quiet charisma,' he said, a charisma that causes voters to say 'he's authentic and real and has done well.'" Vilsack also "notes that among the dozen or so other Democrats who may run for president, only two are candidates from west of the Mississippi River and are governors: himself and Bill Richardson of New Mexico." A "signature issue for Vilsack will be energy security."

USA Today (12/6, 8A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Gov. Vilsack "pitched energy independence as a path to security, jobs and health Tuesday." Vilsack "is one of several Democrats staking their cases on executive experience, appeal beyond the usual Democratic states and voters, or both." At a lunch "with journalists from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service, Vilsack struck themes meant to help him stand out in a group that includes Bayh, son of former senator Birch Bayh; former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a former Energy secretary." Vilsack said "energy security is a cause 'with extraordinary opportunity to unite this country.'"

The Washington Times (12/6, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Vilsack said "he doesn't fear any of his fellow Democrats considering a run for president in 2008 and is happy to run as an underdog, even in his home state's important caucus." Vilsack said, "I respect everyone who is running, but I don't fear anyone." The Times adds that in "a meeting with reporters in Washington yesterday, however, the governor most frequently returned to criticism of Sen. John McCain and the Arizona Republican's call for increasing troop levels in Iraq." Vilsack said, "I don't believe he's exercised particularly good judgment."

Clinton Taking "Concrete Steps" Toward 2008 Run. The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Balz, Cillizza, 690K) reports in a front page story that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "is taking a series of concrete steps toward a likely campaign for president in 2008, settling on key members of her campaign team, recruiting potential new additions to her staff, and calling Democratic activists in states with early primaries and caucuses." Sources "knowledgeable about her thinking" said "no final decision on running is expected before the end of the year." Clinton is working "methodically through a checklist of preparatory steps," and "she and her inner circle are already ramping up for what could be a history-making bid for the White House." The "latest move is the choice of longtime adviser Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager. That follows the recent recruitment of three seasoned political operatives who, if she runs, would play key roles on what is now a rapidly expanding Clinton campaign organization." Clinton is "operating on a model she used before she decided to run for the Senate in 2000." Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson said, "If you want to understand the process she is going through now, you need only look at the process she went through in 1999. In that race, she reached out to elected officials, to potential donors [and] to policy experts and had lengthy serious meetings about whether she should run, the issues before the country, [and] what a campaign would look like."

The Washington Times (12/6, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Speculation about the presidential plans of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has reached a fevered pitch this week as newspapers and Web sites scramble to be the first with the big headline that the former first lady will run." Clinton spokeswoman Lorraine Voles said Clinton "certainly…is actively weighing whether to run for president in 2008." Voles said, "After her election, she said she was going to look at this. As part of that process, she has been making some phone calls."

Obama Boomlet Seen As Driving Force Behind Clinton's Renewed Effort. NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 3, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A funny thing, if you listen to Democrats, happened on" Hillary Clinton's "cakewalk to presumptive Democratic Party nominee status this next election and that person was Barack Obama. Is that what is behind this accelerated talk of Senator Clinton as the Democratic candidate?" NBC (Russert) added, "Is it ever. Since October 22, when Barack Obama said he may in fact seek the nomination in '08, Hillary Clinton realizes she cannot let a vacuum be created because Obama was filling it. That's why she had to reach out to African-American New York Democrats, quickly, because she knew they would be very receptive to Obama. Brian, Obama is going to New Hampshire this Sunday. He's been in Iowa twice. Hillary Clinton on the phone -- where? To Iowa and to New Hampshire. She cannot afford to sit back and wait until February or March. The Iowa caucuses are 57 weeks away. Every day counts. She had to move."

Morris Says Clinton Can Win, But She Would Be A "Disaster." In his column in The Hill (12/6), Dick Morris says Sen. Clinton "definitely can win … and probably will. She is uniquely able to expand the electorate to bring in millions of women, mostly single, who will vote overwhelmingly for a female Democrat." The "enthusiasm that will grip many Americans — women in particular — at the cultural implications of a woman president will probably sweep through the primaries and cause many to overlook Hillary's flaws and dismiss her defects. The generic of a woman candidate will prove so attractive that millions of voters will overcome their objections to the specific person who is running." Clinton's "mastery of the establishment of the Democratic Party, her vast lead among ex-officio delegates — many of whom have received campaign contributions from her coffers — and the celebrity draw of her ex-president husband will prove hard for a mere mortal to overcome. But should she win? No way!" Those who "know both Hillary and Bill well and are willing to speak frankly in public realize the fundamental differences between the two and grasp how his abilities are the counterpoints to her defects." He "made a very good domestic-policy president. She would be a disaster at home and abroad."

Bayh Files Paperwork For '08 Exploratory Committee. USA Today (12/6, 8A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Evan Bayh "filed papers to raise money for the Democratic nomination." Bayh "said he is moving toward a 2008 race because America needs to 'get back on the path to greatness.' The former two-term governor will be in Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio and New Hampshire this week."

Edwards Hires Bonior For Possible Presidential Bid. Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Hume) reported, "Former Democratic vice presidential candidate, John Edwards has not announced that he will run for president in 2008, but he has hired former Democratic Congressman David Bonior to manage his campaign if there is one. Bonior has close ties to labor unions. Since leaving Congress, he has been a professor of labor studies at Wayne State University in Detroit and chairman of an organization that promotes workers' rights to unionize."

The Washington Times (12/6, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that "an Edwards adviser said last week that Mr. Bonior will manage the effort if Mr. Edwards decides to run. In the meantime, Mr. Bonior has signed on as a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards' leadership PAC, the One America Committee, the Associated Press reports."

McCain's Mother Hurt At Son's Holiday Party. Roll Call (12/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that the "most popular guest at Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) bustling media-and-money holiday party Monday night wound up in the hospital. Roberta McCain, the Senator's 94-year-old mother, fell as she was walking out of the star-studded bash at the Corcoran Gallery of Art and injured her hip." After "driving herself (as usual) to the party and hobnobbing for two hours with her fans in the media and supporters and guests of her son, the fiercely independent Mrs. McCain took a tumble on the front steps of the Corcoran as she was walking to her car." Friends "drove her to the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., where doctors discovered she had a 'hairline fracture below the joint,' according to a senior McCain aide." Roll Call adds McCain's "bash, paid for by his Straight Talk America political action committee, sure looked like a dry run for potential future White House Christmas parties." The party "drew an A-list of the media and politicos. Guests instinctively formed a receiving line to greet McCain and get a photo." Notable "primary- and caucus-state Senators who attended the bash: John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who reiterated his devotion to McCain's probable presidential bid while Sununu continued to play coy."

Emotional Bush 41 Praises Son Jeb. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 8, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Former President George Herbert Walker Bush has always shied away from public displays of emotion, so we wanted to show you what was a very rare and touching scene yesterday in Florida. He was giving a speech on leadership, and cited son, Jeb, as an example for the way he handled losing the governor's race in 1994. The former President said that while voters chose the other candidate..." Former President George HW Bush: "They took note of his defeated opponent, who showed not merely with words but by his actions what decency was." Couric: Jeb Bush, of course, was later elected governor in 1998 and re-elected in 2002."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 10, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The former President, an emotional guy, became emotional and had to stop more than once when talking about Jeb's 1994 loss to Governor Lawton Chiles and how his son held up in the face of a tough campaign." Former President HW Bush: "In '94, Floridians chose to rehire the Governor. They took note of his defeated opponent who showed not merely with words but by his actions what decency he and...I can do it." Williams: "With support from his son and the crowd, the former President recovered. He said his wife Barbara would 'bawl him out for breaking up.' He went on to finish his speech by saying to those Florida lawmakers, your Governor has served with honor."

Whistleblower Sworn In As Alaska Governor. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Rosen, 59K) reports Sarah Palin "crushed Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican gubernatorial primary. Then in the general election she defeated former Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles, a political veteran who was seeking a return to the office he held for two terms." At her "swearing-in in Fairbanks, she simultaneously became Alaska's first female governor, Alaska's youngest governor, and the state's only beauty-queen-turned-chief-executive. Not bad for a suburban mother of four with a relatively thin résumé that critics claimed marked her as a lightweight." Palin's "victory stems partly from the fact that her campaign bore little connection to the rest of the US." Palin "turned her relative lack of political experience into an asset. She presented, according to campaign slogans, a 'fresh face' offering 'new energy for Alaska.' That resonated with an electorate that was in a decidedly antiestablishment, anti-incumbent mood." High on "her priority list is a plan to take a tougher line with the oil industry, which she says has been 'making mind-boggling profits' from Alaska's resources." Also a "top priority, she says, is restoring a sense of ethics to a state where citizens are weary of government scandals." Palin "gained much of her prominence as a whistle-blower."

NRC Commissioner Seeks To Inspire Others Toward Public Service. Under the headline, "A Public Servant To The Last; Before Stepping Down, He Calls a New Generation to Serve," the Washington Post (12/6, A23, Williamson, 690K) reports, "In 1961, Ed McGaffigan Jr. was a seventh-grader from Boston watching the inauguration on television when a president told him to ask what he could do for his country." That speech "inspired a three-decade career that included stints at the State Department, the White House, the US Embassy in Moscow, Capitol Hill and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, where last month McGaffigan became the agency's longest-serving commissioner. McGaffigan, who turns 58 on Friday, would normally have many more years of service ahead. Instead, he is fighting an illness that threatens to vanquish him, and he is taking on one last assignment: closing his career in a way that inspires others to consider public service."

Survey Suggests Ambivalence Toward Public Service. Under the headline, "Potential Employees Express Lukewarm Interest in Working for the Government," the Washington Post's (12/6, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many people the government wants as employees are interested in working for Uncle Sam, but they don't see the government as being as innovative and creative as the private sector, according to a Gallup survey released yesterday. While survey respondents gave the government high marks on job security and compensation, only 3 percent said they see the government as more innovative and creative than the private sector, only 5 percent think it is better at recruiting the best and brightest, and only 6 percent viewed the government as providing a more competitive work environment." The survey is the "latest in a series of efforts aimed at helping the government cope with a wave of baby-boom retirements predicted to set off a "war for talent" with the private sector. The government is particularly vulnerable because substantial numbers of federal employees are projected to retire in 2008 and 2009 and because many young Americans do not view the government as their employer of first choice."

Former GOP Aides Form Defense Firm. The Washington Post's (12/6, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "just as the Hill is staffing up with Democrats to investigate administration officials, former Republican aides are rushing to offer their services in defense." Hill veteran Mark Corallo -- formerly with the House Government Reform Committee, later Justice Department chief spokesman and most recently Karl Rove's spokesman during the Valerie Plame investigation -- is teaming up with the redoubtable Barbara Comstock, who boasts similarly top credentials" to form the firm Corallo Comstock.

Mary Cheney Pregnant. The Washington Post (12/6, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that Mary Cheney, "the vice president's openly gay daughter, is pregnant. She and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, are 'ecstatic' about the baby, due in late spring, said a source close to the couple." It's a "baby boom for grandparents Dick and Lynne Cheney: Their older daughter, Elizabeth, went on leave as deputy assistant secretary of state before having her fifth child in July." News of "the pregnancy will undoubtedly reignite the debate about gay marriage."

US Offers North Korea Aid For Dropping Nuclear Plans. The New York Times (12/6, A14, Cooper, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Washington has offered "a detailed package of economic and energy assistance in exchange for North Korea's giving up nuclear weapons and technology," American officials said Tuesday. However, the offer, "made last week during two days of intense talks in Beijing, would hinge on North Korea's agreeing to begin dismantling some of the equipment it is using to expand its nuclear arsenal, even before returning to negotiations." The Times says it remains "unclear whether North Korea will accept the offer, which is more specific -- in both the details and the timing -- than a vaguely worded statement of principles that the North signed in September 2005, a year before its first nuclear test." According to a "senior administration official," the "combination of incentives and demands was the focal point of three-way meetings on Nov. 28 and 29 involving" Assistant Secretary Hill, North Korea's vice foreign minister, Kim Kye-gwan, and Chinese officials in Beijing. The incentives offered by the United States "include food aid from the United States, Japan and South Korea," the official said. The Times calls the offer "significant" because the administration "has resisted making clear to North Korea exactly what kind of aid it would receive if it agreed to begin taking apart facilities."

Diplomats Fail To Reach Accord On Iran Sanctions. The AP (12/6, Charlton) reports diplomats meeting in Paris Tuesday made "substantive progress" but "failed to reach an accord…on a UN resolution to punish Iran for defying demands to halt its nuclear program," the French Foreign Ministry said. "We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions targeting proliferation-sensitive activities. There remain several outstanding issues, upon which we will reflect over the coming days," the French ministry said in a statement, noting that the parties "are now close to a conclusion of this process." Despite France's insistence that a compromise is near, the AP notes that "illustrating the divisions that have tangled the negotiations," Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that imposing wide-ranging sanctions would be "irresponsible." Speaking in Brussels, Lavrov said Russia believes "that to impose these kind of sanctions would be...disproportionate to the real situation. … We believe this is wrong. We will work in a more responsible way." However, European diplomats "said the Russians made some concessions at Tuesday's talks," including agreeing to a measure "prohibiting financial transfers to 'problematic' Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs." Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "vowed Tuesday to stick by the nuclear program and issued a new threat to downgrade relations" with the EU "if European negotiators opted for tough UN sanctions." However, he gave no details on how ties might be downgraded. AFP (12/6) reports that the French ministry said the "next step will be in New York" at UN headquarters, "without specifying when the next round of talks would take place."

Iran Urges Arabs To Expel US Troops, Join Regional Alliance. The Washington Times/AP (12/6, Krane) reports Iran's top national security official "urged Arabs yesterday to expel the US military from bases in the region and instead join Tehran in a regional security alliance." The offer was seen as "a strong sign of Iran's rising assertiveness in its contest with the United States for influence in the region." However, experts says Persian Gulf countries, "suspicious of Iran's intentions, are unlikely to respond to the call and push out the US military or end US security deals they view as offering them an umbrella of protection."

Iran To Host Conference On Holocaust Evidence. The New York Times (12/6, A5, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian authorities announced plans on Tuesday for an international conference on the Holocaust next Monday and Tuesday. Organizers expect "more than 60 scholars from 30 countries and would examine a range of issues, including whether the gas chambers were actually used." Deputy Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mohammadi said the conference would "provide the opportunity for scholars from both sides to give their papers in freedom and without preconceived ideas."

Lebanese Commander Says Military May Not Be Able To Halt Protests. The Washington Times/AP (12/6, Ghattas) reports Lebanese Army Commander Michel Suleiman Tuesday "warned that the military may not be able to contain further protests linked to the country's tense political standoff." Therefore, he "urged politicians to compromise," but the AP reports that the standoff "shows no sign of waning despite calls from the two sides for dialogue to resolve their differences."

The Washington Post (12/6, A14, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah has "entered territory uncharted in its 24-year history…effectively seeking an unprecedented, decisive say in Lebanese politics to protect what it sees as its interests from foes at home and abroad." The Post says the "month-long political crisis that has roiled Lebanon…marks a revealing shift for the Shiite Muslim movement that for years, at least rhetorically, tried to stay above politics."

Israeli Textbooks To Show Pre-1967 West Bank Border. The Washington Post (12/6, A15, Wilson, 690K) reports that maps in future Israeli public school textbooks "will show the boundary that existed between Israel and the West Bank before the 1967 Middle East war," Israeli Education Minister Yuli Tamir announced Tuesday. The move "drew sharp protest from lawmakers, settler groups and religious leaders who claim the West Bank as part of the Jewish state."

Consultants Warn Palestinians Developing Ties With Al Qaeda. Mideast consultants Louis Rene Beres and Clare M. Lopez write in the Washington Times (12/6, Beres, Lopez, 88K) that the "Palestinian link to al Qaeda has become more than mere sympathy and friendship. Al Qaeda has now set its sights on Israel and on an incremental takeover of the Palestinian cause. This is the next phase of its campaign to dominate the Muslim world and re-establish an Islamic Caliphate." According to Beres and Lopez, "Joint Palestinian-al Qaeda teams are planning coordinated mega-terror strikes against Israel and America." Therefore, they urge both Israel and the US to "immediately cease any and all assistance to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority."

Musharraf Hints At Resolution With India Over Kashmir. The New York Times (12/6, A6, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said in an Indian television program broadcast Tuesday that Islamabad "could accept a solution to the festering dispute over Kashmir if New Delhi were to agree to greater autonomy and gradual demilitarization in the Indian-controlled swath of the territory." In an interview with NDTV, Musharraf said, "Inherently, both sides have to give up their positions." The Times says the Pakistani leader's remarks "signal, however, that even as official peace talks yield virtually no breakthroughs, the areas of disagreement between the rivals could well be shrinking."

Frist Says Congress Will Complete India Nuclear Bill This Week. AFP (12/6) reports Senate leader Bill Frist "assured India's Prime Minister Manmohan Singh that a major US-India nuclear energy bill is on track for completion this week." Frist said he spoke Tuesday with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and assured him "that one of my top priorities for the remainder of this Congress is to enact this legislation," and he is "confident that we will be able to complete congressional action on it this week."

Somali PM Says Troops Prepared for War. The AP (12/6, Tomlinson) reports Somalia's troops are "ready for an imminent and inevitable war with the Islamic militia that has taken over much of the country and surrounded the internationally backed government," Somali Prime Minister Ali Gedi said in a recent interview. Gedi told The AP that Islamic militant leaders "are the decision makers now," and "those who believe that the situation in Somalia will be solved through dialogue and talks are wrong." However, he said his government will "continue to take part in all peace efforts while preparing to defend itself against attacks."

Rebels Threaten To Withdraw From Darfur Peace Deal. The AP (12/6, De Montesquiou) reports the "only Darfur rebel group to sign a peace agreement with the government threatened Tuesday to pull out from the deal if Khartoum-backed militias continue to attack civilians in the troubled region." The "ultimatum" from the Sudan Liberation Movement "came a day after the pro-government janjaweed paramilitary looted the central market in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur, and clashed with SLM fighters, killing at least two," the AP notes. The group's leader warned that the Sudanese government "must disarm and neutralize the janjaweed by the end of this month" or "a bridge will be crossed, and no one knows what will happen."

Russia Restricts Investigation As Suspect Identified In Poison Probe. ABC World News (12/5, story 4, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "significant developments" in the poisoning death of former Russian spy Aexander Litvinenko. "A British official tells ABC News that British detectives have identified a prime suspect -- a man who also once was a Russian spy. But now, the British detectives are finding they will not get cooperation from Russia." ABC (Sciutto) added, "British detectives had just arrived in Moscow when Russian officials said they would not let them see the man they consider their prime suspect, former Russian spy Andrei Lugovoi. He was unavailable, Russian officials said, hospitalized with signs of radiation poisoning."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 7, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "in an indication just how sensitive this probe is, today Russia warned it would conduct any interviews" with persons of interest in the case, and British investigators "could sit in."

The AP (12/6, Isachenkov) reports Russia's top prosecutor said Tuesday that Moscow "will not extradite possible Russian suspects to Britain" and "warned that British detectives would not be allowed to carry out interrogations in Russia." The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A5, Cullison, Chazan, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika also "ruled out questioning leaders at the FSB, Russia's state security service."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/6, A12, Kramer, 1.16M) reports that for Russian law enforcement the investigation has been "a delicate one because President Vladimir Putin was blamed" for the poisoning by Litvinenko on his deathbed. The Washington Post (12/6, A18, Finn, Jordan, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (12/6, Holley, 850K) also report on the developments.

Ukrainian Prime Minister Meets With Rice, Cheney. The Washington Times (12/6, Sands, 88K) reports, "Ukraine will reject any effort to be used as a pawn in any struggle for influence between Russia and the West, Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych said yesterday at the end of a two-day visit to Washington." Yanukovych said "his four-month-old government will not lobby strongly for membership in NATO in the face of weak popular support for the trans-Atlantic alliance inside Ukraine." Yanukovych held "low-key talks with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his visit," and they discussed "Ukraine's World Trade Organization bid, energy security and domestic reforms in Ukraine." Yanukovych "declined to criticize recent anti-democratic moves by Russian President Vladimir Putin," and said, "The most important thing is that Ukraine should not be allied with Russia against the United States and the European Union or vice versa. We are not going to conduct such a policy."

European Recovery Gives Boost To Global Economy. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A1, Walker, 2.04M) reports, "Europe's economy is firing on all cylinders after years of feeble growth, helping to sustain global expansion as the US economy slows and surprising many economists who doubted the Continent could muster enough demand to break its reliance on exports." Its recovery "was ignited by rising exports, but it is now spreading to investment, job creation and consumer spending." The 12-nation euro currency area "earned Europe a reputation rivaling Japan's as the world's economic laggard." Euro-zone gross domestic product is "on course to grow by 2.7% this year," and "a strengthening euro and looming tax increases in Germany could brake euro-zone growth next year, most forecasters still expect an expansion of around 2%." Europe's recovery "still has flaws," but much of the improvement this year "has occurred in Germany, which is helping to buoy its neighbors after taking some painful steps, while many companies in France and Italy still struggle to cope with fierce global competition."

Immigration Helps UK's Economy. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, Peaple, 2.04M) reports, "An influx of immigrant labor after the European Union expanded in 2004 has fueled a surge in the UK economy and is expected to prompt the government to announce today that growth this year will be faster than expected." Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown said last week that the "faster growth trend was due at least in part to the wave of immigration that has washed over Britain," as the government "estimates that 600,000 people have moved to the UK from Central and Eastern Europe since the EU grew by 10 countries two years ago." More than two-thirds of them already found jobs, "increasing Britain's work force by 1.5%." The Centre for Economic and Business Research says "migrant workers add £54 billion ($107 billion) a year to output, or around 5% of GDP." Other EU countries, including Ireland and Sweden, "have been similarly jolted by immigration flows, though not to the extent seen in Britain, which is equipped with a heavily service-based economy and liberal labor laws that help it absorb more jobs."

Fiji Declares State Of Emergency After Coup. The Washington Post/AP (12/6, A14, Lilley) reports, "Fiji's military commander declared a state of emergency Wednesday, a day after he overthrew the elected government and brought international sanctions and censure that began to isolate the South Pacific country." This was the "fourth coup in 20 years, " and armed forces will "set up checkpoints around Suva, the capital, as part of the state of emergency." Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase "flew Wednesday from the capital to his home village on the remote, northeastern Lau Islands," said his private secretary Pene Nonu. The armed forces chief, Commodore Frank Bainimarama "justified seizing power to prevent legislation that favored indigenous Fijians, contending that the measures 'would undermine the constitution and deny many citizens their rights.'"

Worldwide Rise In Uranium Prices Creating Boomtowns In Africa. Under the headline, "Rising Interest In Nuclear Power Brings New Life To Uranium Mining; Firm's Boom Helps Namibian Town, Worries Environmentalists," the Washington Post (12/6, A16, Timberg, 690K) reports from Arandis, Namibia, that "the nuclear industry, stagnant for two decades, reversed its fortunes at a time of rising oil prices and growing realization that burning fossil fuel caused global climate change. Nuclear went from being seen as a dirty source of energy to a comparatively clean, efficient one. From that shift in perception, mainly in the minds of Westerners thousands of miles away, the fate of this remote African town went from doom to boom." The Post adds, "Roessing Uranium Mine opened in 1976 during nuclear power's heyday. But the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and Chernobyl in 1986 caused a profound political backlash that nearly halted new reactor construction." Now, "Roessing, which recently made its first delivery to an increasingly energy-hungry China, has decided to continue mining until at least 2016, mine officials say. They expect to end this year with Roessing's first substantial profit, and tax bill to the Namibian government, in five years."

US Urged To Start China-Style "Green" Industrial Revolution. In a column titled "China's Sunshine Boys" in the New York Times (12/6, Friedman, 1.16M) columnist Thomas L. Friedman writes that Shi Zhengrong, ranked as the "seventh-richest man in China today" is China's "leading maker of silicon photovoltaic solar cells, which convert sunlight into electricity." He is a "green entrepreneur," and Friedman "wishes him well" as an environmentalist. However, as an American, he worries that "if we don't start doing everything we can to develop our own clean power," like Shi, "we're going to miss out on the green industrial revolution." China is "setting high standards for renewables, but is still weak on enforcement." The United States "is better at enforcement, but still weak on setting high standards." Friedman writes, "We need to get our act together, because eventually China will bring its enforcement in line with its regulations -- or it won't breathe." At that time, "China's emerging green power entrepreneurs could clean our clock in the clean power business."

LATimes Urges Completion Of US-South Korean Trade Talks. The Los Angeles Times (12/6, 850K) editorializes that as the fifth round of free talks between the US and South Korea get underway "the stakes for both countries are high and go beyond mere economics -- though the economies of both nations would benefit from a pact." The Times warns that "a failure would further strain already frayed relations between the US and South Korea and could push Seoul nearer to China's political and trade orbit."

TERRORISM NEWS:

NYU Study Finds Fault With Federal Anti-Terror Efforts. The New York Daily News (12/6, Meek) reports, "Federal authorities' strategy of arresting terror suspects on any charge possible has proved effective in thwarting attacks, but too often prosecutors have inflated the importance of the busts, a new study says. … 'The strategy of disruption has worked, but they hyped these cases to be more than what they seemed,' said Karen Greenberg, author of the study by New York University's Center of Law and Security. .. 'It leaves their record of prosecuting the war on terror unconvincing,' she said yesterday." The News continues, "Of 510 cases since the Sept. 11 attacks that the government said were terrorism-related, only 30% of the defendants were actually prosecuted on a terrorism charge, the NYU study found. Most of the others faced charges such as fraud, racketeering or conspiracy. … While 169 cases are still pending, only four people charged since the 2001 attacks were convicted for trying to commit an act of terrorism, the study said." The News adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the report 'reflects the underlying premise of our strategy to prevent and disrupt terrorists before they can carry out what they may be conspiring to do, by using any and all tools at our disposal in the U.S. code.' … Terror prosecutions have declined from a spike in the three months following the 9/11 attacks, when 116 people were indicted. Only 57 have been indicted in 2006. … The NYU study found that only 14% of the defendants were tied to Al Qaeda. Of the 510 defendants, more than half had 'no known affiliation' with any terrorist group. … Justice officials said that suggests homegrown terror is a bigger threat than many realize."

Critics Question Power Of Privacy Board. The AP (12/6, Yen) reports, "Civil liberties advocates urged a White House privacy board Tuesday to review aggressively the government's warrantless surveillance program, even as they questioned whether it has the power to do so." The AP continues, "The Privacy and Civil Liberties Board, created in late 2004 after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission, held its first hearing with testimony from nongovernment experts on ways to protect Americans' rights during the war on terror. … Its five members, who left the agenda open, repeatedly found themselves under scrutiny. … 'This board needs to bring a little sunshine,' said Caroline Frederickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. She said she was disappointed panel members recently praised the surveillance program's safeguards that a federal judge initially ruled as illegal. … 'It remains clear that this program was built outside of, and in direct contradiction to, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and Fourth Amendment guaranteed protections,' she said. 'This panel's integrity and usefulness will be questioned if it dodges its duty to undertake a full review.'" The AP adds, 'Board members defended their role, saying that as an advisory panel to the president it was not their job to determine whether the eavesdropping program was illegal but to find ways - in consultation with Congress and Bush - to improve it. … 'Congress put us in the office of the president,' said former Clinton White House counsel Lanny Davis, the panel's lone Democrat, after several audience members unsuccessfully asked the panel to divulge what specific issues it has raised with the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Schmitt) reports, "The four-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board was urged to take a more aggressive tack in checking the power of the Bush administration in its handling of the war on terrorism. Witnesses cited concerns over such policies as the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program and an error-plagued terrorist watch list that has ensnared innocent citizens." The Times adds, "Created by Congress in response to a recommendation by the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission, the panel was conceived as a way to ensure the administration considers implications on privacy and civil liberties when implementing 'all laws, regulations and executive branch policies.' In practice, though, its power is limited by the fact that its members are appointed by the president, whose policies they are supposed to scrutinize. … Its authority is also likely to change next month when Democrats take control of Congress. Some Democrats have proposed making the panel independent of the White House, with the power to subpoena witnesses and documents. Others have suggested that its influence could wane if Democrats take over one of the reasons for its existence — aggressive oversight of administration policies. … But board members said at the hearing that they were taking their job seriously. They have received classified briefings on the secret surveillance program and a separate program that monitored international bank data, and were also briefed on legislation to put new limits on the surveillance program. …

'This program today is an exceedingly important part of our mission to hear these points of view, and we have a great deal to learn in order to perform our statutory responsibility,' panel member Theodore B. Olson, Bush's first solicitor general, said at the hearing. In recent months, he said, the board has met with senior officials of the Justice Department, the National Intelligence office and the National Security Agency, among others."

The Washington Post (12/6, A11, Nakashima, 690K) reports, "James Dempsey, a member of a Markle Foundation task force on privacy, said the guidelines lack substance and specificity. They do not address data-collection standards or set up appropriate redress mechanisms for people erroneously targeted in counterterrorism programs, he said." The Post adds, "Caroline Frederickson, legislative director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the board lacked any power to change policies on crucial issues such as citizen redress on terrorist and criminal watch lists. … Frederickson called on Congress to give the board subpoena power and remove it from the executive branch."

CNET News (12/5, Broache) reports, "In a stately, wood-paneled hall at Georgetown University, a seemingly phantom White House panel charged with overseeing privacy and civil liberties issues made its public debut on Tuesday. But it didn't quite receive the warm welcome it may have liked. … At its first open meeting since it was conceived two years ago, the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board heard more than three hours of tips for future action--and not all of it gentle--from advocacy groups, think tanks and academics of various political stripes." CNET continues, "Of the 10 such representatives who spoke on panels at the meeting, many urged the group to probe more deeply into the constitutional issues surrounding electronic surveillance, data mining and swapping, and terrorist watch list programs conducted by the government. Some didn't mince words. … 'When our government is torturing innocent people and spying on Americans without a warrant, this board should act--indeed, should have acted long ago,' Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington, D.C., office, told the panel in her testimony. … Training her gaze on the five presidentially appointed board members, she added: 'Clearly you've been fiddling while Rome burns.' … The board, borne out of an act of Congress in 2004 based on recommendations by the 9/11 Commission, has been dogged before. 9/11 Commission Chairman Thomas Kean, congressional Democrats, and watchdog groups accused the Bush administration of not taking the endeavor seriously and dragging their feet in nominating members and getting the group up and running."

Italian Prosecutors Seek Indictment Of 25 CIA "Operatives" In Rendition Case. The New York Times (12/6, Fisher, Povoledo, 1.16M) reports, "Italian prosecutors asked Tuesday for the indictment of the country's former intelligence chief, along with 25 operatives of the Central Intelligence Agency, for their involvement in the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric from Milan in 2003. The case is one of the most sensitive in Italy, raising the question of whether the Italian government broke the nation's laws by approving or assisting in the abduction." The Times notes, "It is the first case in the world in which local officials have been tried in the contentious program of 'extraordinary rendition,' a program in which U.S. agents abducted scores of suspected Islamic militants after Sept. 11, 2001. The suspects are believed to have been taken to interrogation centers in third countries, some of which permit torture. The case has complicated relations between Italy and the United States, though until now Italy has not asked for the agents' extradition, meaning that any trials against them could take place in absentia."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Government Urges Holiday Travelers To Keep Watch For Terrorists. The Washington Post's (12/6, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "Uncle Sam hopes you'll remain vigilant, on the lookout for terrorists who also might be heading home to see their families" for the holidays. The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security are "distributing hundreds of 'wanted terrorist' posters to major airports around the country."

Jackson-Lee's Complaint About Airport Security Draws Faint Praise. The Washington Times (12/6, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that gun control advocate Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee "was going through security at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston when the alarm sounded not once, but twice. However, when she was placed in a queue for follow-up screening, Mrs. Jackson-Lee 'complained' about the process, according to the DHS." When she "insisted on retrieving her personal carry-on items, a Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officer informed her that she would first have to be rescreened, at which point the lawmaker continued to complain. Now, one group is actually coming to the congresswoman's defense. Or is it?" In a two-page letter, Michael L. Bane, founder of the Armed Passengers Project, says, "I cannot commend you enough for criticizing the humiliating and degrading treatment that travelers must endure undergoing security screening."

DHS Extends Comment Period On Traveler Risk Assessments. In an article appearing on at least 65 news websites, the AP (12/5, Sniffen) reported, "Under pressure from Congress and the public, the Homeland Security Department extended the time for people to comment on its computerized risk assessment system for international travelers" from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29. As of Tuesday, the department "had received 59 public comments," all but one either opposing "the system outright" or calling "for better means for people to correct any errors in the data. … Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who will become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee when Democrats take control of Congress in January, wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff seeking extension of the comment period." The AP added that the assessments, made using the Automatic Targeting System, "are based on applying so-called rules, which are actually assumptions based on the past behavior of terrorists and criminals, to the person's travel records."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Marks, 59K) reports the program "is generating a growing controversy both in the United States and abroad." Officials at Customs and Border Protection, which assigns international travelers with scores "designed to identify high-risk travelers," say the program is "a crucial tool to protect the nation." However, "some congressional leaders, privacy advocates, and travel executives believe it's an unparalleled use of data-mining to invade individuals' privacy. Some European leaders also object, claiming the program…violates a privacy agreement worked out between the US and the European Union."

Investigations Find Clerics' Removal From Flight Was Justified. The Washington Times (12/6, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Three parallel investigations into the removal of six imams from a US Airways flight last month have so far concluded that the airline acted properly, that the imams' claims they were merely praying and their eviction was racially inspired are without foundation. An internal investigation by the airline found that air and ground crews 'acted correctly' when they requested that the Muslim men be removed from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight on Nov. 20." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said an investigation by the agency's Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties had found no indication of "any inappropriate activity, at least no indication at this time." An investigation by the Air Carrier Security Committee of the Air Line Pilots Association concluded that "decisions made by all the parties were made as a result of the behavior of the passengers and not as a result of their ethnicity."

Imams' Actions Seen As Deliberately Provocative. Debra Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation and the sister of Charles F. "Chic" Burlingame III, the pilot of American Airlines flight 77, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/6, A16, 2.04M) that "Allahu Akbar," the words spoken by the six "bearded imams" before their flight, were also the "very last human sound on the cockpit voice recorder of United flight 93 before it screamed into the ground at 580 miles per hour." Burlingame says, "Given that Islamic terrorists continue their obsession with turning airplanes into weapons of mass destruction, it is nothing short of obscene that these six religious leaders -- fresh from attending a conference of the North American Imams Federation, featuring discussions on 'Imams and Politics' and 'Imams and the Media' -- chose to turn that airport into a stage and that airplane into a prop in the service of their need for grievance theater." Burlingame adds, "The imams, experienced travelers all, counted on the security system established after 9/11 to kick in, and now they plan not only to benefit financially from the proper operation of that system but to substantially weaken it -- with help from the Saudi-endowed attorneys" at the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Former HHS Secretary Urges Congress To Invest In ER One Project. Tommy Thompson, former secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, in an op-ed in the Hill (12/6, Thompson) writes, "More than five years after Sept. 11, 2001, no state is adequately prepared for a potential mass-casualty disaster caused by a terrorist attack, pandemic or natural disaster." Thompson says a provision under this year's major spending bill for the Department of Health and Human Services that would fund the "ER One" project is "arguably one of the smartest investments that Congress could make, and it deserves to be approved." The Washington Hospital Center emergency facility "will serve as an education center and working research laboratory for testing and publishing new approaches to managing risks."

Woman Arrested After Throwing Package Into Old Executive Office Building Courtyard. The AP (12/6) reports, "Streets around the White House were closed Tuesday morning after a woman threw a package into the courtyard of the adjacent Old Executive Office Building. The woman was taken into custody without incident and was being questioned by the Secret Service, said Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the service. The package was being investigated but no immediate details were available."

GAO Report Says FEMA Failing To Recoup Unjust Payments. The New York Times (12/6, Lipton, 1.16M) reports a new Government Accountability Office report says FEMA "has recouped less than 1 percent of an estimated $1 billion in fraudulent or unjustified payments it distributed after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The report also says "the agency continued to wrongly send out millions of dollars of new aid this year, including $17 million in rental assistance to families living rent-free in FEMA trailers." The findings, set for release Wednesday, "demonstrate how the agency has remained open to criticism from advocates for evacuees as being too stingy with people who have real needs, and to criticism from auditors as being too willing to give taxpayer dollars to scam artists and cheats." Sen. Joe Lieberman, the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which has scheduled a hearing for Wednesday on Hurricane Katrina-related fraud and abuse, said the agency "has much work to do before we can be confident that it is providing assistance to those who are eligible and who need it, while denying it to those who do not."

FEMA Says It Will Appeal Housing Aid Decision. The AP (12/5) reported FEMA announced Tuesday that it would appeal "a court order requiring it to make housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina. US District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why housing funding was cut. He said that violated the Constitution, and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately." The agency "may ask an appeals court to put the judge's ruling on hold while the appeal plays out."

Evacuees Relying On FEMA Said To Find Little Stability. The New York Times (12/6, Dewan, 1.16M) reports Wynaen Walker, whose Lake Charles home was destroyed by Hurricane Rita, returned to her FEMA trailer one day in October to find that its "lock had been changed." She "had been displaced by a family from one of five FEMA trailer parks at the nearby Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport that are scheduled to close in April. Though her move was a mistake, it is one that residents say the agency has made repeatedly in its trailer parks. … More than a year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, life is still precarious and unpredictable for many evacuees, especially those who have depended on the government for a modicum of stability."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says US "Not Winning" In Iraq. The AP (12/6, Burns) reports, "Robert Gates, seemingly clinching confirmation as the new secretary of defense, said Tuesday the United States is not winning in Iraq and he's confident President Bush will listen to his ideas about forging a new war strategy." Gates "won speedy and unanimous approval from the Senate Armed Services Committee after five hours of testimony, a bipartisan show of support that suggested how eager many lawmakers are to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. The full Senate could seal Gates' confirmation as early as Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) notes the expected quick approval of the nomination "would contrast with Gates' confirmation hearings in 1991, one of the longest and most contentious in recent Senate history. At the time, Gates was grilled on his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal and accusations that he bullied analysts into shaping intelligence to fit his worldview."

Gates is receiving glowing media reviews following yesterday's hearing, much of it focusing on his statement that the US "isn't winning in Iraq." That statement, seen as a deviation from the Administration's line on Iraq, is getting extensive media play. The CBS Evening News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "No matter how much the violence has worsened in Iraq, no matter how high the death toll has risen…Bush has insisted United States is winning. He said so as recently as six weeks ago at a White House news conference. Today, that question was asked again, this time to the man who will soon be in charge of the war." CBS (Martin) added, "Gates said what no senior official of the Bush Administration has dared utter publicly." The Washington Times (12/6, Scarborough, 88K) also says Gates' assertion that the US is "not winning" seemed to "put the nominee at odds with the commander in chief," while The Hill (12/6, Tiron) reports, "Senate critics of the war saw the nominee's opinion, given in a response during his nomination hearing, as a sharp departure from the president's position." The New York Times (12/6, Cloud, Mazzetti, 1.16M) notes Gates also "appeared to differ slightly with Mr. Bush's frequent declaration that Iraq is the 'central battlefield' in fighting terrorists. Asked if he agreed with that description, Mr. Gates called Iraq 'one of the central fronts in the war on terror' but said the United States also faced a 'dispersed' enemy of Islamic militants worldwide." But "he was more direct in criticizing the Bush administration's decision to disband the Iraqi Army and, for a time, to bar from government jobs tens of thousands of Iraqis who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Barnes, 850K) says "Gates stepped into what passes in the nation's capital for a congressional love-fest Tuesday for the simple reason that he was not Donald H. Rumsfeld. … The soft-spoken Gates, it seemed, could do no wrong, eliciting praise from Republicans and Democrats for his 'candor' and 'forthrightness.'" McClatchy (12/6, Stearns) reports Gates "received a warm, if stern, welcome," and the Washington Post (12/6, A1, Tyson, Ricks, 690K) notes the "cordial reception by the Senate Armed Services Committee,"

In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (12/6, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank makes light of the "love fest." Writes Milbank, "And so it came to pass, in the 12th month of the sixth year of the reign of Bush, that a prophet came forth to deliver us from the war in Babylon." The "rapturous senators seemed to regard the president's second defense secretary as a harbinger of the Second Coming."

Gates "earned these very, very nice words because of one very important attribute: He is not Donald Rumsfeld. He gave no wiseacre answers, asked himself no questions and said nothing to disparage the 'Army you have.' Instead, he made the obvious statement that the Bush administration, until yesterday, had refused to utter: We are not winning in Iraq."

Even editorial pages that often are highly critical of the Administration this morning sing the nominee's praises. The Washington Post (12/6, 690K) lauds Gates' "refreshingly candid voice" and "frankness," and the New York Times (12/6, 1.16M), in an editorial titled "The Un-Rumsfeld," says Gates "played the role of the un-Rumsfeld masterfully yesterday. He offered just enough candor and conciliation to persuade most senators that he plans to be a very different sort of defense secretary, while deftly holding back any real information about how he plans to clean up…Bush's mess in Iraq." However, adds the Times, "Iraq is unraveling so fast that Mr. Gates will have to come up with opinions quickly, and be willing to express them to the president forcefully." USA Today (12/6, 2.27M) editorializes, "After almost four years of prickly denials from…Rumsfeld that anything was wrong with the Pentagon's plan in Iraq, it was refreshing Tuesday to hear his successor acknowledge that things are not going so well." His "chief strength" is that he is not Rumsfeld. Even Maureen Dowd, in a New York Times column (12/6, 1.16M) titled "Goodness Gracious! The Truth!" praises Gates for the "sort of realistic assessment that never came from Rummy." Dowd adds that "the old criticisms of whether Mr. Gates massaged intelligence were forgotten; the senators would have embraced an ax-murderer if he had seemed sensible about Iraq."

On ABC World News (12/5, story 2, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said Gates "was the anti-Rumsfeld. He was direct. He was deferential. He didn't pretend to have the answers. That's why he's going to sail through." Tim Tussert said on NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 2, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that what "you heard over and over again" was "candor, refreshing, fresh start, new eyes. Put this in context. Who would have thought that less than a month ago that Donald Rumsfeld would be pushed out as Secretary of Defense and his replacement would come forward and say we're not winning the war and basically say that his appointment or nomination is an admission that things have to change in Iraq? That's why the vote is unanimous. Both Republicans and Democrats are yearning for a fresh start on Iraq."

All three networks, and front-page stories in today's major newspapers, reproduced Gates' answer to the question from Democratic Sen. Carl Levin ("Do you believe we are winning the war in Iraq?"). Gates responded, "No, sir." Later, ABC World News (12/5, lead story, 3:05, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, Gates sought to clarify" this statement. Gates was shown saying, "I certainly stand by my statement this morning that we are not winning, but we are not losing. But I want to make clear that that pertains to the situation in Iraq as a whole. Our military forces win the battles that they fight." ABC (Karl) also reported that "all day long, Gates strayed from the White House script, even on the biggest questions of all." Sen. Mark Dayton: "With that benefit of hindsight, would you say that invading Iraq was the right decision or the wrong decision?" Gates: "I think it's too soon to tell." Gates also "identified several mistakes he believes have been made -- disbanding the Iraqi army, underestimating the job of rebuilding the country and not sending enough troops." Gates: "I suspect, in hindsight, some of the folks in the Administration probably would not make the same decisions that they made. And I think one of those is that there clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country." Karl: "Several Senators praised Gates and took shots at his boss." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "Now, in short, should we believe you or the President on the critical issue whether the Administration is really willing to make a change in its policy?" Robert Gates: "If I'm confirmed, I will be independent. I intend to draw my own conclusions. And I'll make my recommendations. But I can assure you that I don't owe anybody anything."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M), meanwhile, summed up Gates' testimony reporting, "The United States is not winning the war in Iraq and there are no good ideas about how to reverse that. Those were some of the answers to the questions that senators fired at the new man for the Pentagon today."

Democratic senators praised Gates yesterday. On CNN's Your World Today (12/5, Frazier), Florida Sen. Ben Nelson predicted Gates will be confirmed unanimously. Nelson said, "Clearly, there is a big change in candor and forthrightness from what we've seen in the secretary of defense and the former Deputy Secretary of Defense Wolfowitz, where there's been all of this sleight of hand, and head fake and not being straightforward."

On MSNBC (12/5, O'Donnell), Rhode Island Sen. Jack Reed (D) said Gates will "be someone who's going to listen to his military commanders. He's going to listen to advice from across the aisle. And I think he's someone that will take that advice and not simply respond ideologically with fixed positions. He's someone that will learn and will change. And I think that's a very positive development." Reed added, "I've had experience with Bob Gates over several years in a nonpolitical setting. He's someone, I think, whose judgment is good, who brings to this task experience. He's someone, I think, today who demonstrated candor, directness, thoughtfulness. Those are qualities that are needed. And I think those are qualities that'll be very helpful to the administration."

On Fox News (12/5, Hill), Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) said, 'Mr. Gates was asked a question if he thought we were winning in Iraq. He gave a one-word answer. He said, No. I thought that was a moment of refreshing candor. You don't see that very often in Washington. Too bad."

And on CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (12/5, McIntyre), GOP Sen. John Warner was shown saying at a press conference, "America got a good look at this extraordinary nominee. America can take the confidence that he's going to be a very strong adviser to the president of the United States."

The New York Times (12/6, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Gates also "displayed a knack for flattering the committee. 'Secretaries come and go, but the Senate Armed Services Committee remains,' he said. 'If confirmed, I will seek your counsel and take it seriously.'" Gates also told the committee, "We all work for the same boss. … That boss is the people of the United States."

Gates Downplays ISG Report. NBC Nightly News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported Gates "downplayed tomorrow's release of recommended options from the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group." Gates: "It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq."

USA Today (12/6, 10A, Kelley, 2.27M) notes Gates "was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group until Nov. 8, when Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination. That panel's recommendations, due to be released today, will be helpful but aren't the only ones to consider, Gates said." On Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Hume), Weekly Standard editor Fred Barnes said, "I think, the truth is, though, what I'm told anyway, he told President Bush when Bush interviewed him a couple days before the election, he said, one, I agree that going into Iraq was the right thing, two, I think victory is what we should go after, not retreat, and I'm determined to pursue that."

Iran Comments Seen As "Shot Across The Bows" Of Neocons. The Financial Times (12/6, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports "Gates was also outspoken on Iran, saying he would only advise an attack on the country as an 'absolute last resort.' … His reservations on military action against Iran were a shot across the bows of weakened but still influential neo-conservatives in Washington who have called for strikes against the Islamic republic's nuclear facilities. Glen Howard of the Jamestown Foundation, a security think-tank, said: 'The neo-cons are regrouping around the Iran threat.'"

Gates Assets Include Defense Contractor's Stock. The AP (12/5, Theimer) reports, "Gates' assets include up to $250,000 in stock in a defense contractor on whose board he serves, a financial disclosure report made public Tuesday shows. If confirmed as defense secretary, Gates will divest his holdings in the company, NACCO Industries, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. He will step away from any Defense Department matters involving NACCO for at least a year." In general, "Gates plans to sell all the stock he owns in individual companies and sever all ties with them if the Senate confirms him as Pentagon chief, Perino said." Like Secretary Rumsfeld, "Gates is a millionaire." The AP lists other sources of income on his financial statement. About 40 sites carried this story.

President's Neocon Advisors "Down To One." Meanwhile, in a piece for Scripps Howard (12/5), analyst Martin Schram writes, "They were all this President's men - Cheney and Rummy and Wolfie and Bolton - neoconservatives, hard-line conservatives, iron-fisted conservatives, unyielding conservatives. ... Now there is only one. Don Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz and now John Bolton have been bulldozed and/or forklifted out of power. ... it seems that Dick Cheney may be on his way to becoming just another one of those veeps who are seldom seen and hardly heard. After all, Cheney's last assigned mission was to be unceremoniously summoned to Saudi Arabia, where not a single public event was held." As for Rumsfeld, after the GOP's election defeat, he "was told his resignation was accepted, so would he please write it?" Rumsfeld's leaked memo "seems intended mainly for our eyes only," Schram says sarcastically. He recounts Cheney and Rumsfeld's intertwined careers and concludes, "The dynamic duo has run its last course."

Baker Briefs Bush On Iraq Study Group Report.

The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 9, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A very close friend of the Bush family had a power lunch with the current President today. James Baker briefed him on the Baker-Hamilton commission's recommendations on Iraq a day before that report comes out. It's a familiar role for Baker," who "when the Bushes need help…always answers the call." CBS (Plante) added "this President may not be in much of a hurry to accept the Baker commission's ideas. Asked if Baker would be drafted to help implement the recommendation, the President's spokesman said, 'Jim Baker can go back to his day job.'"

The AP (12/6, Loven) reports the report "will be released this morning. The full commission, led by Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, "will give a copy of the report to Bush at 7 a.m. EST." The AP adds, "Following the presentation to the president, the group is to brief Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his team via secure videoconference from the White House." Bush, "to be joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolton, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and other senior White House aides, was to thank the commission but not comment on the specifics of its recommendations, the official said." White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday, "We're going to give it a careful review. … As we have mentioned, there are other ongoing studies within the administration."

USA Today (12/6, 10A, Jackson, 2.27M) reports, "After their White House visit, group members will head to Capitol Hill to brief House and Senate leaders. They plan to hold a news conference at 11 a.m., when they will release the report to the public. The rest of the day features a string of television, radio and newspaper interviews of study group members, including its co-chairmen: former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., now director of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington." The interviews "are being coordinated by the Edelman public relations firm, which will continue to assist the institute through appearances on this Sunday's news talk shows." The US Institute of Peace, "which is devoted to global conflict resolution, received a $1 million appropriation from Congress to assist the Iraq Study Group."

CNN's The Situation Room (12/5, Henry) reported, "The White House is bracing for this report." CNN (Henry) said that yesterday's breakfast meeting between and Baker was initiated by Baker to give "a heads up to the president." CNN added, "Snow today was asked if this lunch was the cushion before the blow by James Baker. He insisted this does not have to be adversarial. He said this is a commission not an 'insurgency trying to attack the White House.'"

A number of reports this morning also depict a President on the defensive over the ISG report. The Financial Times (12/6, Sevastopulo), for example, says the report "will increase the pressure on…Bush to adjust US military policy in Iraq," and the Chicago Tribune (12/6, Silva, 617K) reports, "With his unwavering insistence that US military forces must stand, fight and 'win' in Iraq, President Bush has taken on the look of the last man standing. Both inside and outside the White House, voices are calling for at least a new war strategy -- and at most a target date for withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Bush, while acknowledging frustration with the progress of the US mission, so far has refused to fundamentally alter it." The White House "has downplayed the report, saying the president will have no 'snap reaction' to the congressionally mandated review." Yet on ABC World News (12/5, story 2, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said Republicans and Democrats in Congress are also "not going to treat" the ISG report "as a complete answer. They're not going to embrace it whole. They're going to treat it as a Chinese menu. Picking out what they like. Ignoring what they don't like." The President "has two more reports coming out. He's asked his National Security Adviser to do a review. He asked the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to do a review. But the White House is having the President to come before the country, with his recommendation for a new strategy by Christmas."

Roll Call (12/6, Billings) reports "Congressional Democrats will use today's report by the Iraq Study Group as another opportunity to seek validation for a change of course in the region, but they privately acknowledge that they will be careful not to go too far in embracing the study." Democrats "say they want to make sure that the report…doesn't provide cover for the Bush administration over its policies. As part of that approach, both House and Senate Democratic leaders will be driving home the message that the research serves as a strong rebuke of a conflict they believe has devolved into a civil war." Roll Call adds, "A senior Senate Democratic aide said there will be a 'significant attempt' by Democrats to 'embrace as much [of the report] as possible, while calling it a clear repudiation of the Bush administration's failed stay-the-course strategy.'"

Panel, White House Warning There Are No "Dramatic Fixes" In Store. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A4, King, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports "the panel and the Bush administration are broadcasting a similar message: There are no dramatic fixes to end the war or to get US troops home in a hurry." The "long-awaited report, people familiar with the matter say, will describe the situation in Iraq as deteriorating, but will acknowledge that its own recommendations are flawed and far from a magic solution." The panel "plans to put the main focus on the need to launch an immediate effort to gain international support for rescuing Iraq, including from nettlesome neighbors Syria and Iran. At the same time, the group will argue that the US should redouble its effort to train the Iraqi army while diminishing its own military presence there largely to an advising and support role, with an eye toward pulling out all combat units by the first three months of 2008. Tens of thousands of US troops will likely remain."

The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Baker, Linzer, 690K) reports, "The bipartisan Iraq Study Group plans to recommend to President Bush that he threaten to reduce economic and military support for Iraq's government if it fails to meet specific benchmarks intended to improve security in the country, a source familiar with the report said yesterday. … The latest details to emerge from the commission's report help flesh out a plan that also calls for the United States to withdraw nearly all combat units by early 2008 while leaving behind tens of thousands of troops to advise, train and embed with Iraqi forces." The Post also reports, "Much debate in e-mail exchanges among the most outspoken advisers to the study group focused on whether adding troops would help. But most feared that bringing in the large numbers required would break the military, lead to a surge in US deaths and do nothing to better protect civilians. In the end, the experts did not agree on sending additional forces beyond military advisers for the Iraqi national army. They seemed certain that Bush would reject most of their recommendations and that few could work anyway."

USA Today (12/6, 1A, Kelley, Brook, 2.27M) reports, "Among the issues to be raised by the commission and others: Withdrawing US troops. The commission is expected to propose withdrawing about 70,000 combat troops by 2008. … Engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran."

ISG Praised For Bipartisanship. David Broder writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "Whatever the final impact of the Iraq Study Group report being issued today, for the 10 commission members this was an exhilarating experience, a demonstration of genuine bipartisanship that they hope will serve as an example to the broader political world." … The nine men and one woman serving on the commission -- five from each party -- represented a wide range of political backgrounds and philosophical views. Several had been on opposing sides in past presidential campaigns." But "as commission member Vernon Jordan, the Democratic lawyer, noted, they were also 'professionals' -- veterans of public service. Jordan has served on presidential commissions of one sort or another since 1965, and said, 'This process has been a lesson in civility.'" The New York Times (12/6, Shenon, 1.16M), meanwhile, profiles Lee H. Hamilton," in a story that calls him "a compromiser who operates above the partisan fray." Hamilton's "disdain for partisan battle, often to the annoyance of fellow Democrats, and his willingness to work toward compromise on national security policy, are likely to be on display again on Wednesday with the release of the findings of the Iraq Study Group."

Baker's Abilities Praised. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 9, 2:55, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "In more than 30 years, he's been both a behind-the-scenes political operator and a very public statesman, much of it in the service of his close friend, the first President Bush." Ken Duberstein, former Regan White House Chief Of Staff: "Jim Baker is always an honest broker. If he can help the family, and help other families, I think he really strikes a two-fer." Plante: "This isn't the first time Baker has helped George the son. Remember six years ago in Florida." Baker: "The Gore campaign refused to accept the vote count on election day." Plante: "It was Baker who was called upon to lead the legal team that opened the White House doors once again for the bushes. Jim Baker's been White House Chief of Staff for two Presidents, Treasury Secretary, and Secretary of State. He helped put together the coalition which joined the US and the Gulf War. And knew enough then to anticipate the dangers of marching into Baghdad and overthrowing Saddam Hussein." Michael Deaver, former Deputy Chief of Staff: "Jim Baker of one of these rare people that comes along once in a while who is smart, smart not only intellectually and from experience, but street smart." Plante: "Street smart for sure. Back in 1990, he convinced Syria to join the Gulf War coalition against Saddam. Now, he wants this George Bush to talk to Syria and Iran, too." Baker: "It's got to be hard nosed. It's got to be determined. You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Kerry Sees Study Group Moving In Direction He Outlined. On MSNBC's Hardball (12/5, Barnicle), Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) said that the Iraq Study Group "is moving in the direction that I and others have been arguing we should be moving in." Kerry added that "if what we've read in the papers is correct, they are going to suggest an alternative course that includes talking to Syria and Iran, a regional kind of conference or a regional engagement with the countries there to get them more involved, and some kind of down-the-road target of some kind that we are going to be withdrawing at some point, we have to begin at some point. And I think it's going to change the debate."

Poll Finds Views On Iraq War At New Low. On its website, the Wall Street Journal (12/5, 2.04M) reports "a majority of Americans say the situation for US troops in Iraq has grown worse and confidence in US policies in Iraq is at a new low, a Harris poll shows. Fifty-eight percent of US adults say the situation for troops in Iraq is getting worse, according to the online survey from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20, 2006, compared with 45% in September and 36% in January. Nine percent said the situation for troops in Iraq is getting better, while 27% said there was 'no real change.' … In addition, more Americans have a negative view of President Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months: 71% said he is doing only fair or poor, compared with 26% who think he is doing a pretty good or excellent job. In September, 64% had a negative view of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 32% rated him positively." Harris Interactive "conducted this online survey in the U.S., Nov. 13-20, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,429 adults."

Democrats May Attach "Conditions" To Iraq Spending. McClatchy (12/6, Talev) reports, "On the eve of the Iraq Study Group's long-awaited recommendations for how to exit Iraq, congressional Democrats were eyeing a different document as leverage for change: President Bush's anticipated request for more money to keep fighting." House Democratic leaders "are considering attaching a series of conditions to the estimated $160 billion supplemental war funding request for Iraq and Afghanistan that President Bush is expected to send them early next year. They wouldn't specify what their conditions would be, including whether they might attach a troop-withdrawal timeline, as many Democratic lawmakers want to do." Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, "said the supplemental funding request 'is going to be the turning point' for the direction of the war. 'Those dollars are going to be treated differently,' he said."

The Washington Times (12/6, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports, "Top Democrats in Congress are ignoring calls from within their caucus to eliminate funding for troops in Iraq, a strategy some say is necessary to end US involvement in the war. 'There is only one way in which the United States will withdraw from Iraq prior to the end of President Bush's term,' said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat. 'Congress must vote to cut off funds.'" Democratic leaders "flatly rejected the idea yesterday, insisting they will move to 'change the course' of the war but will continue to appropriate money to support the troops fighting in Iraq."

Reports Highlight "Hidden Costs" Of War. The Miami Herald (12/6, Hall, Montgomery, 286K) reports, "Belt-tightening at the bases is only the beginning. As the United States spends about $8 billion a month in Iraq, the military is being forced to cut costs in ways big and small." The Herald cites multiple examples, including cutback on restroom janitorial services at Fort Hood, TX, and early closings at swimming pools in Fort Leonard Wood, Missouri. The Herald continues, "Soldiers preparing to ship to Iraq don't have enough equipment to train on because it's been left in Iraq, where it's most needed. Thousands of tanks and other vehicles sit at repair depots waiting to be fixed because funds are short." The Herald cites other "hidden" costs, including 73,000 diagnoses of Post Traumatic Stress Disorder, shortage of parts for equipment repair, and suicide attempts by soldiers "haunted by the horrors of combat." The Herald continues, "In January, Nobel Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz released a study that said the true costs of the Iraq war could exceed $1 trillion and perhaps reach $2 trillion. … The Stiglitz report focused on hard-to-measure things such as lifetime care for injured soldiers and the economic effect of higher oil prices as a result of the war. But his final numbers for unofficial costs are on pace to be matched by the official costs -- which don't add the intangibles."

Maliki Seeks To Hold Regional Talks. The New York Times (12/6, A1, Wong, Cooper, 1.16M) reports in a front page article Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Tuesday that he would "send envoys to neighboring countries to plan a conference on Iraq, adding momentum to calls for a regional approach" to quelling violence. The Times notes that "such a proposal is already gaining attention" in the Washington, where the Iraq Study Group is "expected to recommend Wednesday that the American government should approach Iran and Syria to seek their aid in ending the war." Although the White House has publicly "resisted the idea of widening its own diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria," the Times reports that "senior Bush administration officials now say they are working out ways to talk to those countries without the White House appearing to have conceded on its principle of giving them the diplomatic cold shoulder." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Washington "approved" of the proposed conference, calling it "absolutely consistent with what the Iraqis have said -- that they have the reins on their own diplomacy and how they will relate to their neighbors, and how their neighbors will relate to them."

The Washington Post (12/6, A21, Trejos, 690K) notes that Maliki "rejected a proposal from U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan that [the conference] take place outside Iraq." In a statement e-mailed to reporters, Maliki "rebuked" Annan for suggesting that Iraq was not the right venue, saying, "We consider his invitation to hold an international conference about Iraq as just another way to confiscate the will of Iraqis and their achievements that established democracy, a national unity government and the elected Parliament." The Financial Times (12/6, Khalaf) says Maliki has "been trying to take ownership of regional policy ahead of the Iraq Study Group report, fearing that changes in US policy will undermine the elected government."

Meanwhile, the AP (12/6, Abdul-Zahra) reports that Maliki "reversed course" by calling for an international conference, "despite opposition to the plan by some key political allies," including Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and leading Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim. In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the Bush administration welcomed the announcement, saying it was "a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Zavis, Moore, 850K) runs a similar report.

Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Rosen) reported Maliki "called for two separate conferences, both to be held in Iraq, and both aimed at stabilizing the country. First, Maliki said Sunnis, Kurds and Shia would hold a long-delayed reconciliation summit later this month" and pledged a regional conference." Fox News (Rosen) also aired video of Iraqi Shiite politician Abdul Aziz al-Hakim saying Monday, "We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue. We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems." Fox News added, "That posture matches the thinking of President Bush and Secretary of State Rice, who not only doubt the usefulness of the US sitting down with Damascus and Tehran, but want to encourage the Iraqis to develop their own solutions in the realms of security and diplomacy, as when the Iraqis last month restored diplomatic ties, after 24 years, with Syria."

US Urged To Address "Refugee Crisis" With Syria. Kenneth H. Bacon, resident of Refugees International, writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "Syria is the last country in the Middle East to leave its borders open to Iraqi refugees. The United Nations estimates that 1.8 million Iraqis have sought refuge in the region, and Syria and Jordan host the largest concentration. It can't maintain its open-door policy without international support. Refugees already strain social services. Yet, the international response to the Iraqi refugee crisis has been dismal." There has been "scant media attention and even less political concern," and the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees is doing little." Bacon adds, "Working through the United Nations or directly, the United States has an opportunity to engage with Damascus to mitigate the suffering of Iraqi refugees and the growing burden on Syria."

Iranian Official Says Iran Will Only Help If US Announces Pullout Schedule. David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K) that "a top Iranian official set a tough condition for his country's help in stabilizing Iraq, saying that Tehran isn't interested in such cooperation unless the Bush administration sets a timetable for withdrawing its troops. Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, said in an interview that a US plan for removing 'occupation forces' from Iraq would be considered 'a sign of a change in strategy.' In that case, he said, 'Iran would definitely extend the hand of assistance and would use its influence to help solve the problem.'" Larijani "made his comments after a speech yesterday to a conference…called the Arab Strategy Forum. His remarks were the clearest statement I've heard of how Iran views its role in the region following what he described as the failure of US intervention in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. His tone was triumphalist: In his view, America is bogged down in Iraq and 'in dire need of change,' while a newly confident Iran is positioning itself as a dominant power for the region."

Caldwell Says Iraqis Will Command Own Forces By Spring. AFP (12/6) reports, "Iraq's government will have command of its own armed forces by the middle of next year, a US general has said, revealing details of a deal between the US president and the Iraqi prime minister." Spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell's "announcement came on the eve of a much-anticipated report" from the Baker commission. AFP adds, "Currently only two of Iraq's 18 provinces are under direct Iraqi security control and only two of the country's 10 army divisions answer directly to Maliki rather than to US General George Casey's headquarters." Moves such as increasing the number of Americans serving on transition teams "are among ideas expected to be recommended by former US secretary of state James Baker's Iraq Study Group on Wednesday, but Caldwell said the revised plan had come from the military itself."

On the CBS Evening News (12/5, story 2, 1:55, Couric, 7.66M), Gen. Caldwell was shown saying, "As the Iraqi forces become more capable out there, there is no reason why we would see a necessity for as many US military forces as we have here today. The Prime Minister is very adamant that he's ready to resume control of his country, and if he is, then, we're going to let them step up and be more responsible and provide them back support to help make sure they just don't fail." CBS (Martin) added, "There are a lot of people in the Pentagon who will tell you, look, we had 140,000 troops when there were zero Iraqi troops. Now there are 325,000 Iraqi troops, and we still have 140,000 there. It's time to start pulling our troops out of combat, assigning more trainers and advisers to the Iraqi units to make up the difference."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Richter, 850K) reports Bush "has warned that a precipitate withdrawal would create a terrorism superstate in the Middle East that is rich with oil cash and determined to topple moderate governments around it. But to many US lawmakers, regional experts and Middle East leaders, the chief risk is not a more menacing version of Taliban-dominated Afghanistan, but a Lebanese-style civil war that could result in the deaths of thousands more Iraqis and expand the conflict by drawing in neighboring states."

Gen. Caldwell writes in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), "I don't see a civil war in Iraq. I don't see a constituency for civil war. The vast majority of the people want hope for their families, not to massacre their neighbors or divide their country. A poll conducted in June by the International Republican Institute, a nonpartisan group that promotes democracy, found 89 percent of Iraqis supporting a unity government representing all sects and ethnic communities. No wonder no 'rebel army' steps forward to claim credit for vicious car bombs and cowardly executions of civilians. I see debates among Iraqis -- often angry and sometimes divisive -- but arguments characteristic of political discourse, not political breakdown. … Regardless of what academics and pundits decide to label this conflict, hundreds of thousands of brave Iraqi soldiers, police officers and civil servants will continue to go to work building a free, prosperous and united Iraq. And every day more than 137,000 U.S. servicemen and servicewomen will lace up their boots, strap on their body armor and drive ahead with our mission to support these courageous Iraqis."

US Said To Be Applying Lessons From Vietnam. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/6, 690K), Vietnam War historian Mark Moyar writes, "In moving to swiftly transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqi government, the Bush administration appears to be heeding lessons learned during ... the Vietnam War. In Vietnam, the United States found that indigenous troops were inherently better suited to local security tasks than Americans. ... Recent comments from the Bush administration indicate that America will spend less time telling the Iraqis how to solve their political problems." Detractors "point to the ultimate defeat of South Vietnam. But in fact the South Vietnamese ... ultimately lost because the United States withdrew support while the North Vietnamese enjoyed enough superpower support to mount an even larger offensive in 1975." Iraqi forces "are not going to experience anything resembling the 1975 offensive; they need only end the low-intensity fighting among Iraqis. But this task will require great political skill on the part of Iraq's prime minister. We will find out very soon whether he possesses it."

Fallujah's City Council Persevering Under Tough Conditions. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Peterson, 59K) reports, in a pessimistic article on the challenges of serving on the Fallujah city council, "No other city council operates in the insurgent-riddled Anbar Province. But the embattled [mayor] Bedawi -- whose family, like those of other members, is under threat of kidnapping or worse -- continues to forge ahead in one of the most stressful jobs the city has to offer. ... Two years after US marines invaded Fallujah to force out insurgents who had made the city off limits to US forces, militants are filtering back into the city, despite only six entry points, which are heavily guarded. Since August, they have waged a campaign of intimidation that has left two key councilmen and the deputy chief of police murdered, and a trail of threats against those who persist." One November council meeting "begins with three men who complain about shootings by US Marines - one of them fatal - of their sons and a nephew. They demand prosecution of the 'snipers' involved, and their removal." Col. Lawrence Nicholson promises to investigate. The Marine presence in town has shrunk to "fewer than 300," but the mayor says, "We don't want the Americans to leave until the Iraqi Army and Iraqi Police are rebuilt and well armed, and they kill a lot of people from Al Qaeda, and dismantle militias, and kill extremists."

Marines Expected To Be Charged In Haditha Incident. The New York Times (12/6, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "At least five marines are expected to be charged, possibly as early as Wednesday, with the killing of 24 Iraqis, many of them unarmed women and children, in the village of Haditha in November 2005, according to a Marine official and a lawyer involved in the case." Charges will likely "range from negligent homicide to murder, said a senior Pentagon official." The timing of official disclosure of the charges is "unclear," but officials and defense lawyers "said charges could closely follow a closed-door briefing by Lt. Gen. Richard F. Natonski, the Marine Corps deputy commandant for plans, policies and operations, to the House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday morning." While a "senior Pentagon official" expected five indictments, a Marine officer "said that he expected charges to be brought against one or two additional marines, including one officer," namely, First Lt. William T. Kallop.

The AP (12/5, Watkins) reports, "Lt. Gen. James Mattis has examined the investigations into the killings and has made initial decisions about what action to take, Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Tuesday in a news release. ... A parallel investigation examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up details of the killings. Results of the probes have not been made public."

Baghdad's Ambulance Workers Struggle With Violence. The New York Times (12/6, Luo, 1.16M) reports, "Ambulance workers have among the clearest views of Baghdad's descent into chaos. As the city has disintegrated around them, they have been left to pick up the pieces. They are often overwhelmed, and have increasingly become targets themselves." One of them likens "these three years" to "16 years as a paramedic." Baghdad has "only about 90 ambulances and crews" on "any given day"; in addition, "The capital's maddening traffic, and the fact that most residents ignore sirens, compound the challenges. Ambulance crews are also treated with suspicion by American troops because militants have been known to use ambulances to transport weapons or bombs. ... Emergency workers earn salaries that are often barely enough to live on, as little as $80 a month for new paramedics. ... As they rush to bombings now, a secondary blast is often aimed at them. Eleven emergency workers were killed in 2006. Previously, six others had been killed since early 2004, when the department started keeping track. More than 10 percent of Baghdad's ambulance drivers have resigned in the last three months alone as violence has escalated."

Baghdad Firefighters Endangered By Terrorist Tactics. The Washington Times (12/6, Palmer, 88K) reports, "The terrorists who daily spread mayhem in the capital [Baghdad] increasingly have adopted the tactic of following a suicide bombing with one or two secondary blasts, timed to detonate a few minutes later when a crowd has formed. And that is bad news for the city's 3,500 firefighters, whose job demands that they rush to the scene of every explosion to douse the flames and assist the injured. ... This year alone, at least 30 Baghdad firemen have died in the line of duty and another 55 have been wounded, according to the Interior Ministry, which oversees Iraq's fire departments. Others have been kidnapped by criminal groups or militiamen; still others find themselves in the crossfire of insurgent groups, U.S. and Iraqi security forces, and warring militias."

Use of Body Counts Criticized As Political Device. In a commentary for USA Today (12/6, 21A, 2.27M), surgery professor and former Iraq health sector consultant John Bowersox writes disparagingly of The Lancet's allegation of "more than 600,000 'excess' civilian deaths" since the "US-led invasion of Iraq": "Never mind that editors failed to disclose that The Lancet had taken an anti-war stand on Iraq even before 2003, or that the study used dubious methods to come up with a number many times higher than any reported before. ... Ever since the Vietnam War, civilian and enemy body counts have ranged from educated guesses to pure fiction -- tragic statistics twisted to serve the agendas of whoever is spinning the numbers."

Analysts Think Bin Laden Alive But "Hamstrung." The Washington Times (12/6, Gertz, 88K) reports, "U.S. intelligence agencies think al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri are alive and still plotting attacks ... Both remain powerful symbols for Islamist extremists around the world and the target of scores to hundreds of covert special-operations commandos, regular troops and CIA paramilitary officers." Secretary-designate Gates "said yesterday he plans to review the tactics being used by forces taking part in the five-year hunt for bin Laden, although he noted that bin Laden has become more a symbol to terrorists and less an active planner and organizer of attacks." He predicted, "Just as in the case of Saddam Hussein, one of his own people will turn him in." Counterterrorism expert Dennis Pluchinsky "said bin Laden's low profile is likely the result of poor health or because he is hiding in an ultra-secret location that is too risky to conduct videotaping."

Afghans Mull Reconstruction Of Bamiyan Buddhas. The New York Times (12/6, Gall, 1.16M) reports on the "colossal Buddhas" blown up by the Taliban in 2001: "Five years after the Taliban were ousted from power, Bamiyan's Buddhist relics are once again the focus of debate: Is it possible to restore the great Buddhas? And, if so, can the extraordinary investment that would be required be justified in a country crippled by poverty and a continued Taliban insurgency in the south and that is, after all, overwhelmingly Muslim? ... There have been calls to rebuild the Buddhas, mostly from Afghans who feel that restored statues would provide a greater tourist attraction, and a righting of wrongs." Although Afghanistan is "impoverished," the provincial governor "favors rebuilding the Buddhas using anastylosis, and said she would propose that the central government make a formal request to Unesco."

Senate Not Expected To Act On Minnesota US Attorney Nominee. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/6, Furst) reports, "Nine months after Rachel Paulose was named acting U.S. attorney for Minnesota, and four months after she was formally nominated for the job by President Bush, her appointment is slipping further into doubt." The Tribune continues, "The U.S. Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on the nomination. That would mean that Bush, if he wishes, must resubmit her name to the next Senate, with a new Democratic majority. … 'I am disappointed the Senate will adjourn this year without taking up Rachel Paulose's nomination,' Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a statement Monday to the Star Tribune. 'Ms. Paulose has shown herself to be an extremely competent and capable professional.' He said he expects her to be renominated, 'and I hope we will have the opportunity to confirm her nomination in a timely manner.'" The Tribune adds, "If approved to permanently succeed Tom Heffelfinger, Paulose, 33, would become the state's first female U.S. attorney and the youngest current U.S. attorney. … Her nomination stalled when the GOP-led Senate Judiciary Committee failed to take it up. In an apparent oversight, Paulose and her supporters did not solicit the support of both home-state senators. Without that, the committee typically does not act on a nominee. … Coleman supported her nomination, but Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., took no position, saying it's his practice to meet with any nominee before the choice moves to the Judiciary Committee. However, Dayton said, Paulose never sought a meeting."

DC Federal Court Is Jeffress Family Affair. The Washington Post (12/6, B01, Leonnig) reports, "Each day, chances are good that Bill, Amy and Jon Jeffress will be applying their legal talents just a few doors down the hall from each other in the same stately office building near the U.S. Capitol. … But the father, daughter and son are not racking up billable hours at a white-shoe family firm. … They are reporting for work at the E. Barrett Prettyman Courthouse, Washington's federal court." The Post continues, "On the sixth floor, father William H. Jeffress Jr., 61, one of Washington's most prominent defense attorneys, has been busy with pretrial hearings in a case that has rocked the White House. He represents I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, who is accused of lying to investigators probing the leak of a CIA operative's name. … On the second floor, daughter Amy, 41, has been checking on narcotics cases she oversees for the U.S. Attorney's Office -- including a trial involving a ring that is accused of peddling cocaine and heroin. … And in a magistrate courtroom down the hall, Jonathan, 35, has been representing poor people as a public defender." The Post adds, "In many ways, the U.S. District Court is a kind of family home. … Their personal stories are intertwined with the court's history. Each learned the power of the law here and can trace career trajectories to work they did in the building. Some of their most profound moments of victory and disappointment unfolded in the oak-paneled courtrooms. … All three are former law clerks who returned to practice here. Bill Jeffress, a partner in the firm of Baker Botts, clerked for Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, who presided over many landmark cases, from Watergate to Iran-contra. In 1971, Jeffress was working in Gesell's chambers when the judge famously ruled that The Washington Post could print the Pentagon Papers, a historical assessment of the Vietnam War that embarrassed the U.S. government. … When Amy was growing up, Gesell was her dad's mentor and 'like my second grandfather,' she recalled. Two decades later, when she graduated from Yale Law School -- just like her father -- Amy, too, went to clerk for Gesell." The Post notes, "Although their job choices are different, there definitely is a certain Jeffress way about them. … The three share the same Democratic Party leanings. Bill and his wife have long been active in the party. Amy worked in the Justice Department during the Clinton administration with her future husband. And Jon was an advance worker for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign."

Prospects For DC DA's Office Seen As Bleak. In a column for The Hill (12/6), Arthur Delaney writes, "In two of this year's most pungent national crime stories — the Duke University rape scandal and the JonBenet Ramsey confession scandal — the next biggest stars, after the DNA, are the DAs. This question often comes up: Will the people vote the district attorney out of office as a result of his or her antics in the case? … To somebody who grew up in Washington, D.C., this perfectly normal question is perfectly foreign. We don't get to elect a district attorney. We don't even have a district attorney's office, another of the many quaint differences between the U.S. and its capital city, where only second-class citizens live." Delaney continues, "In July, D.C.'s nonvoting congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), introduced legislation that would create a D.C. district attorney's office. … Norton's District of Columbia District Attorney Establishment Act of 2006 is going nowhere in the Government Reform Committee. … So the local U.S. attorney's office, the largest such office in the country, will continue to be responsible for prosecuting both federal crimes and local crimes committed by adults in the District." Delaney adds, "But wait! There's a third horse in this race: The D.C. attorney general's office. Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty and his nominee for attorney general, Linda Singer, have expressed interest in the attorney general's office taking some of our federal prosecutors' local criminal caseload. … All they've got so far, though, is an embarrassing bitch-slap from a federal judge: 'How could there even be a thought that they could take that on? The D.C. attorney general's office is not adequately or properly handling the cases it has now,' said U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth, according to a Nov. 18 Washington Post story. Lamberth was miffed over the office's apparent mishandling of a case against the D.C. police." Delaney concludes, "Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, in his capacity as D.C.'s unelected district attorney, has the totally unique ability to try local thugs either in federal or local court. For our hometown criminals, this is a matter of life or death — even though you won't find the 'ultimate penalty' in the D.C. Code and voters rejected a congressionally imposed referendum on execution in 1992, federal prosecutors still can seek it against D.C. criminals if their offenses meet the right criteria. … A federal judge recently ruled that the murder and racketeering charges against Larry Gooch qualify him for a capital trial, set to begin in January. It's a fat chance that a D.C. jury will send any man to die, but if it happens — well, score one for the Feds, I suppose."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Charges French Alcatel Executive With Bribing Costa Rican Officials. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Anderson) reports, "A former top executive for the Latin American business of the French telecommunications giant Alcatel-Lucent faces U.S. corruption charges for allegedly funneling millions of dollars in bribes to Costa Rican officials to win lucrative contracts. Christian Sapsizian, a 60-year-old French citizen…was free Tuesday on $525,000 bail after making his initial appearance Monday in federal court." The AP notes, "According to an FBI affidavit, Sapsizian agreed in 2000 to make payments to an unnamed senior official with Costa Rica's state-owned telecommunications authority, the Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad, or ICE. In return, the official would 'vote in favor of awarding Alcatel a contract' and provide other valuable assistance, according to the FBI. … Sapsizian's attorney, Roy Kahn, said Sapsizian will plead not guilty to the charges and added that companies frequently hire such consulting firms for business ventures in Latin America."

2nd Circuit Rejects Class Action Against Banks In IPO Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Koppel) reports, "In a victory for Wall Street securities firms, a federal appeals court said a lawsuit alleging fraud in the pricing of initial public offerings couldn't move forward in its current form as a class action." The Journal continues, "The case alleges that more than 50 Wall Street firms committed fraud by artificially inflating stock prices in IPOs that the firms underwrote in the late 1990s and 2000. … In a ruling, the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said that the trial judge shouldn't have allowed the plaintiffs to pursue the case as a class action, in part because their individual claims are not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. The decision could mean that the thousands of plaintiffs in the litigation will have to take on the banks individually, which is a much more difficult challenge for plaintiffs. 'It's a great win,' says Vince DiBlasi of Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the lead lawyers for the banks. … 'There is no question the court made it hard for us,' says Melvyn Weiss, chairman of the executive committee in the litigation, who plans to appeal the ruling. But 'this is not necessarily a happy day for the [Wall Street] banks, either,' says Mr. Weiss, of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. The Wall Street firms may now be "swamped" with individual suits by some of the class members, who number in the thousands, 'if not millions,' he said."

The New York Times (12/6, Creswell) reports, "The decision was seen on Wall Street as a huge victory. The investment banks faced making payments of billions of dollars to settle the accusations — if they chose not to risk a trial — involving potentially millions of investors, lawyers involved in the case said." The Times adds, "The ruling also raises the prospects that earlier settlements in the case, in particular a $425 million agreement with J. P. Morgan Chase and a $1 billion guaranteed proposed deal with the issuers of the new shares that was still pending approval by the judge in the case, could be nullified. … Nearly all firms on Wall Street were touched by the lawsuit. Described by many as the largest consolidated securities class-action case ever, the I.P.O. lawsuit involved more than 300 individual investors, 309 issuers and 55 underwriters, including Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Credit Suisse First Boston." The Times notes, "Yesterday, a three-judge panel of the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan said the federal judge overseeing the lawsuit had erred in granting class-action status to six 'focus cases' out of 310 consolidated class actions that claimed fraud on the part of many of the nation's largest securities underwriters. … That means investors will probably have to pursue their claims individually, in some cases perhaps through arbitration, lawyers involved in the case said."

Former Comverse CEO May Have Problems With Option Exercise Dates. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Levitz) reports, "Kobi Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., fled to Namibia rather than face criminal-fraud charges alleging he fattened his paycheck by backdating his options grants to low points in the company's stock price, making them more valuable. … But Mr. Alexander might have other problems with options, too." The Journal continues, "Mr. Alexander reported a 1998 option exercise near a notable low in the company's share price. If the timing of that exercise was backdated, Mr. Alexander could have received a substantial, improper break on his personal income-tax bill. … The issue has been referred to the special committee of Comverse directors who are examining the company's grant-backdating problem, according to a person familiar with the matter. The timing of the 1998 exercise was noted in a 13-page Nov. 27 report by Gradient Analytics Inc., a Scottsdale, Ariz., research firm that specializes in the analysis of executive compensation, which Gradient believes can affect share prices. The report was distributed to clients including hedge funds and mutual-fund money managers." The Journal adds, "Gradient didn't conclude that Mr. Alexander's exercise was backdated, and his favorable timing might have been just a matter of luck. … Mr. Alexander said on a form he filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 9, 1998, that he had exercised the split-adjusted equivalent of 675,000 options two months earlier, on Oct. 9, when Comverse's shares closed at a split-adjusted price of $10 each, just pennies above its lowest closing price of the quarter. He didn't report a sale for that same day."

SEC Calls Pequot Probe Thorough, But Attorney Adds Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Hughes) reports, "A second Securities and Exchange Commission official told Congress he had warned agency officials that 'something smells rotten' about the SEC's handling of an insider-trading probe of hedge fund Pequot Capital Management." The Journal continues, "The testimony from Eric Ribelin, who works in the office of market surveillance, provides a leg of support for the claims of former SEC enforcement attorney Gary Aguirre." The Journal adds, "Mr. Aguirre says he was fired in September 2005 after his supervisors reversed course and stopped him from issuing subpoenas to current Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, whom Mr. Aguirre suspected of tipping off Pequot. SEC officials said they fired Mr. Aguirre because his behavior became erratic and he couldn't get along with his colleagues. … 'I have serious misgivings about many decisions made in this investigation,' Mr. Ribelin wrote in September 2005 to Robert Hanson, an SEC branch chief who had supervised Mr. Aguirre. 'I don't know what all has driven the decisions. Something smells rotten, though.' … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) called the hearing to air allegations that the Pequot probe was derailed by political influence. The SEC staff closed its investigation of Pequot and Mr. Mack last week without recommending enforcement action. Morgan Stanley has said Mr. Mack, who testified to the SEC this past August, cooperated in the probe."

The New York Times (12/6, Bogdanich) reports, "Senior officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission vigorously defended the commission's investigation of a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management, telling the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday that its inquiry was professional, thorough and untainted by outside political influence." The Times continues, "In their first detailed public comments about the investigation of Pequot, four current or former S.E.C. supervisors took aim at their former colleague and chief accuser, Gary J. Aguirre, saying his allegations that the agency had pulled its punches were unfounded and came from a fired employee whose temperament and judgment had caused problems in the office. … 'He treated his colleagues with disrespect bordering on contempt,' said Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the S.E.C. 'His investigation of Pequot was poorly thought out, disorganized, and sloppily documented.' … The testimony by S.E.C. officials, including the agency's inspector general, was met with considerable skepticism by Senator Arlen Specter, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Finance Committee. Both panels are investigating the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of the Pequot inquiry."

AIG Settles Some Legal Disputes With Greenberg Firm. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C4, Pleven) reports, "American International Group Inc. and C.V. Starr & Co., a firm led by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. 'Hank' Greenberg, are settling multiple legal cases." The Journal continues, "Mr. Greenberg left AIG last year amid an accounting probe. He has denied any wrongdoing in a resulting civil case. … After Mr. Greenberg's departure, AIG terminated its relationship with insurance agencies controlled by C.V. Starr, which was headed by Mr. Greenberg when he ran AIG and sold commercial policies to large clients. Among other things, the firms have argued about who could use the 'Starr' and 'American International' trademarks. Under the settlement, AIG won't use the Starr or related names in doing insurance business, and C.V. Starr won't use certain AIG-related names." The Journal adds, "The settlement doesn't resolve a dispute over billions of dollars in AIG shares held by investment vehicle Starr International Co. Mr. Greenberg is chairman of Starr International. … The terms of the settlement are confidential, the companies said. A spokesman for AIG said it includes 'no monetary payment that is material to AIG's financial disclosures.' Of his work at C.V. Starr, Mr. Greenberg said yesterday the company has opened offices in recent months in London and Hong Kong and has invested hundreds of millions of dollars since he left AIG."

Siemens Suspect Claims Officials Had Role In Bribes. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B2, Crawford, Esterl) reports, "Siemens AG's troubles with a fraud investigation look set to grow, after a suspect gave German investigators details of a bribes-for-business scheme and alleged senior officials at the conglomerate were involved." The Journal continues, "Munich prosecutors say they are investigating allegations that officials at Siemens' telecommunications division diverted at least €200 million ($266.6 million) to a slush fund held at banks in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein for use to pay bribes. Authorities searched offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November." The Journal adds, "On Friday, prosecutors ordered the release of Reinhard Sickzek, 56 years old, a former sales official in the Siemens telecoms division, after he provided details of a system of bribes paid to potential customers in Africa, Russia and the Middle East, according to Mr. Sickzek's lawyer, Wolfgang Kreuzer. Mr. Sickzek also named at least one board member in the Siemens telecoms division as the supervisor of the scheme, Mr. Kreuzer said. … Mr. Sickzek's statement to Munich prosecutors, which encompasses hundreds of pages, raises questions about Siemens's determination to prevent corruption. Mr. Sickzek told police that a member of the Siemens Compliance Department advised him on how to prevent detection of the bribery operation. … Siemens says it is cooperating in the investigation as a witness."

Countrywide Financial Settles Spitzer Probe Of Lending Disparities. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B10, Davies) reports, "Countrywide Financial Corp., one of the nation's largest home-mortgage lenders, has settled an inquiry by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, into alleged discriminatory pricing practices and agreed to establish a $3 million consumer-education fund and implement other reforms." The Journal continues, "The settlement comes as other banks involved in the inquiry continue to resist Mr. Spitzer's efforts to obtain information about their lending practices." The Journal adds, "Mr. Spitzer launched the inquiry into lending by seven large banks -- including Citigroup Inc., HSBC Holdings PLC, and Wells Fargo & Co. -- in April 2005. Mr. Spitzer was elected governor of New York in November and takes office next month. .. .The inquiry began after a review of federal Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data showed that black and Latino customers were more likely than whites to receive high-priced loans in New York in 2004. … Mr. Spitzer sent the banks letters seeking loan-pricing data, such as credit scores, used to set interest rates and fees. .. .The banks sued Mr. Spitzer, contending that as federally-chartered institutions they are shielded from state scrutiny. A federal district court sided with the banks, whose position was backed by the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which joined the suit. The case is on appeal before the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan."

The Washington Post (12/6, D02, Day) reports, "Countrywide, which denied any wrongdoing, has agreed to review the loans in question to make sure the customers were charged the same rate as white borrowers with similar financial histories. The company made 20,000 mortgages in New York in 2004, including the 4,500 to black and Hispanic borrowers." The Post adds, "Neither the company nor Spitzer knows how much will be repaid until Countrywide's review is complete, but company spokesman Rick Simon said it wouldn't involve many loans or much money. 'We do not think there will be a lot of payments. We do not expect this to have great impact,' he said. He declined to be more specific." The Post notes, "The Calabasas, Calif., company said it consented to the agreement to avoid the cost and inconvenience of a longer investigation by Spitzer's office and possible litigation. The agreement also requires Countrywide to pay $200,000 to cover the cost of Spitzer's probe, beef up monitoring of its lending practices and invest $3 million in consumer education."

Congress Pushing Legislation To Make Pretexting A Federal Crime. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, B1, Conkey, Rogers) reports, "Spurred by the Hewlett Packard Co. scandal, Congress is moving toward passing legislation this week that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval." The Journal continues, "The measure targets so-called 'pretexting' tactics, where investigators use various schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy earlier this year in a now-infamous investigation into who leaked information to reporters." The Journal adds, "About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there's currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P executive Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws. … The federal legislation under consideration, which passed the House in April and may clear the Senate before Congress adjourns for the year, would make pretexting for phone records a federal crime, and spell out new federal criminal penalties for both those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records." The Journal notes, "Individuals and organizations that purchase confidential records -- knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent -- could be subject to fines of up to $500,000 and imprisonment for up to five years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes, or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen. … The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies."

SEC Plans Database To Crack Down On Hedge-Fund Insider Trading. Bloomberg (12/6, Westbrook, Scheer) reports, "The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission plans to have a database in place by next year that will help it crack down on hedge-fund insider trading, a senior agency official said. … 'The SEC presently does not have an electronic system to aggregate referrals based on the identities of the specific traders involved,' SEC Enforcement Director Linda Thomsen said before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. 'We anticipate implementing a new case tracking system by mid-2007.'" Bloomberg continues, "Illegal trading by hedge funds 'remains a substantial concern' to the SEC as the $1.3 trillion industry's influence over financial markets grows, Thomsen said. Hedge funds, which are loosely regulated private pools of capital, manage about 5 percent of U.S. assets and account for about 30 percent of U.S. equity trading volume." Bloomberg adds, "Today's hearing is the third convened by Senator Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee's chairman, in six months to examine oversight of insider trading. The Pennsylvania Republican circulated draft legislation aimed at halting illegal buying and selling of stocks that would require hedge funds accepting money from pension funds to submit to random inspections by the SEC. … His measure would also force hedge funds, which allow managers to participate substantially in the gains of money invested, to set up ethics codes and compliance programs and allow the Justice Department to give private citizens rewards for helping in prosecutions of insider trading cases."

Regulators Break Deadlock On Revising Audit Rule. The Washington Post (12/6, D01, Johnson) reports, "Regulators have reached an agreement in principle on how to revamp a contentious accounting rule that cost businesses millions of dollars more than anticipated, removing a pair of major stumbling blocks attacked by consumer advocates." The Post continues, "The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, plans to meet Dec. 19 to present its revised version of the regulation, officials said yesterday. The rule, which mandates that auditors review corporate financial controls, is the most disputed part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress in 2002 after frauds at Enron and WorldCom." The Post adds, "Businesses had objected to the cost of complying with the law's stricter audit provision. The accounting board's chairman, Mark Olson, said the new proposed guidance, which attempts to focus auditors on areas of highest risk, would more closely align the costs of the measure with its benefits. … Accounting board officials had clashed with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission over the issue in recent weeks. But a visit to the board's office Friday by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox helped put the process back on track." The Post notes, "Cox had floated the idea of requiring small companies to develop financial controls, which help prevent fraud and mistakes, but forcing auditors to test the controls only on a narrow and limited basis, in a memo that was leaked two weeks ago. But investor groups howled that the proposal would gut the law. … That idea now appears to be off the table, in part because of a report issued last week by a panel supported by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, funded by business interests, advocated a broad overhaul of U.S. regulation and urged new protections against shareholder lawsuits. But the panel rejected the notion that small companies could evade regular testing of their internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

FBI Reportedly Probing Threats To Rep Renzi. The Arizona Republic (12/6, House) reports, "Rep. Rick Renzi says the FBI is investigating several 'death threats' directed at him, as well as incidents of gunshots and other vandalism to his Flagstaff office. … 'I'm very concerned about a series of calls we've gotten - one we're taking very seriously,' said the Arizona Republican, in an interview today." The Republic continues, "A Justice Department official in Phoenix would neither confirm nor deny a pending investigation into the incidents described by Renzi. … Renzi, who was elected to his third term on Nov. 7, said incidents of vandalism dates from several months ago, and include instances of golf balls and firecrackers thrown at his congressional offices. … But concerns over the vandalism heightened last week, after gunshots were fired at the congressional office on North San Francisco Street, either late on Nov. 28 or early Nov. 29. .. .Along with the vandalism, there's been a series of threatening telephone calls to the office, including death threats to the congressman, said Renzi. … One call, in particular, is prompting the most concern. Renzi declined to provide the details of that message. … The FBI is conducting interviews regarding the calls and the shooting, Renzi said."

Pennsylvania Man Could Face Federal Death Sentence In Murder-For-Hire Case. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/6, Simonich) reports, "What began as an extramarital affair for an Aleppo man is now a federal criminal case that could cost him his life." The Post-Gazette continues, "Grand jurors in Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday indicted Eugene Talik Jr. on a murder-for-hire charge in the death of his lover, Kelly Jo Elliott. … Mr. Talik, 38, also was charged with conspiracy and interstate domestic violence. The grand jury alleges that he hired an acquaintance to kill Ms. Elliott, 28, so word of their affair would never reach his wife." The Post-Gazette adds, "Prosecutors say Mr. Talik himself strangled Ms. Elliott after the man he hired decided he could not go through with the killing. … The second man has not been identified by federal prosecutors or the grand jury. He is cooperating with the U.S. attorney's staff in Wheeling as it prepares its case against Mr. Talik." The Post-Gazette notes, "Mr. Talik could face a sentence of life in prison or death if he is convicted. For prosecutors to pursue a capital case against him, they would need approval from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. … Mr. Gonzales earlier this year authorized the death penalty in a case similar to the one against Mr. Talik. It involves Donna Moonda, of Hermitage in Mercer County, who is charged with hiring a man to murder her husband, a wealthy physician."

US Seeks Disqualification Of Attorney In Utah Grant Funds Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (12/5, Manson) reports, "Prosecutors are seeking to disqualify the lawyer for a Layton (UT) couple accused of stealing federal grant money from Davis School District, claiming he gave legal advice to witnesses in the criminal investigation." The Tribune continues, "The defense attorney, Paul Gotay, denies that his actions have caused a legal conflict that would require him to step down and is fighting to continue his representation of Susan G. Ross and John D. Ross. … 'My head was put in the vise, and they tried to squeeze it,' Gotay said Monday after a hearing in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, where the disqualification motion was discussed. 'It's a good thing I have a hard head.'" The Tribune adds, "Magistrate Brooke Wells has set a hearing for Monday to hear arguments on the disqualification motion and Gotay's request for transcripts of grand jury testimony by the witnesses. … In the disqualification motion, filed late Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that as early as May 2005, Gotay appeared with the Rosses at the office of the FBI, the agency investigating the alleged fraud that drained the district of millions in Title I money meant to help disadvantaged students. … Then, when agents attempted to interview two witnesses they believed had knowledge of the scheme - Keith Evans and Terry Applegate - both men said Gotay was their attorney, the motion said. … In addition, Gotay himself, by engaging in 'multiple financial transactions with the defendants,' has personal knowledge relevant to the case and is likely to be a witness in the prosecution, according to the motion." The Tribune notes, "Gotay has said the attempt to disqualify him stems from the fact that the Rosses paid him a fixed fee for his representation after they came under investigation in the spring of 2005. The couple's assets were frozen when they were indicted Nov. 21 by a federal grand jury."

Alabama Amber Alert Canceled As Boy's Mother Charged In Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Reeves) reports, "A north Alabama woman who claimed that someone stole a car with her 5-year-old son asleep in the back seat was charged Tuesday afternoon with hindering prosecution, and her boyfriend was charged with capital murder in the boy's death. An Amber Alert was issued Monday morning when Shalinda Glass reported that her son had been abducted outside an Albertville convenience store. A massive search was conducted by police and members of the FBI and the Alabama Bureau of Investigation. It turns out Glass was lying." Etowah County Sheriff James Hayes "said Glass told police that her son, who was in kindergarten, died from a beating after he brought home a bad progress report from school Friday."

USA Today (12/6, 4A, Koch) reports, "An Alabama mother's report that her slain 5-year-old son had been asleep in a car when it was stolen was a hoax, and she and her boyfriend have been charged in the boy's death, police said Tuesday." USA continues, "The body of the kindergartner, Geontae Glass, was found early Tuesday in the trunk of the car, which was parked outside a house owned by the mother's boyfriend, said Capt. Michael Jones of the Etowah County Sheriff's office. "They came up with a plan to disguise the homicide," Jones said of Shalinda Glass, 25, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles. … Towles has been charged with capital murder and Glass with hindering prosecution." USA adds, "The story could be the latest in a string of hoaxes, from 'runaway bride' Jennifer Wilbanks of Georgia, who faked her own kidnapping, to Sarah Everson, a Missouri woman who collected donations by pretending to be pregnant with sextuplets. Some appear aimed at financial gain or avoiding prosecution — or marriage. Others are odder: John Mark Karr claimed to have killed JonBenét Ramsey until evidence showed otherwise. … 'In Alabama, Jones says, police concluded that Glass' story was false after interviewing her and others. He said Glass has no prior criminal record but Towles, who runs a barbecue restaurant, has a record of drug offenses. … Glass, who also has a 7-year-old daughter, told police Monday that the boy was sleeping in the back seat of a car that she left running when she went into a convenience store in Albertville, about 80 miles northeast of Birmingham."

DOJ Creates Team To Review Prince George's County Prosecutors' Office. The Washington Post (12/6, Castaneda) reports, "A team of current and former state prosecutors from across the country is meeting this week with Prince George's County prosecutors, police, judges and defense attorneys to assess how well the state's attorney's office is performing and what it can do to improve." The Post continues, "The broad independent review is being conducted at the request of State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who will begin his second term in January. Ivey, who was reelected without opposition in the November general election, said no event or case prompted the review." The Post adds, "In an interview, Ivey said he wanted to conduct such a review from the time he first assumed the office in December 2002 but was unable to because of budgetary constraints. … He said the review is being conducted at no cost to the state's attorney's office." The Post notes, "The team of four current and former prosecutors that will be reviewing the office was put together by the Bureau of Justice Assistance, which is part of the Justice Department. … The review team will be supported by two staff members from the bureau, said Joseph Trotter, an official with the bureau."

Homeless Louisiana Man Charged With 23 Murders. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Foster) reports, "A near-broke nobody who lived with his sister before moving into a homeless shelter," Ronald J. Dominique "went willingly, leaning heavily on a cane, when officers came to get him last week. … Even with a meek persona, investigators said, Dominique bound and strangled or smothered 23 men and teenage boys in south Louisiana in what the FBI considered its most urgent serial killing case." The AP notes, "Dominique, 42, was arrested Friday at a homeless shelter in Houma and charged with two murders. On Monday, authorities filed nine more counts against him and said more charges were possible. … FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said FBI profilers felt this was the most significant current serial killer case in the country in terms of the number of victims and its time span – the killings took place from 1997 to 2005. 'A serial killer like this hides in plain sight,' Bernazzani said. 'They do not disturb people. That's why they are so effective.'"

Jefferson Faces Voters Saturday With Backdrop Of Bribery Allegations. Under the headline "Katrina Struck District, Scandal Struck Dem," USA Today (12/6, 8A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago. Now weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer. Rep. William Jefferson, a Democrat, has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime." USA adds, "Saturday's vote will write the epilogue on the past two years' scandals in Congress." Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said, "He asks voters to consider him on his record," adding "that Jefferson 'has brought home billions' of dollars in federal aid since Katrina struck. 'Now is not the time to send someone new, who doesn't know anyone and who can't negotiate our needs.'"

Under the headline "The $90,000 Question," the New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/6, Alpert) reports, "Judith Woods and Dwight Garrett know all about the $90,000 FBI agents say they found in…Jefferson's freezer, but they are of different minds on how the federal probe…should influence voters in Saturday's runoff." Garrett, "an insurance broker and adjuster and self-described community activist, admits he was 'shocked' when he heard about the $90,000. But he said he's decided to stick with Jefferson because the government's case 'apparently isn't very strong or they would have indicted him by now.' Jefferson, he said, wouldn't be the first African-American politician wrongly tainted with false charges." Woods, "a social worker, said she has voted for Jefferson in the past but can't conceive of what Jefferson has in mind when he promises an honorable explanation for the allegations against him." The Picayune adds that "perhaps more than any other issue, including the federal government's continued role in hurricane recovery efforts, how voters see the federal probe…will determine whether Jefferson is elected."

Reputed Chicago Mob Boss Asks Judge For Larger Cell. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/6, Robinson) reports, "A reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family pleaded with a federal judge Tuesday for more space in jail while he awaits trial on charges of plotting 18 slayings going back three decades. 'I'm taking 15 medications and my back is killing me,' Frank Calabrese Sr., 69, told U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel. He said overcrowding on his floor at the Metropolitan Correctional Center is so bad that he can't concentrate on court papers and study the charges against him. … 'All I want to do is be in a two-man room so I can study my case,' said the portly, bearded defendant." The AP notes, "Zagel was holding a hearing on complaints by a number of the defendants charged in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets that their health and related problems are not being met in the MCC."

The Chicago Tribune (12/6, Bush, 617K) reports, "Zagel and federal prosecutors said that they would look into the matter but stopped short of promising any quick relief. Zagel said that getting Calabrese into a different room might require putting him on a different floor, which in turn could bring him into contact with other defendants in the case—something federal prosecutors have sought to avoid. 'I would be reluctant to interfere with the separation order,' the judge said."

Memphis City Council Fails To Remove, Censure Indicted Councilmen. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/6, Jones, 163K) reports, "At the end of the day, Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete remained in their seats on the Memphis City Council dais. … Despite federal bribery charges against the two, the council failed to muster enough support Tuesday to ask them to resign or to censure them." The Commercial Appeal notes, "The resolution asking Ford and Peete to resign failed on a 6-6 vote during a morning executive session. A separate motion to initiate censure proceedings on the pair failed by a 3-5 vote in the council's personnel, intergovernmental and annexation committee. Peete did not attend committee meetings, but showed up for the full council meeting in the afternoon. Ford, however, attended meetings all day and voted against the censure motion and cast a 'no' vote that doomed the resolution requesting he and Peete step down. … Earlier he told The Commercial Appeal 'This is about color.'"

MySpace Developing Method To Keep Sex Offenders Off Site. The New York Times (12/6, Richtel) reports, "MySpace.com, the social networking site, said Tuesday that it was developing technologies that would help combat the use of its site by sexual predators by cross-referencing its more than 130 million users against state databases of registered sex offenders." The Times continues, "The Web site, which is owned by the News Corporation, said that within 30 days it planned to deploy the technology, which will seek to identify known sex offenders not just by their names, but also by date of birth, height, weight and ZIP code. …. If the automated system finds a potential match between a MySpace user and a registered sex offender, employees will try to verify the match or determine if it is a false positive. Users who are registered sex offenders, MySpace said, will be denied access to the site and, depending in the circumstances, be turned over to law enforcement." The Times adds, "The system, which MySpace executives said was the first of its kind, comes as the site has faced scrutiny and criticism by advocates of children's safety. Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said the technology was a potentially useful step in slowing the incidence of sexual solicitation of minors."

California Prison On Lockdown As FBI Investigates Attack On Guard. The AP (12/6) reports, "The federal penitentiary in Atwater will remain on lockdown as the FBI investigates the stabbing of a prison employee, a prison spokesman said. The facility has been locked down since an inmate attacked an employee Nov. 28 with a homemade knife, U.S. Penitentiary Atwater Executive Assistant Jesse Gonzalez said. The staff member was treated at a hospital for non-life threatening injuries and returned to work, Gonzalez said." The AP notes that the "inmates will remain in their cells as investigators find out how the prisoner made the knife, said FBI Supervising Special Agent John Gliatta."

Spammers Keeping Ahead Of Anti-Spam Law Enforcement. The Washington Times (12/6, Rowland) reports, "Three years after the federal Can-Spam Act went into effect, unsolicited commercial e-mails are assaulting inboxes at record rates as spamming technology grows more sophisticated. … 'I think the majority of the industry would say that spam levels are at the highest they've ever been,' said Scott Chasin, chief technology officer at MX Logic Inc., a Colorado-based Internet security firm." The Times continues, "In September, unsolicited commercial e-mail messages accounted for more than 77 percent of all e-mail filtered by the company. Of that amount, only a fraction -- 0.27 percent -- was in compliance with federal anti-spamming law. … 'Spammers are creative and industrious,' said Michael Davis, a lawyer with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which is responsible for enforcing the act. 'Because of their dedication and their technological sophistication, they have found ways to stay oftentimes one step ahead of law enforcement.'" The Times adds, "Under the Can-Spam Act, marketers are allowed to send unsolicited commercial e-mails as long as they include a truthful subject line and routing information; an opt-out mechanism; a notice that labels the e-mail as an advertisement; and a valid postal address. … 'The challenge of enforcement does not stem from a lack of teeth. Can-Spam allows the FTC to seek civil penalties of up to $11,000 per violation, plus further fines for spammers who unlawfully "harvest" or extract e-mail addresses from Web sites or Web services. The law also gives the Justice Department authority to seek criminal punishment for violators who falsify header information or hijack a computer to send e-mail without a user's consent. … So far, the FTC has filed 26 lawsuits for violations of the act, Mr. Davis said. In those cases, federal courts have awarded civil penalties totaling more than $10 million."

Barr Urges Limits On Government's Use Of Cellphone Taps. In an op-ed for the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/6), former Rep. Bob Barr writes, "Modern cellphones are nothing more than miniature computers with small but sensitive microphones attached. Law enforcement agencies are discovering the significant benefit of drawing on that powerful combination of technology, by increasingly seeking court permission to use cellphones in the hands of suspects as surreptitious listening devices. Unfortunately for anyone who happens to be nearby, cellphones thus utilized as listening devices will pick up their conversations as well." Barr continues, "This latest example of electronic snooping should draw attention to the need for comprehensive national legislation to more clearly define the privacy rights of American citizens. Thus far, Congress has shown itself completely uninterested in addressing such fundamental civil liberty issues, much to the delight of the administration of George W. Bush, which continues to push the envelope of electronic snooping as far as possible." Barr adds, "I first became aware that the federal government wanted to outfit regular phones — so-called 'land lines' — with devices that could be activated remotely by government investigators to allow agents to hear whatever was being spoken into or near the receiver, about 10 years ago, shortly after I was elected to Congress. … At the time, the Justice Department was trying to require telecommunications companies to incorporate technology in their phones to enable the government to engage in such surreptitious listening. The law the government was trying to use to do this was passed in the early 1990s and called the Communications Assistance to Law Enforcement Act. … We stopped the government from such heavy-handed and privacy-invasive directives at the time, but in the post-Sept. 11 world, with a Congress almost completely submissive to executive branch entreaties to increase its powers to invade citizens' privacy, such efforts appear now to be quaintly outdated." Barr concludes, "We should also force Congress to place limits on the extent such technology might be employed in circumstances where private and lawful conversations might be picked up. In the absence of such limits, it is only a matter of time, for example, before the government starts asking courts to allow it to surreptitiously take photographs with cellphones thus equipped. Perhaps it already has."

Meanwhile, ABC News' The Blotter (12/5, Walter, Kjellman, 3:38 p.m.) reported on the Genovese case ruling and noted, "The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off. … 'The courts have given law enforcement a blank check for surveillance,' Richard Rehbock, attorney for defendant John Ardito, told ABC News. Judge Kaplan's ruling said otherwise. 'While a mobile device makes interception easier and less costly to accomplish than a stationary one, this does not mean that it implicated new or different privacy concerns.' … 'It does not invade zones of privacy that the government could not reach by more conventional means.'" ABC added, "The FBI maintains the methods used in its investigation of the Genovese family are within the law. 'The FBI does not discuss sensitive surveillance techniques other than to emphasize that any electronic surveillance is done pursuant to a court order and ongoing judicial scrutiny,' Agent Jim Margolin told ABC News."

FBI Twice Has Interviewed Former LANL Employee About Classified Data. CBS News (12/5, Attkisson) reported on its Web site, "The FBI has conducted two interviews and may schedule a third with the woman who walked out carrying classified documents from what's supposed to be one of the most secure facilities in the world, the Los Alamos National Laboratory, CBS News has learned. … Sources say 22-year-old Jessica Quintana was hired to archive data from weapons tests, and even had access to information on how to deactivate the locks that keep nuclear weapons from firing. Somehow, she managed to leave the laboratory with hundreds of pages of classified documents and several portable computer storage devices known as 'thumb drives.' CBS added that Rep. Ed Markey "plans to fire off a scathing letter to the Energy Secretary demanding answers. 'These are secrets that could be valuable to al Qaeda,' Markey tells CBS News."

Questions Raised About Milberg Weiss Indictment. The ABA Journal (12/6, Neil) reports, "Secret cash payments. falsified court documents. Behind-the-scenes deals between favored clients and their counsel. … All the elements of a John Grisham potboiler are present in the case of United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman." The Journal continues, "The nation's leading plaintiffs securities class-action law firm is on the receiving end of the first criminal indictment filed against a major law firm in U.S. history. The New York City-based firm—which has been both celebrated and vilified for its ferocious attacks on alleged corporate wrongdoing—lost about 40 percent of its 128 lawyers in the five months after its indictment and may be fighting for its very existence." The Journal adds, "Lost in the spectacle, according to critics of the government's case, is the question of whether prosecutors have gone too far. Even if Milberg Weiss is found guilty, indicting an entire law firm causes more harm than good, they contend. … The federal government's controversial tactic of getting corporations that are under investigation to surrender their attorney-client privilege in order to avoid prosecution is now being applied to law firms, with disastrous results for the legal profession and clients, the critics say. … And they are concerned that more law firms will be viewed as fair game for the same kind of aggressive criminal prosecutions the U.S. Department of Justice has pursued against a number of high-profile corporations in the post-Enron era." The Journal notes, "Even if the allegations are proven, the government has failed to exercise appropriate prosecutorial discretion, according to Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. 'The government obtains little or nothing by indicting the firm, when only a small number of attorneys allegedly were involved in the wrongdoing,' he says. … If the Justice Department is concerned about deterrence, says Gillers, 'the threat of criminal prosecution and the indictment of two prominent plaintiffs class-action lawyers is plenty chilling. I don't think you have to indict the firm to bring home the point that lawyers are at risk for this kind of conduct or alleged conduct.'"

US Agrees To $500,000 Settlement In VA Cancer Study Case. The Albany Times Union (12/5, Lyons) reports, "The federal government agreed to pay $500,000 to settle the first of seven federal lawsuits brought by the widows of veterans who died in a corrupt cancer research program at Stratton VA Medical Center Hospital, the Times Union has learned." The Times-Union continues, "The six other widows, who still have lawsuits pending against the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, are finding the government less willing to admit their husbands were used as guinea pigs in the tainted drug studies." The Times-Union adds, "The Justice Department has not agreed to settle the remaining cases, in part because it's never been determined -- or publicly disclosed -- that more than one veteran died as a result of the corruption. The government's position has been that the men had advanced stages of cancer, so it is impossible to determine what killed them, attorneys in the case said. … But in at least one case it was clear, and Justice Department lawyers recently settled with the family of that victim, James J. DiGeorgio, a 71-year-old Air Force veteran from Brunswick who died at Stratton in June 2001. The settlement comes a little more than a year after a former hospital researcher, Paul H. Kornak, was sentenced to nearly six years in prison for his role in the scandal. … VA officials and federal prosecutors have portrayed Kornak as an out-of-control researcher who forged medical records to push cancern-stricken patients into drug studies that allegedly paid the hospital thousands of dollars. But attorneys for the families and people familiar with the hospital's operation contend the corruption was widespread and Kornak was following orders from oncology doctors."

Former Springfield, MA, Mayor To Testify In Suit Against FBI. The Springfield (MA) Republican (12/6, Barry) reports, "Former Springfield Mayor Michael J. Albano is among witnesses scheduled to testify in Boston federal court on behalf of four men and their families suing the government for an FBI-sanctioned frame-up in a 1965 murder." The Republican continues, "Albano, once a Massachusetts Parole Board member, joins two former governors, notorious gangster-cum-informants and corrupt federal agents as witnesses for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the estates of the late Louis Greco and Enrico 'Henry' Tameleo. … The four - two of whom died in prison - were wrongly convicted of the murder of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan, who met a shower of mob bullets in a dark alley in Chelsea. They were falsely identified by onetime hit man Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza, whom the FBI wooed as a top-level informant in the 1960s. The three initially received death sentences in 1969, later commuted to life in prison. … What's more, the government knew it, even ignoring chatter about the then-proposed hit picked up on a secret FBI wire tap before Deegan's ambush, according to once-secret bureau records presented to bolster the plaintiffs' case." The Republican notes, "Reports on the matter were made public during a 2001 U.S. Justice Department probe that exposed collusion among former Boston agents and their informants. Limone and Salvati were released after 30 years; Greco and Tameleo were pardoned posthumously. Their families are suing for malicious prosecution and conspiracy."

California High Court Considers Key Tobacco Case. The California Recorder (12/6, Mckee) reports, "More than 40 years ago, at age 13, Leslie Grisham was already hooked on smoking, convinced doing it would make her part of the cool crowd. … Even as subsequent scientific evidence revealed smoking could cause serious health problems, the Los Angeles-area woman claims she was misled by industry ads proclaiming cigarettes safe." The Recorder continues, "Five years ago, however, Grisham's faith was shattered when she was diagnosed with severe periodontal disease, which doctors said had been caused by toxins in cigarette smoke. She sued Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., accusing them of deceiving her for four decades about the safety of their products. … Today, the California Supreme Court will hear arguments in Grisham's case to resolve an unsettled point of law in the vast realm of smoking suits. At what point, the court must decide, are longtime smokers who relied on manufacturers' false safety claims required to file suit -- when health problems emerge or much earlier, when smokers realize they're addicted?" The Recorder notes, "Millions of dollars in damages hinge on the court's decision. If the justices find that the statute of limitations tolls upon awareness of addiction, thousands of already sick smokers could be left with no recourse, while manufacturers' exposure to damages would be sharply limited."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probing Conditions At Seattle Jail. The Seattle Times (12/6, Carter) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has opened a civil-rights investigation into the King County Jail in Seattle, focusing on sexual abuse of inmates and on allegations of inadequate suicide prevention and contagious-disease control." The Times continues, "Lawyers from the department's Special Litigation Section met with jail and public-health officials Monday and will conduct a wide-ranging investigation that may be expanded beyond those topics. The county learned of the investigation in a letter received by King County Executive Ron Sims last month. … 'I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail,' said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. 'Beyond that, I cannot comment.'" The Times adds, "The investigation will focus on the jail in downtown Seattle and will not involve the Regional Justice Center in Kent. .. .Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial after a jury failed to reach a verdict. The assaults surfaced in April 2005 after a female inmate was transferred to state prison and spoke up about the assault."

The AP (12/6) reports, "Jail and public-health officials met with Justice Department lawyers on Monday, and they plan to cooperate fully with the investigation, said jail director Reed Holtgeerts." The AP adds, "Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates, while another is to be retried following a hung jury. Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999 -- three hangings, two poisonings, a suicide by jumping, plus a carbon-monoxide poisoning by an inmate on home confinement, according to the county. The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus, or MRSA, commonly called 'Mersa.' .. .Two weeks ago, the county released a report it commissioned which found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication were among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention."

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (12/6, Castro) reports, "The past year has been a tough one for the King County Jail with corrections officers caught sexually abusing inmates, suicides and reports of contagious diseases. … Now, the federal government has begun an investigation into jail operations." The P-I adds, "Monday, investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice visited the King County Jail to meet with staff and tour the facility, said Carolyn Duncan, spokeswoman for King County Executive Ron Sims. … 'We're cooperating,' Duncan said Tuesday. 'Whatever suggestions they make, we're obviously going to be making changes.'" The P-I adds, "In an Oct. 30 letter to Sims, the Justice Department told the county it would be examining the incarceration and treatment of inmates housed at the main jail in downtown Seattle, which has a bed capacity of 1,697. … 'Our investigation will focus on the protection of inmates from harm, including, but not limited to, custodial sexual misconduct, inadequate suicide prevention measures, and inadequate contagious disease prevention measures,' wrote Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim, who oversees the DOJ Civil Rights Division. … The letter went on to suggest the federal government may actually be able to assist King County in its efforts to improve conditions at the jail and the government may be able to provide financial assistance."

Atlanta Police Provide Few Details On Use Of "No-Knock" Warrants. The AP (12/6, Bluestein) reports, "Atlanta police often offer only cursory details when asking judges for so-called 'no-knock' warrants that allow them to burst into homes unannounced, like the one used when an elderly woman was killed in a shootout with plainclothes officers as they stormed her home, according to an analysis by The Associated Press." The AP continues, "Police Chief Richard Pennington called for a review of how his agency uses the warrants after Kathryn Johnson died and three officers were wounded Nov. 21 in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnson's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnson was 92 years old; authorities claim she was 88." The AP adds, "An AP review of all no-knock warrants filed in Atlanta's Fulton County this year found that authorities often give scant detail when applying for the warrants, which are typically used to search for drugs and weapons. The special warrants are intended to prevent suspects from getting rid of evidence or to protect officers from suspects who can show a threat of violence. .. .In an August affidavit, an officer pursuing a suspect named 'Kabuki' offered a two-line explanation for the no-knock warrant, claiming that an informant said people at the home 'always carry pistols' and could store guns. In others, officers only detailed their years of experience with the police force as justification for no-knock powers. … Critics of no-knock warrants say Atlanta is no anomaly when it comes to judges granting the special search warrants to police on few details."

Federal Prosecutors Face High Hurdle In Police Shooting Trials. Newsday (12/6, DeStefano) reports, "While federal officials said they are only monitoring developments in the fatal shooting of Sean Bell, new data indicate that making criminal cases against law enforcement officials such as cops is still a difficult task for the Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Office, the office that would have jurisdiction if the case shifted to the FBI. … Tuesday attorneys for the wounded men signaled they would be waiting to see what happens to the Brown case before going to federal prosecutors." Newsday notes, "Nationally, data show that 96 percent of civil rights cases are not prosecuted." Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse "statistics for fiscal 2005 showed that weak or insufficient evidence and lack of evidence of criminal intent were key reasons for tossing the cases." Additionally, "said one federal prosecutor yesterday who didn't want to be named," is the high standard for proving criminal intent. The official "added that the issue of self defense in a police shooting could make a federal case harder to prove."

New York Village Challenges DOJ's Stand On Election System. The New York Journal News (12/6, Sadler) reports that the village of Port Chester "is challenging the federal government's claim that its election system illegally disenfranchises Hispanic voters, possibly paving the way for an expensive legal battle." The News continues, "The Board of Trustees voted unanimously tonight to notify the U.S. Department of Justice that it does not believe the village's at-large election system violates Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act, as claimed by the Justice Department. The board reached the decision after reviewing data the Justice Department provided the village. … 'The federal government's data does not credibly support their allegations and contentions,' Mayor Gerald Logan said before the vote. 'I speak for the entire Board of Trustees when I say that we are shocked. The federal government has been working on their case for the past three years. I can only imagine the waste of taxpayer dollars.'" The News adds, "Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, said he had already notified the Justice Department of the board's decision and 'they've indicated they will get back to us.' Piscionere said he could not speculate about whether a lawsuit is imminent. … Tonight's decision came in response to an April 20 letter from the Justice Department to Village Attorney Anthony Cerreto that threatened to sue the village unless it switches to district voting. The letter called for a districting plan that includes a majority Hispanic district and concluded that 'voting patterns in Port Chester are polarized by ethnicity.'"

Divided 9th Circuit Panel Upholds Hawaii School's Admissions Policy. The New York Times (12/6, Liptak, 1.16M) reports the Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, "private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7." Students "may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled, citing what it said were unique factors in the history of Hawaii, the plight of Native Hawaiians and the schools' distinctively remedial mission, which Congress has repeatedly endorsed." The schools "are the only beneficiary of the enormous legacy of a 19th-century Hawaiian princess. They have an enrollment of some 5,000 students, from kindergarten through 12th grade, on campuses on three islands. Admission is a great prize, as students pay about $1,800 in annual tuition for an education worth about $20,000." The suit "argued that the admission policy ran afoul of a Reconstruction-era law, the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The court, splitting almost entirely along partisan lines, ruled that the prohibition did not apply to the schools' admissions program. (The eight judges in the majority were appointed by Democratic presidents. All but one of the dissenters were appointed by Republicans.)"

The AP (12/6, Kravets) reports, "The decision by a 15-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned an earlier ruling by three of the same judges that the Kamehameha Schools policy amounted to unlawful discrimination." The AP adds, "In Tuesday's decision, the majority noted that the case was unique because Congress has singled out the plight of native Hawaiians for improvement, just as lawmakers have done with Alaskan natives and American Indians. … The policy 'furthers the urgent need for better education of Native Hawaiians, which Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary,' the court said." The AP notes, "Admission to the elite school is first granted to qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings available. .. .Only one in eight eligible applicants is admitted to the schools, which serve about 5,400 students at three campuses. … The decision came a day after the Supreme Court suggested during arguments in a different case that it might ban the practice of race-based admissions in public schools, even if the policy was intended to create racial harmony."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Weinstein) reports that "a sharply divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that a private school can favor Native Hawaiians for admissions in an effort to 'counteract the significant, current educational deficits' experienced by the islands' indigenous population. In an 8-7 ruling, the US 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco held that the admissions policy of Hawaii's Kamehameha Schools is constitutional because it is narrowly tailored to remedy a well-documented problem and does not unnecessarily trammel on the rights of other students." This case is distinguished from and "nothing like" the current Supreme Court case about public schools in Seattle and Louisville because Kamehameha "is private; Seattle and Louisville are public. Kamehameha involves remedial preferences; Seattle and Louisville involved diversity;" and while Kamehameha "involves preferences of a kind explicitly adopted by Congress; Seattle and Louisville do not."

The New York Times (12/6, Liptak) reports that the Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, "private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7. Students may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled;" but Eric Grant, the plaintiff's lawyer, "said he would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case" and "the closeness of the vote, he added, made Supreme Court review more likely."

LATimes Calls On Justice Kennedy To Uphold Affirmative-Action Plans. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/6, 850K) opines that it was "clear" that the outcome of the Supreme Court's affirmative action cases "hangs on the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy." The Times editorializes, "Some of Kennedy's comments from the bench Monday were ominous for the school districts. But if Kennedy views Brown in the proper perspective, he will provide a fifth vote to allow school districts, including the Los Angeles Unified School District, to experiment with ways to bring children of different races together in the classroom."

Professor Calls For "Race-Baiting Language" To End In Affirmative-Action Dialogue. In a column appearing in USA Today (12/6, 21A, 2.27M), Jonathan Turley, the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest law at George Washington University, notes that the Supreme Court "once again ventured into the quagmire of affirmative action" in two cases it is now considering. Turley writes, "Even after many decades, affirmative action remains one of the most contentious issues in our society. Yet, like abortion, there appears to be less, not more, true dialogue. … All too often, critics of affirmative action are dismissed as racists." Turley continues, "Most Americans are neither racist nor hostile to the ends sought by affirmative action. It remains a question of means." After reviewing varying stances and rationales on affirmative action, Turley writes, "It is time to have a substantive dialogue about the promise and limits of affirmative action — free of race-baiting language."

Egyptian Investigator Sues Over Contractor's Allegedly Racist Emails. The New York Times (12/6, Rashbaum) reports that an anonymous Egyptian-born analyst, part of a New York City Police Department "elite undercover unit of Middle Eastern and Asian investigators who use their foreign-language skills online to search out potential terrorist threats against the city," has filed a discrimination lawsuit , charging that "he was subjected to hundreds of blistering anti-Muslim and anti-Arab e-mail messages sent out by" Bruce Tefft, who "worked for Orion, a company that provided the department with counter-terrorism information culled from its massive database, including news articles and other materials known as open-source intelligence." The Times adds, "According to the suit, the briefing messages were preceded by commentary from Mr. Tefft that included virulent anti-Muslim and anti-Arab statements." Department spokesman Paul J. Browne "said in an e-mail message that the department moved to stop the e-mail messages when it became aware of a complaint about them."

Panel Calls For Standard That Would Phase Out Paperless Voting. The Washington Post (12/6, A9, Barr, 690K) reports, that the Technical Guidelines Development Committee "voted yesterday to begin developing a national standard that could result in the gradual phasing out of the paperless electronic voting machines in use across the Washington region and in many parts of the country. … 'This seems to mark the end of an era' for paperless electronic voting, said Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan organization that tracks changes in the country's election systems." The Post adds, "Some politicians indicated yesterday that they would move more quickly to add verification systems -- also known as paper trails -- to voting systems that lack them."

Microsoft "Resets" Technical Documents In Compliance Dispute. IDG News Service (12/6, Gross) reports, "A U.S. district judge on Tuesday praised the schedule set up in a revamped technical documentation project that's part of the 4-year-old antitrust settlement between Microsoft Corp. and the U.S. government." IDG continues, "Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, hailed a new plan that would deliver 58 documents related to Microsoft's software communication protocols by Dec. 15, with more documents coming in February, April and May." IDG adds, "Kollar-Kotelly in May approved a two-year extension to parts of her antitrust judgment against Microsoft because of ongoing problems in the technical documentation for Microsoft's software communication protocols. … 'I hope this approach works,' Kollar-Kotelly said during Tuesday's antitrust compliance hearing. 'We seem to be on the correct time table.'" IDG notes, "Kollar-Kotelly, in an antitrust settlement approved in November 2002, ordered Microsoft to create the technical documentation so that competing software companies can buy licenses to Microsoft's communications protocols and make products that work with Microsoft software. .. .The judge expressed support for the new plan after numerous delays and past complaints about the quality of technical documentation. 'We'll have to see if this achieves the [results] that have eluded us so far,' she said after Microsoft representatives explained the technical documentation 'reset,' as they called it."

US Air CEO Will Abandon Delta Bid If Management Balks. USA Today (12/6, 1B, Adams) reports, "US Airways will give up its proposed takeover of Delta Air Lines if management there can't be persuaded of the benefits, US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Tuesday." USA continues, "Parker said he's not prepared to fight Delta's management in bankruptcy court by submitting a merger plan to the judge without the backing of Delta officials. … 'We have to get to a point where we are all working together on this, or it's not going to happen,' Parker said at a meeting with editors and reporters at USA TODAY. 'This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense.'" USA adds, "US Airways has made an unsolicited takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock to acquire Delta, the USA's third-biggest carrier. … Delta's management has rebuffed the offer, saying it's too risky and that Delta is better off as an independent airline. Delta declined to comment on Parker's remarks. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein has repeatedly voiced opposition to the merger proposal since US Airways announced it Nov. 15." USA notes, "In a memo to employees Tuesday, Grinstein said Delta, 'is making crucial progress toward becoming a strong, independent, stand-alone company.' … But because Delta is in bankruptcy, its management does not have complete control of the company's fate. Its creditors must approve Delta's post-bankruptcy business plan before the airline can exit. Delta executives plan to unveil the plan this month."

Delta CEO Says He Will Resist Merger. The Washington Post (12/6, D01, Wilber) reports, "The top executive at Delta Air Lines said he would vigorously defend his company against an unsolicited takeover bid, insisting that the Atlanta-based carrier would be a stronger company and better for consumers if it remained independent." The Post continues, "In his first interview since US Airways Group announced its merger proposal last month, Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said he was confident that creditors would accept his reorganization plan. He also said it would be difficult for a combined company to overcome internal and regulatory hurdles. … 'Whenever you go from having two carriers to one, or three carriers to two, that is going to have a consumer impact,' he said. 'There will be a loss of service in some smaller communities. There will be an increase in fares. . . . There is no question that there are antitrust issues that won't be quickly or easily resolved.' .. 'I think the track record of good mergers is hard to find' in the airline industry, he said." The Post adds, "Delta and US Airways are battling to convince creditors, regulators and legislators of the virtues of their competing plans. US Airways has dominated the early rounds. Its stock price soared the day the merger proposal was announced but has since retreated slightly. … Many outside analysts and airline executives think the industry needs to consolidate to improve its financial outlook. .. .Several analysts and executives at other airlines said US Airways appeared to have lost momentum, as investors and creditors look more carefully at the merger proposal. Among their concerns are the reaction of regulators, the new Democratic-controlled Congress and the short time available for US Airways to complete a deal. US Airways hopes to do that before Delta leaves bankruptcy protection, which is expected next year. Otherwise, US Airways would lose some cost-cutting advantages it could gain in the bankruptcy process."

Critics Knock FCC Chair's Attempt To Break Telecom Deadlock. USA Today (12/6, 5B, Cauley) reports, "If you can't settle through negotiation, why not try a different approach? … So it goes these days at the Federal Communications Commission, which is using legal maneuvering to break its 2-2 deadlock on the pending AT&T-BellSouth merger." USA continues, "The $80 billion deal just needs FCC approval to close. It already has received the other necessary approval, from the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions. … Last week, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin asked the panel's third Republican to cast the tiebreaking vote on the deal. The commissioner, Robert McDowell, has recused himself because he worked as a lobbyist for a trade group opposing the deal. McDowell also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association. … An official can be unrecused if the FCC's general counsel determines that the need for his or her participation outweighs public ethics concerns." USA adds, "Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers' Union, which opposes the deal, calls the move 'the most unusual thing I've ever seen in my entire career.' .. .Kimmelman says he was helping to negotiate an agreement among AT&T and the two Democrats and Martin when the chairman pulled the plug. … 'We thought we were making progress,' Kimmelman says. 'It's just bizarre.'" USA notes, "In moving to unrecuse McDowell, Martin, who declined to comment, cited legal precedent in a case involving the National Association of Broadcasters. But that request to break the FCC stalemate came from the U.S. Court of Appeals after a two-year impasse. … In the AT&T case, the request is from an FCC chairman who openly favors approval with no conditions. And it comes after a stalemate of just two months. … Tuesday, McDowell issued a statement that he is prepared to get up to speed quickly on the AT&T merger should the general counsel unrecuse him."

The AP (12/6, Dunbar) reports, "Two powerful Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday night sharply questioned a move by the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to allow a fellow commissioner who had claimed a conflict of interest to vote on the nation's largest telecommunications industry merger. … Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote FCC Chairman Kevin Martin expressing 'disappointment' in Martin's 'apparent willingness to waive government recusal rules' to allow former lobbyist and current commissioner Robert McDowell to vote on the proposed merger of San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp." The AP adds, "Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., along with Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., sent a letter to the FCC's general counsel asking 15 pointed questions about past precedent of such recusals and other issues. … Their dismay takes on added significance because the Democrats will take control of Congress in January. Inouye will be chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and Dingell will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Both committees oversee the FCC."

EU Regulators Back NYSE-Euronext Merger. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C3, MacDonald, Lucchetti) reports, "One of the last major hurdles to a merger of the New York Stock Exchange and Euronext NV was removed yesterday, after European regulators gave their provisional clearance, pushing the first major trans-Atlantic stock-exchange merger toward the finishing line after a six-month battle." The Journal continues, "NYSE's likely success will heap further pressure on its fast-growing rival, Nasdaq Stock Market Inc., to do a deal. Last month, Nasdaq made a bid for London Stock Exchange PLC, but London rejected its approach. Nasdaq has acquired a 29% stake in the London exchange since April, but says its bid is a final offer, unless London agrees on a deal or a rival bidder comes in." The Journal adds, "The Euronext deal still needs approval from the Dutch finance minister, because the exchange is incorporated in Amsterdam, though operated from Paris. Also, shareholders in Euronext and NYSE Group Inc., which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will vote on the deal in about two weeks. Neither the finance minister nor shareholders are expected to block the creation of what would be a $28 billion company. A spokesman for the Netherlands Finance Ministry said Finance Minister Gerrit Zalm is expected to decide in January. … NYSE-Euronext Group, as the combined company will be called, will have stock exchanges in New York, Paris, Brussels, Lisbon and Amsterdam, as well as a London-based market in the fast-growing sector of derivatives."

Icahn's Withdrawal From Reckson Bid Shows Changing M&A Climate. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Pulliam, Forsyth) reports, "For years, financier Carl Icahn has been a prominent 'activist' investor, attempting to push companies to make changes in a bid to boost their stocks. Now he's being forced to change his game plan in using this brand of investing." The Journal continues, "This week Mr. Icahn's partners pulled out of a $4.6 billion bid for Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust. Mr. Icahn initially pressed ahead with the Reckson bid on his own. Late Monday night, the Reckson board rejected Mr. Icahn's offer in favor of a merger with SL Green Realty Corp., a rival real-estate trust. Yesterday, Mr. Icahn said he would back out. … 'The offer is pretty much done,' Mr. Icahn said in an interview. 'It's a minor disappointment.' Reckson shareholders must decide whether to approve SL Green's cash and stock offer, valued at about $45.56 a share as of yesterday's market close." The Journal adds, "The development illustrates the complications for even the savviest shareholders in mounting corporate challenges. These days, companies are launching ever-more aggressive legal and public-relations efforts, among other things, to block such efforts. Competition from industry players is intense. … Real-estate developer Harry Macklowe and Mack-Cali, a real-estate investment trust, both dropped out of the partnership with Mr. Icahn over the weekend. Now, Mr. Icahn said he is returning to his roots as a solo financier, bringing him full circle in his approach to 'activist' investing. Until a couple of years ago, when Mr. Icahn began joining forces with other investors to prod corporate managements to change, he largely had operated on his own."

Ryanair Offers To Sell Airport Slots In EU Review Of Aer Lingus Bid. Bloomberg (12/6, Newman) reports, "Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, has offered to sell slots at eight airports, including London's Heathrow, to win European Union antitrust approval to buy Aer Lingus Plc." Bloomberg continues, "Ryanair told the European Commission, the EU's antitrust authority in Brussels, that it would sell as many as four Aer Lingus slots at Heathrow if its bid for the carrier succeeds, according to a document submitted to the regulator last week. It also offered slots at Stansted Airport near London and airports serving Frankfurt, Paris, Milan, Rome, Bratislava and Barcelona. … 'The purpose is to allow one or more entrants to operate a new or additional non-stop scheduled daily frequencies on the 8 identified relevant airport pairs,' said the document, which was obtained by Bloomberg News today." Bloomberg adds, "Ryanair Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary has pursued the 1.48 billion-euro ($2 billion) hostile takeover of Ireland's flag carrier to add routes to the U.S. The Irish government and Aer Lingus employee shareholders, who together control almost 40 percent of the carrier, have rejected the offer, which expires Dec. 22. Ryanair said on Nov. 21 that it won't raise its offer."

South Korean Ship's Crewmen Pleads Guilty To Oil Dumping Cover-Up. The AP (12/6) reports, "The chief engineer and second engineer of a South Korean cargo vessel have pleaded guilty to environmental crimes and obstruction of justice for covering up illegal dumping of oil residue at sea, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "The owner and operator of the vessel, Sun Ace Shipping Co., based in Seoul, South Korea, previously pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to pay a $400,000 fine and $100,000 to New Jersey environmental organizations." The AP adds, "Chief engineer Chang-Sig O pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice for maintaining a false oil record book and lying to the Coast Guard about his knowledge of hoses used to bypass shipboard pollution control equipment. … Second engineer Mun Sig Wang pleaded guilty to violating the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships for presenting a false oil record book to Coast Guard inspectors who boarded the ship in Camden on Jan. 3. … Inspectors learned that crew members had dumped oily waste into the ocean at least two times on their voyage from South Korea, the Justice Department said."

Activists Using Research In Environmental Justice Battles. USA Today (12/6, 13A, Jones) reports, "Neighborhood activists from California to Washington, D.C., are using a growing body of research on how pollutants exacerbate illness to block the building of facilities, relocate residents from contaminated communities and gain other concessions from large firms. … 'One of the problems with all environmental struggles, but particularly when you have the overlay of environmental racism, is the community always has the burden of proof of harm,' says Elizabeth Crowe, an organizer with the Kentucky Environmental Foundation in Berea, Ky. Now, 'we have much more definitive information as to how bad this stuff is. … So the science is catching up to the experiences of folks on the ground, and it helps prove the point.'" USA adds, 'Among recent developments: … A group in Port Arthur, Texas, signed an agreement on Nov. 6 with Motiva Enterprises under which the oil company will pour up to $3.5 million into the impoverished neighborhood as it expands a refinery there. The money will help fund new local businesses. … A plan to build a nuclear waste storage facility on the Skull Valley Goshute Indian reservation in Utah was scuttled in September by the federal Bureau of Land Management and Bureau of Indian Affairs. The agencies were concerned that it would have a negative impact on the reservation, says attorney Paul EchoHawk, who represented tribal members opposing the project. … From Sept. 24 to Oct. 1, representatives of more than 70 social justice and human rights groups toured the nation by bus caravan, visiting communities where residents face health problems associated with pollution." USA adds, "The environmental justice movement took root in the South in the early 1980s, when activists, church leaders and residents complained that toxic waste sites and other polluters often were located in poor and black neighborhoods. Their protests merged the struggle for a clean environment with that of civil rights."

NYTimes Says Bush Should Not Rescind Order Protecting Bristol Bay. The New York Times (12/6, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "President Bush is thinking about rescinding a longstanding presidential order that specifically prohibits oil and gas drilling in Alaska's pristine Bristol Bay. He should resist the impulse to do so, no matter how powerful the entreaties from his friends in the oil business. Drilling in Bristol Bay would threaten one of the nation's most productive fisheries without appreciably strengthening the nation's long-term energy security."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Report Says DOJ Should Regroup Following Failed Effort To Update Evidence System.

Federal Computer Week (12/5, Sarkar) reported, "Although the FBI is forging ahead with establishing an interoperable fingerprint system with the Homeland Security Department, the Justice Department needs to regroup following a failed $1.18 million effort to modernize a system that manages evidence, according to a semi-annual report released by Justice's inspector general." The IG report "also provided updates with respect to the Federal Information Security Management Act (FISMA). A review found that systems within the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive (ATF); the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA); and the Justice Management Division (JMD) were all certified and accredited, security controls were tested and evaluated in the past year, and contingency plans were in compliance with FISMA. However, the FBI, ATF and DEA did not perform electronic authentication risk assessments, and the FBI and ATF did not fully implement Justice's process for tracking system vulnerabilities and corrective actions, the IG report adds."

FBI Says Computer Database System On Budget. The Washington Times (12/6, Seper, 88K) reports, "The FBI says a new computer system -- introduced last year as a replacement for a failed case-file program -- is within cost and on schedule to be fully operational by 2009, despite criticisms in a report this week by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General. … 'The FBI appreciates the Inspector General's continued interest and assessment of the Sentinel program,' the bureau said. … 'The total project cost for Sentinel was budgeted at a cost of $425 million and that figure remains the same. Characterizations to the contrary are misleading,' the FBI said." The Times notes FBI Director Robert Mueller has said of the new system, "Sentinel will support our current priorities, including our No. 1 priority: preventing terrorist attacks."

Federal Probe Yields Arrests Of Chicago Gang Leaders. The AP (12/6, Tareen) reports, "Twenty alleged street gang members have been arrested on charges of running of sophisticated drug trafficking operation in the culmination of what officials said was a three-year undercover investigation, authorities announced Tuesday." The AP continues, "Since the investigation began, 38 alleged members of the Latin Kings street gang have been charged and at least 20 individuals - including several men believed to be top leaders - are in custody on drug and weapons charges, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said during a news conference. … The charges are included in 13 separate federal complaints filed or unsealed Tuesday. … 'We pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side,' said Andrew Traver, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the main agency involved in the investigation."

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago (12/6) reports, "Federal agents moved in on the gang on Tuesday. … 'Operation Broken Crown' started when a member of the Southside Latin Kings began cooperating with ATF agents."

Gang Kingpin Among Those Nabbed. The Chicago Tribune (12/6, Coen, Bush) reports, "A Chicago man described by federal authorities as 'the CEO of the Latin Kings Nation on the South Side' was taken into custody early Tuesday, capping a three-year investigation into the operations of the violent street gang." The Tribune continues, "Fernando 'Ace' King was among 18 gang members whose arrests were announced Tuesday by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald. King had the title of 'Supreme Inca,' running the gang's drug empire on the city's South Side and the south suburbs, officials said. There are only a small circle of leaders above him, including Gustavo 'Gino' Colon, the gang's imprisoned head, officials said. … 'It may seem pretty cool to be a Supreme Inca when you're the leader on the street of a gang until the title "Supreme Inca" becomes "lead defendant,"' Fitzgerald said." The Tribune notes, "The Latin Kings operate in seven regions in Chicago, including the southwest and northwest suburbs, authorities said. … King is one of 38 members and associates charged in the case after investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives used wiretaps and undercover drug purchases to crack the gang's operations. He was charged with intent to distribute cocaine as part of 'Operation Broken Crown,' which is billed as the most significant federal effort against the Latin Kings since the takedown of Colon in 1998."

Eight San Francisco Gang Members Sentenced To Prison. Bay City News Wire (12/5) reported, "Eight members of San Francisco's Down Below Gang will spend years in prison after pleading guilty to federal racketeering and drug-dealing charges Monday, according to the U.S. attorney's office. The gang…has been involved in criminal activity such as selling crack cocaine and intimidation for years, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan. … For their crimes, Don Johnson, 20, agreed to 23 years in federal prison; Robert Calloway, 22, agreed to more than 17 years; Dornell Ellis, 25, agreed to almost 16 years; and Ricky Rollins, 21, agreed to 15 years." BCN notes, "The pleas are the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the San Francisco Police Department. Ryan thanked the two organizations in a statement." The San Francisco Chronicle (12/5, Gordon, 384K) added, The four other defendants pleaded guilty to drug-related charges, according to federal prosecutors. They are Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24. Their sentences will range from 21 months to 77 months in federal prison."

New Jersey Gang Member Sentenced To 10 Years In Prison. The Cherry Hill Courier-Post (12/3, Strupczewski) reported, "A Camden gang member who cooperated with federal investigators was sentenced Friday to 10 years in federal prison for his role in a drug trafficking organization, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. U.S. District Judge Freda L. Wolfson said she recognized the need to reward Lamont Powell, also known as 'Mont G,' 29, for his cooperation. Had he not cooperated, Powell would have faced a sentence of anywhere from 30 years to life." The Post noted, "Powell was a member of the 'Tuten Organization,' a notorious drug gang. After his arrest, he cooperated with federal investigators to convict other gang members, including one of the organization's leaders, Leonard Paulk of Camden.

Tandy Notes DEA's Position On Handling Painkiller Cases. In the Orlando Sentinel (12/6), Karen Tandy writes about Dr. Freddie Williams who she says "was diverting so many OxyContin pills to abusers and traffickers that after Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents and our partners arrested him, the street price of OxyContin nearly doubled in the area because of the significantly diminished availability of OxyContin." Tandy adds, "These few doctors cause grave harm and contribute to the alarming prescription-drug-abuse problem in our country. … There is much debate within the medical community about how chronic pain should be treated, how aggressively and with what medications. The DEA doesn't enter into that debate except to ensure the drugs aren't being diverted for illegal purposes as we are required to do by federal law. Doctors need to practice medicine as they have been trained to do and as they are sworn to do: to help their patients. The DEA in turn will do what we are sworn to do: to protect the American public by putting dealers like Williams out of business."

Hearing Set For San Diego Chargers Safety In Cough Syrup Case. On its Web site, KGTV-TV, San Diego (12/5) reports a Feb. 7 preliminary hearing "was set Tuesday for a Chargers player accused of getting codeine-based cough syrup from a friend who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and trying to ship it to his home state of Texas. Terrance Kiel faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of five felony charges…said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine." DEA agents "said they intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the codeine-based cough syrup in June and September. Prosecutors alleged Monday that Hope Devina Vines, 30, was stealing codeine-based cough syrup from her employer, Sharp Rees-Stealy, and giving it to Kiel."

KFMB-TV, San Diego (12/6) reports on its Web site that according to drug enforcement agents, Vines "was arrested Thursday afternoon. She worked at Sharp Rees-Steely in the downtown area, where a large number of bottles of cough syrup were reported missing."

Boxer Suspended After Positive Meth Test. The AP (12/6) reports WBC light flyweight champion Omar Nino "was temporarily suspended Tuesday after testing positive for methamphetamine after last month's title bout, Nevada boxing regulators said. The 30-year-old Mexican fighter retained the 108-pound title Nov. 18 with a majority draw over former champion Brian Viloria of Hawaii. … The Nevada Athletic Commission decided to keep Nino out of the ring until it could hold a formal hearing, probably in January, commission executive director Keith Kizer said."

NFL Player Suspended For Violating Steroid Policy. The AP (12/6) reports New Orleans Saints defensive tackle Hollis Thomas "was suspended yesterday for the final four games of the regular season for violating the NFL's steroid policy. Thomas, supported by the club, appealed the suspension, which he said was caused by asthma medication. He uses an inhaler daily and it apparently contained a banned steroid."

Seattle Officials Concerned About Mounting Gun Violence, Gang Activity. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (12/6, Gutierrez) reports, "The slaying of King County sheriff's Deputy Steve Cox is another harsh reflection of resurging gun violence and gang activity plaguing Seattle and cities around the country, law enforcement officials say." The P-I continues, "Cox was shot and killed early Saturday as he interviewed witnesses in connection with a shooting and beating outside a party at a White Center home. The felon and gang member who apparently shot him, Raymond O. Porter, is thought to have killed another man in SeaTac Friday night. … 'Gang members are more dangerous, they're more armed, than other criminals and that fact alone means we're going to run into more people and things like this,' Sheriff's Sgt. John Urquhart said Monday. … 'But I don't believe (Porter) killed Deputy Cox because he was a gang member. I believe he killed Deputy Cox because he was armed,' Urquhart added." The P-I adds, "Cox's death comes after a year in Seattle in which gun assaults were up by 25 percent, similar to national trends, according to law enforcement. Police say shootings are becoming much too frequent, whether gang-related or not. Even as deputies responded to the gun blasts that killed Cox in White Center, Seattle police were busy Saturday hunting for another shooter in Rainier Valley who wounded another man in an unrelated case. … In October, Seattle police gang detectives lamented in a Seattle P-I story that they had already investigated more gang cases than in all of 2005. An estimated 30 to 60 street gangs are operating in the Seattle area. … The Sheriff's Office does not field a gang unit, which means gangsters pushed out of Seattle likely work their way into the suburbs and unincorporated areas such as White Center, Urquhart said." The P-I notes, "The reasons for the latest surge in violence vary, according to law enforcement and gang experts. Some experts say it's stoked in part by gang-bangers who went to prison in the early 1990s and now are finishing their sentences. … Earlier this year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised $30 million to buttress anti-gang programs nationwide, calling street gangs 'an increasingly deadly threat to the safety and security of our citizens.' Locally, agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives teamed up with Seattle police, the Sheriff's Office, the state Department of Corrections and others to form a Violent Gang Task Force."

IMMIGRATION:

Supreme Court Restricts Deportation Of Immigrants For State Felonies. The New York Times (12/6, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports the Supreme Court "rejected the government's interpretation of immigration law on Tuesday, ruling that a noncitizen is not subject to mandatory deportation for a drug crime that, while a felony in the state where the crime was prosecuted, is only a misdemeanor under federal law." The 8-to-1 decision "restored to one category of immigrants, caught in the nearly impenetrable maze where immigration law and criminal law meet, the ability to avoid automatic deportation and the other dire consequences of being guilty of an 'aggravated felony.'" The category is "made up of immigrants convicted of simple drug possession in states that treat those offenses as felonies. Federal law treats possession in most instances as a misdemeanor. But in the government's view, possession when deemed a felony under state law became a 'drug trafficking crime,' which under federal immigration law is an 'aggravated felony' that strips an immigrant of the right to seek relief from automatic deportation, to seek asylum, or ever to return legally to the United States." Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter "said the government's interpretation was based on a strained and implausible reading of the definition of 'drug trafficking crime' in the federal criminal code."

USA Today (12/6, 4A, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports the "8-1 decision could affect thousands of permanent legal immigrants, often known as green-card holders, who, because of certain state convictions, face deportation without a chance to plead their case before a judge." The decision, "drawing the dissent of only Justice Clarence Thomas, rejected a position taken by the Bush administration and resolved a split in views among lower courts."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Savage, 850K) reports, "Immigrant-rights lawyers said the resounding 8-1 decision will allow noncitizens who have a family, a job and an otherwise clean record to appeal to immigration judges to stay in this country, despite a drug conviction." Noting "Humpty Dumpty's use of words to mean whatever he wanted them to mean in author Lewis Carroll's 'Through the Looking-Glass,' the justices said it did not make sense to interpret the words 'aggravated felony' and 'drug trafficking crime' to mean simple drug possession." Justice David H. Souter, "who wrote the opinion, said the government's interpretation was incoherent and is 'just what the English language tells us not to expect, and that result makes us very wary of the government's position.'"

The Washington Post (12/6, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports the "decision came in one of several cases the justices are considering to reconcile conflicting lower-court decisions on when immigrants convicted of crimes must be deported. After announcing yesterday's decision, the court heard arguments in a separate case from California in which a Peruvian immigrant was convicted on car theft charges."

The AP (12/6, Yost) reports, "The issue before the Supreme Court was the interpretation of the federal Immigration and Nationality Act, which says immigrants found guilty of aggravated felonies are subject to deportation. … Conduct that is a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under the Controlled Substances Act is not a felony for purposes of immigration, stated the ruling by Justice David Souter. … Jose Antonio Lopez, a 16-year permanent U.S. resident, was deported to Mexico in January 2006, but could return to his wife and two children, who are U.S. citizens, one of his lawyers has said. … Even then, Lopez, who had operated a grocery store in Sioux Falls, S.D., still could face deportation, but an immigration judge would have discretion to allow him to remain in the United States." The AP adds, "In opposing the immigrant's legal position, the Bush administration said that Congress left the door open to counting state felonies as felonies under the federal Controlled Substances Act, which would make them a crime that could trigger deportation under the Immigration and Nationality Act."

Democrats May Plan Crack Down On Illegal Immigrants' Employers. The Hill (12/6, Joseph, Cusack) reports the "selection of Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) to head the Intelligence Committee may be an indication that Democrats will press the Bush administration to crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants." Reyes, "a former Border Patrol agent, is one of the most outspoken proponents of enforcing these types of employer sanctions and appears to have an ally in Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who will be the House caucus chairman next year." In a previous interview, Emanuel said "many Democrats want to focus on employer sanctions as a way to stem illegal immigration. He accused the White House and the Republican-led Congress for letting 'its guard down when it comes to employer sanctions.'"

TAX:

DOJ's California Tax Probe Ensnares Nebraskans. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (12/6, Lindenberger) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is seeking a preliminary injunction against California accountant Lowell Baisden, who is currently under investigation for promoting an illegal tax fraud scheme." The Telegraph continues, "The motion, which was filed Nov. 29 in U.S. District Court, asks for a preliminary injunction to prevent Baisden from preparing any federal tax returns for his clients and from representing them before the IRS." The Telegraph adds, "Court documents indicate seven North Platte practitioners have been investigated by the IRS in connection with Baisden's scheme. They are doctors Michael Trierweiler, Chris Johng and Walter and Deborah Weaver, along with anesthetist Burt McKeag and nurse anesthetists Evan Geilenkirchen and Kathryn Snoozy. … According to the court records, Baisden helped his clients set up phony corporations to significantly reduce their tax liabilities. He also allegedly prepared their tax returns to perpetuate his scheme. Many of these clients were referred to Baisden by his brother-in-law, Michael Koning, a former North Platte anesthesiologist now living in Montana." The Telegraph notes, "The tax scheme allegedly involves creating sham corporations to which the client's income is assigned. Baisden would then allegedly claim large illegal deductions for non-deductible personal expenses. The remaining income would then be reported as royalty or rental income, which is not subject to self-employment and social security taxes. … According to the complaint from the Justice Department, 'several of Baisden's former customers have sought new representation, filed the past-due returns and conceded that the tax returns filed by Baisden are incorrect.'"

DOJ Turns Over Bank Documents To Attorneys In KPMG Suit. The New York Times (12/6, Browning) reports, "Federal prosecutors who are investigating Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters have been turning over internal bank documents to lawyers defending former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a separate criminal case." The Times continues, "The providing of the Deutsche Bank documents, which began in earnest earlier this year and has accelerated in recent months, was disclosed in a court filing late Monday by John M. Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the case against the indicted KPMG employees. His office is also overseeing the investigation of Deutsche Bank." The Times adds, "The judge in the KPMG case, Lewis A. Kaplan of United States District Court in Manhattan, had previously criticized prosecutors for tardy production of evidence. The trial of the 16 former KPMG employees had been scheduled to begin in January, but last month Judge Kaplan postponed it indefinitely, citing concerns that the defendants, who include an outside lawyer and investment adviser, would not be able to pay their legal bills." The Times notes, "In his filing, Mr. Hillebrecht wrote that prosecutors were turning over the Deutsche Bank documents in part because the Deutsche Bank case had 'substantial overlap' with the KPMG employees case, which prosecutors call the largest criminal tax case ever. .. .Mr. Hillebrecht also disclosed that prosecutors had asked Deutsche Bank to provide additional assistance with the documents for the defendants in the KPMG case, in which Jeffrey Stein, a former KPMG executive, is the lead defendant."

IRS Tries To Seal Gaps In State Business Laws. In his "Tax Report" column for the Wall Street Journal (12/6), Tom Herman writes, "Escalating its assault on cheating, the Internal Revenue Service is turning up the heat on tax dodgers who conceal taxable income by exploiting gaps in state business-formation laws that allow hidden ownership or control." Herman continues, "The IRS is focusing on individuals or small groups whose tools include use of corporations, trusts, partnerships, limited liability companies and other types of business structures. Some people may form a company, conceal their ownership and use it to claim phony expenses, an IRS official says. Other cases involve outright fraud. IRS officials say some people have created sham, one-person, tax-exempt religious corporations to dodge taxes." Herman adds, "Officials say the problem appears to be particularly severe in Nevada, where recent investigations into promoters of corporations there have turned up widespread abuses. As a result, the IRS has begun expanding the number of audits of people involved in forming Nevada corporations, says Steven Burgess, director of examination for the IRS's Small Business/Self-Employed Division. … The IRS also is considering additional investigations of promoters, Mr. Burgess said at a recent Senate hearing. Even if promoters aren't guilty of wrongdoing, their client lists could be valuable in unearthing evidence of cheating, he said." Herman notes, "For years, law-enforcement officials have expressed concern about widespread use of offshore tax havens to hide or shelter taxable income. But now IRS officials and senators are also focusing on the exploitation of onshore havens. … While laws vary from state to state, a report earlier this year by the U.S. Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative arm, said most states don't require companies or third-party agents representing them to disclose ownership information when companies are being formed or in periodic reports."

WSJournal Proposes Scrapping IRS Code, Keeping AMT. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Fans of political irony will appreciate that Democrats in Congress are saying they now want to address the 'wealth gap' even as they deplore and want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, or AMT. It was a previous crusade against the wealthy that created the AMT. Haven't we learned anything about the perils of tax policy rooted in political envy?" Somehow, Democrats "never raised a peep over the years when the AMT was whacking mostly Republican voters. But the tax has now become the monster that ate Marin County, to pick just one of the blue state redoubts where the AMT hits especially hard. This year it will strike four million Americans, and next year without a change in law it will snare 23 million -- one in four tax filers." The "latest data indicate that the eight states with the highest percentage of tax filers subject to the AMT all voted heavily Democratic in 2004 and 2006 -- including Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Rhode Island. Those voters are now screaming for relief, and the question for Democrats is where they'll find the money. Eliminating the AMT would cost about $50 billion for one year and $1.2 trillion over 10 years, according to the Treasury Department." The journal proposes a "possible deal between the Bush Administration and the Pelosi Democrats: Junk the IRS code and use the AMT as the basis for tax reform. The AMT provides at least the crude framework for a much simpler tax code, because it eliminates almost all deductions and special interest carve-outs. It requires only about one-tenth as many tax forms as the regular code. It has a broad tax base and only two tax rates, 26% and 28%."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Meet With Blue Dogs, New Democrats. The Hill (12/6, Hearn) reports, "President Bush has invited leaders of the conservative Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House Friday to discuss areas of 'mutual cooperation' in the words of one Democratic Congressional aide. The outreach comes at a time when Bush's image on Capitol Hill and around the country has taken a serious beating." Reps. Alan Boyd, Dennis Moore and Mike Ross will represent the Blue Dogs, and Reps. Joe Crowley), Artur Davis, Ron Kind, Adam Smith and Ellen Tauscher are set to represent the New Democrats.

Lawmakers Seen As Unlikely Replacements For Bolton. The Hill (12/6, Schor) reports that as President Bush begins vetting candidates to succeed UN Ambassador John Bolton, "as many as five departing lawmakers have surfaced as players in the Beltway's nominations guessing game." Iowa Rep. Jim Leach said he is "flattered and honored by the bipartisan effort on his behalf but is making other plans for his future," spokesman Gregory Wierzynski said. Another "surprise on several U.N. shortlists" is Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), but he is reportedly "leaning toward taking an academic or policy position after leaving the Hill." In addition, former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell told CNN yesterday that Bush would seek to replace Bolton with a Republican.

Missed Opportunities Seen In 4th Circuit Vacancies. The Legal Times (12/6, Schwartz) reports, "Chief Judge William Wilkins, who has presided over the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the past four years, sent President George W. Bush a letter last week announcing his plans to step down in June. … Though Wilkins, a South Carolina native who will turn 65 in March, will still hear cases as a senior judge, his quasi-retirement creates a fourth official vacancy on the 15-member bench. (Technically, there are five openings, but Judge H. Emory Widener Jr., who announced plans to retire in 2003, has pledged to stay active until the nominee for his seat -- Defense Department general counsel William Haynes II -- is confirmed.)" The Times continues, "The large number of vacancies during a Republican administration is particularly striking given the 4th Circuit's reputation as one of the most stalwart conservative courts in the nation. The circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and North and South Carolina, also is the key appellate arena for the administration's terrorism cases, largely prosecuted in the Eastern District of Virginia. … 'You'd think they'd want to fill them and fill them as quickly as possible,' says Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law." The Times adds, "Though the Bush administration has tried to fill a few open seats, it has faced stiff opposition even during the Republican-controlled Congress. U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle's nomination to the 4th Circuit has languished since 2001, and senators have blocked Haynes' confirmation over questions about his involvement with the Justice Department's infamous "torture memo." It's unlikely the administration will fare any better under the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress."

Administration Withdraws "Open Skies" Plan. USA Today/AP (12/6, 7B, Sniffen) reports, "Already rebuffed by a Republican-controlled Congress, the Bush administration on Tuesday withdrew its plan to give foreign investors more management control of US airlines."

Announced yesterday by Transportation Secretary Mary Peters, "the decision follows a department review of public comments about the proposal, and votes by the Senate and House this year to prevent the plan from going forward. 'It was clear from reviewing the comments that the department needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits of allowing more international investment,' Peters said in a statement."

The Financial Times (12/6) reports the Administration is "bowing to pressure from Congress, labour unions and airlines," while the Wall Street Journal (12/6, A8, Meckler, 2.04M) says the move "underscored the rising protectionist sentiments in Congress and throughout the country." It "will have an impact on negotiations over a long-sought agreement that would allow U.S. and European airlines to fly without restrictions across the Atlantic." The Journal adds, "The 'open skies' agreement also would provide greater access to London's popular Heathrow airport for US carriers. Europeans had said they wouldn't finalize that agreement if the US doesn't liberalize the foreign-investment rules on US airline operations.

Republicans Lay "Legislative Landmines" For Democrats As They Postpone Spending. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A8, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "Like a retreating army, Republicans are tearing up railroad track and planting legislative land mines to make it harder for Democrats to govern when they take power in Congress next month. Already, the Republican leadership has moved to saddle the new Democratic majority with responsibility for resolving $463 billion in spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. … The unstated goal is to disrupt the Democratic agenda and make it harder for the new majority to meet its promise to reinstitute 'pay-as-you-go' budget rules, under which new costs or tax cuts must be offset to protect the deficit from growing." The Journal adds, "The collapse of the appropriations process will be felt soon in the Justice and Commerce departments, food-safety agencies and veterans' health care."

The Hill (12/6, McCormack) reports, "As time runs out in the Congress, politics can trump policy in deciding which bills become law. Even if a bill has more than enough support to pass if brought to the floor, powerful members and long-held vendettas can determine a bill's fate. Some lawmakers file discharge petitions to get their bills out of committee, trying to attach their legislation to appropriations bills or wage last-ditch efforts to get their objectives pushed through." The Hill cites several examples of stalled bills, including WI8 Rep. Mark Green's (R) bill to "crack down on abuses against animals," which has 324 cosponsors; PA3 Rep. Phil English's (R) bill to "repeal Medicare's outpatient therapy caps;" and CA51 Rep. Bob Filner's (D) proposal "that would allow World War II Merchant Marines and Naval and Army transportation personnel to be eligible for benefits."

Republican Leaders Won't Allow Vote On DC House Member. The Washington Post (12/6, B10, Sheridan, Woodlee, 690K) reports, "Republican congressional leaders decided yesterday not to bring to the floor a bill giving the District a full voting member of the House, dooming the measure's chances in this legislative session." GOP Rep. Thomas M. Davis, "the bill's author, had appealed to his party's leadership to cram in a vote during Congress's lame-duck session, which could end as soon as Thursday. But in a closed-door meeting, House leaders rejected the request." The Washington Times (12/6, Emerling, 88K) notes "the DC Voting Rights Act would give the overwhelmingly Democratic District a full vote in the House and create a fourth House seat for predominantly Republican Utah."

The New York Times (12/6, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "A spokesman for the chief backer of the plan, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said Mr. Davis would push for reconsideration. Failing that, the spokesman said, Mr. Davis would reintroduce the package in the next Congress, which the Democrats will lead."

GOP Majority Ends "With A Legislative Whimper." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Levey, Simon, 850K) reports, "Twelve years after Republicans stormed into power on Capitol Hill with ambitious plans for action on energy exploration, abortion and other key issues, the GOP wraps up its run at the helm this week with a legislative whimper." The Times adds, "With Democrats slated to take control of Congress in January, proposals to expand oil drilling and reduce abortions are unlikely to see the light of day during the next two years. Instead, they will join other mainstays of the Republican agenda — such as abolishing the estate tax, limiting medical malpractice lawsuits and banning gay marriages — on the legislative sidelines. GOP lawmakers express resignation as they contemplate seeing many of their cherished goals consigned to oblivion, replaced by priorities near and dear to the hearts of Democrats.

Incoming House Chairmen Jostle Over Committee Structures, Jurisdiction. The Hill (12/6, Bolton) reports, "Incoming Democratic House committee chairmen" are "edging toward a turf war" between themselves and with the Senate as they press "to reverse structural changes made to their panels by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and other Republican leaders." Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has said there will not likely be any changes of jurisdiction between committees."

"Seniority Ruled" In Selection of First Committee Chairmen. The Hill (12/6, Hearn) reports, "As expected, seniority ruled the first round of selections for House committee chairmen yesterday afternoon, despite Democratic leaders' repeated insistence that seniority would be only one of many factors weighed in choosing panel leaders. In the first of what will be many decisions the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee will make in coming weeks, the panel met to select the chairmen of four 'exclusive' committees: Appropriations, Ways and Means, Energy and Commerce and Financial Services. The leader of the fifth exclusive committee, Rules, is appointed by House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Although the results of yesterday's meeting were expected — Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) will chair Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) Energy and Commerce and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) Financial Services — the gathering raised an obvious question among House Democrats: whether committee chairmen would cooperate with Democratic leaders or whether some would chart their own course on certain issues."

Black Caucus Members Hold Key Chairmanships In Next Congress. The Washington Times (12/6, DeBose, 88K) reports, "The Congressional Black Caucus today will announce its leadership team and agenda for the 110th Congress with Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, the group's chairman, expected to refocus on urban and poverty issues." The Times says she "could be one of the most effective CBC chairman in 20 years because many caucus members are likely to lead key House committees -- Judiciary, Homeland Security, Administration, and Ways and Means." The Times adds, "Almost every piece of legislation that Democrats bring to the House floor will have to pass the approval of a CBC member. The group, composed of Democrats, also will benefit from almost 17 subcommittee chairmanships and former CBC Chairman James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, as the House majority whip." MO5 Rep. Emmanuel Cleaver (D), one of the caucus's incoming vice chairmen, "said he soon expects the group to announce its legislative agenda for the first 100 hours of Congress to go in tandem with the issues House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has said will be done in that time."

Republicans Hold To Term Limits For Minority Committee Heads. The Hill (12/6, O'Connor) reports, "Republicans renewed their six-year term limits on top committee posts yesterday, dealing a blow to three outgoing chairmen who lobbied for a rules change to head their respective panels in the minority. … Republicans are set to decide which members will head select panels during Steering Committee meetings today and tomorrow, and members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) will also decide their next chairman in a bruising race between Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.)."

Democrats Divided On Extent Of Promised Ethics Overhaul. USA Today (12/6, 6A, Schouten, 2.27M) reports, "Less than a month after sweeping into office on the promise of a major ethics overhaul, Democrats are divided over just how much change is needed." Several Democrats, "citing the corruption scandals that beset Congress in the past year, want tougher standards than their leaders have proposed. The major points of contention: Whether lawmakers should police themselves and how much to clamp down on earmarks, the special projects that lawmakers, often anonymously, insert into spending bills to benefit hometown or special interests." Sen. Joe Lieberman "was among a small, bipartisan coalition of lawmakers who on Tuesday promised a broad array of changes. Specifically, they backed the creation of an Office of Public Integrity to launch and carry out ethics probes. That power now resides with the House and Senate ethics committees, which the lawmakers slammed as failing to act on corruption charges." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has pledged to make changes to ethics rules the first order of business when the new Congress convenes. Under a proposal she unveiled this year, Democrats would eliminate a wide array of lobbying practices — from banning lobbyist-funded travel and gifts to barring former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and the members-only gym. The proposal would require greater public disclosure of some earmarks."

Liberal Coalition To Unleash PR Campaign For Democratic Agenda. The Washington Post (12/6, A6, Birnbaum, 690K) reports a "large group of liberal organizations is planning to wage a national lobbying and public relations campaign to press for passage of the House Democrats' legislative agenda next year, taking a page from longtime corporate practices." The Change America Now coalition, "or CAN, met yesterday at AFL-CIO headquarters to outline the many methods it will use -- including the release of research papers and e-mail and phone bombardment of Congress." The goal is "to persuade on-the-fence lawmakers in more than 80 congressional districts to vote for the 'Hundred Hours' agenda, a list of legislation that Democrats hope to approve in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress. The agenda includes an increase in the minimum wage and an effort to reduce the cost of Medicare prescription drugs." The campaign "will largely target Republican moderates and Republicans who were narrowly elected in November."

Democrats Plan Longer Congressional Work Week. The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Layton, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "labor issue most on the minds of members of Congress yesterday was their own: They will have to work five days a week starting in January.

The horror." Incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, who is "writing the schedule for the next Congress, said members should expect longer hours than the brief week they have grown accustomed to." Hoyer told reporters, "I have bad news for you. Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the 4th." The Post adds, "For lawmakers, it is awful, compared with what they have come to expect. For much of this election year, the legislative week started late Tuesday and ended by Thursday afternoon -- and that was during the relatively few weeks the House wasn't in recess." Hoyer said that in 2007, "members of the House will be expected in the Capitol for votes each week by 6:30 p.m. Monday and will finish their business about 2 p.m. Friday." With the "new calendar, the Democrats are trying to project a businesslike image when they take control of Congress in January. House and Senate Democratic leaders have announced an ambitious agenda for their first 100 hours and say they are adamant about scoring legislative victories they can trumpet in the 2008 campaigns."

The Washington Times (12/6, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that with Republicans "on Capitol Hill trying to spend like Democrats and Democrats trying to be as tough as Republicans in the war on terror, the grand difference between the two parties may come down to a matter of scheduling, reports Charles Hurt of The Washington Times." Republicans "prefer to keep lawmakers out of Washington, since that's usually where they do all the damage, and Democrats want members chained to their desks so they can churn out innumerable pages of new federal laws."

Lawmakers Ask GAO Administrator To Halt Plan To Privatize Auditing. The Washington Post (12/6, A9, Higham, O'Harrow, 690K) reports, "Three federal lawmakers yesterday called on the new administrator of the General Services Administration to halt her plan to replace government auditors in the agency's inspector general's office with private auditors, saying in a letter that the change could lead to less oversight of contractors. The letter to GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan followed a report in The Washington Post on Saturday that described Doan's plans to cut $5 million in spending on audits and shift responsibility for contract reviews to small, private contractors."

State Department Honors Employees' Charitable Works Overseas. The Washington Post (12/6, A23, Williamson, 690K) reports on Tuesday "five State Department employees and spouses were recognized for charitable works abroad -- and two of them were men." This year's "uber-volunteers" included spouses, full-timers or both serving in posts in Afghanistan, South Korea, the Dominican Republic, Swaziland and Greece.

Marcus Suggests Bipartisan "Clinton-McCain" Panel To Address Social Security. In her column in the Washington Post (12/6, A25, 690K), Ruth Marcus writes, "I have high hopes for the Clinton-McCain Commission to Fix Social Security. Haven't heard of it? Actually, neither have Hillary Clinton and John McCain. It's my long-shot scheme for tackling the problem." She writes, "The political system right now is too broken, and relations between President Bush and congressional Democrats too frayed, to deal with the truly daunting entitlement issues, Medicare and Medicaid. Social Security is entitlement reform on training wheels. … As the front-runners for their parties' presidential nominations, Sens. Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) have a shared interest in getting Social Security off the presidential plate before January 2009." Marcus adds, "The president should issue an order creating the commission, announce, LBJ-style, that he wants Clinton and McCain at the helm, and impose a tight deadline -- six months at most. … Then he should set up the commission in a way that's doubly tilted against him."

WPost Repeats Call For Senate To Require Electronic Campaign-Finance Reports. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/6, A24, 690K) notes that three years ago, it "decried the senseless and costly loophole under which people running for the Senate -- alone among federal political candidates and committees -- aren't required to file campaign finance reports electronically. In an age when such reports can be filed with the click of a mouse, Senate candidates submit their disclosures on paper, with weeks of delay before they are transferred to a form available and searchable on the Internet." The Post writes, "Three years later, the situation remains unaddressed. … It would be easy to change the rule, and the Senate should do so in the final days of the 109th Congress."

Senate GOP Criticized For Backing Schumer New York Project. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "You would think the last thing Senate Republicans would want to do in their final lame-duck days this week is approve a new $682 million subsidy gift to Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat who just cleaned their electoral clocks." GOP tax writers "are preparing to award Mr. Schumer this money for 'transportation infrastructure projects.' One of the projects to be funded: a new train from Manhattan to John F. Kennedy Airport. Why people in Oshkosh or Olympia should have to pay for this urban choochoo is a mystery." What "makes this project especially objectionable is the creative financing conjured up to pay for it. This earmark hangs like a Christmas ornament from a must-pass bill to extend certain annual tax credits. And how's this for a misnomer? The subsidy is called the 'New York Liberty Zone Tax Credit.'" The result is "a new $2 billion hole in the budget. Our Congressional sources say this is the first time this kind of tax credit has been provided for a city or state to pay for infrastructure pork."

OTHER NEWS:

Reports Paint Mixed Picture Of US Economy. The Washington Post (12/6, D1, Henderson, 690K) reports, "The US economy can't seem to make up its mind. It keeps showing strength and weakness, with fresh data yesterday providing still more mixed signals -- and fueling a debate over whether the housing slump is dragging the nation into a recession." The "conflicting data could be a sign that the economy is turning, with what was at first a mild growth slowdown about to give way to a harsher downturn, some analysts said." But "others echoed the Federal Reserve, countering that the worst news is still coming from businesses involved in housing and automobile production while the rest of the economy is holding up." The Post adds, "The situation has left many investors confused and queasy; stock prices rose yesterday after falling Friday, as did the dollar." The "pessimists could point yesterday to the Commerce Department's report that new orders to U.S. factories fell 4.7 percent in October, the steepest decline in six years. … But optimists noted that the much larger service sector of the economy -- which includes health care, finance, education, travel and entertainment, accounting for 87 percent of the nation's economic output -- grew more briskly in November than in the month before, according to an index published yesterday by the Institute for Supply Management."

The Washington Times (12/6, 88K) reports "activity in services accelerated in November, indicating that the economy was able to shake off the effects of a deep housing slump more easily than many economists expected, according to a report from the Institute for Supply Management. The rise in the institute's service index to 58.9 from 57.1 in October contrasted with a fall into recession territory in the organization's closely watched manufacturing index reported on Friday, and provided a positive offset to a spate of weak economic news last week. … Many economists had expected the services index to decline to 55.5. Readings above 50 indicate an expansion in industries such as retailing, banking and construction." But "manufacturing remains a question mark."

The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A6, Conkey, 2.04M) says "US labor costs have been rising at a much slower rate this year than previously thought, suggesting the nation's tight labor market is less likely to stoke inflation in the months ahead." The Labor Department "reported yesterday that unit labor costs in the nonfarm business sector -- a measure of how much employees are paid to produce a single unit of output -- rose at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, considerably less than its earlier estimate of 3.8%. In addition, the department said unit labor costs fell at a 2.4% rate during the second quarter, rather than growing at the originally estimated 5.4% pace."

The Wall Street Journal (12/6, Ip, 2.04M) also reports, "Federal Reserve officials -- unlike bond investors -- think the economy is a lot sounder today than at the end of 2000 and in early 2001, when the Fed abruptly reversed course and began a string of interest-rate cuts. Yet Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's effort to convey the message that today's conditions are different is hampered by the Fed's lack of candor back in 2000." Fed officials, "who have universally voiced concerns about inflation, are expected to keep short-term interest rates steady at 5.25% at their policy meeting next Tuesday. But bond markets have priced in a small chance of a rate cut next week and three one-quarter percentage-point cuts over the next 12 months." Markets "anticipate those cuts in part because they see parallels to 2000."

Dow Nears New High. USA Today (12/6, 6B, 2.27M) reports, "The Standard & Poor's 500 index scored its second-consecutive six-year high Tuesday after a report showing unexpected strength in the key services sector renewed optimism about corporate profit growth. The benchmark S&P added 5.64 points, or 0.4%, to 1414.76 for its highest close since Nov. 7, 2000. The S&P now is up 13.3% this year. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points, or 0.4%, to 12,331.60, which is just 11 points from a new all-time high. T he Dow is up 15.1% this year. The Nasdaq composite remained the relative laggard, rising 3.99 points, or 0.2%, to 2452.38 for an 11.2% 2006 gain." The Wall Street Journal (12/6, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports on the stocks markets under the headline "Upbeat Data Lift Street's Spirits; Stocks Climb."

US Manufacturing Seen As Thriving. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 6, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "With all the reports about American jobs being shipped overseas and so many US industries taking a real beating, our next story may surprise you. Because it turns out American manufacturing is still the envy of the world." CBS (Regan) added, "They're part of the American landscape... Caterpillar, or Cat, is the number one maker of tractors and earth-moving machines all over the world. So when Panama wants to expand its canal, it turns to Cat. And when China mines nickel, Cat again. CEO Jim Owens says the company ships $9 billion worth of machines overseas every year. What surprises you the most about how Americans perceive manufacturing here in the US?" James Owens, CEO Cat: "I guess it surprises me that Americans thinks we're losing." Regan: "We're not. Last year, America produced $1.79 trillion worth of goodies, almost twice as much as second-place Japan. The key to success in factories like this comes down to one thing -- a steady increase in worker productivity. In other words, it's not your grandparents' assembly line. Every year for the last decade, American workers have increased manufacturing productivity by more than 4%. And it's because of employees like Jack Morgenstern. He figured out how to take minutes off parts distribution on Cat's engine line in Peoria, Illinois." Jack Morgenstern: "I would say there's at least 25 to 30 parts that each assembler uses at each station. So my idea was to coordinate them in the kits where the first assembler would not have to reach for anything, they could tame them off the top." Regan: "That idea has resulted in two more engines a day." Owens: "We're more competitive with our manufacturing in the United States than we were 15 or 20 years ago because we've broken through a lot of those hurdle where's people had tightly-defined jobs and didn't work together." Regan: "Caterpillar's products are the number one or two best sellers on every continent, proving that made in the USA is a very valuable label."

US Dollar's Slide Examined. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Trumbull, 59K) analyzes the effects of a US dollar slide, pointing that "prices are rising for foreign goods, but a falling greenback could help balance the world economy and fix America's trade deficit. … A weaker dollar, over time, could help the world economy become better balanced -- with America less reliant on borrowing and Asia less dependent on exports to fuel development. But currency realignment also holds risks. It would impose some hardship on Americans, and on the many nations that sell goods to them. A sudden shift could jolt US consumers with higher prices at a time when some economists worry about a possible recession." In an editorial, the New York Times (12/6, 1.16M) says that "the great unknowables are the timing and steepness of a sustained dollar decline. Over the past few years, investors who bet on a weakening dollar have lost money." But "the current swoon is a reminder that no nation, even the United States, can borrow forever without facing up to economic consequences. The government has been assuming -- correctly, so far -- that the United States is too big to fail. Administration officials seem confident that the Chinese, in particular, will continue to finance the nation's deficits, because doing so helps their exports. They also assume that China and other countries won't sell off chunks of their huge dollar holdings, lest they drive the dollar down, and with it, the value of their remaining dollar-based assets."

Jennings Presses Case For Challenge In Florida's 13th CD. Roll Call (12/6, McArdle) reports it "could be well into the 110th Congress before a Member from Florida's 13th district is seated by the House — and the next several weeks could prove to be explosive as the fight plays out in the courts and on Capitol Hill." Democrat bank executive Christine Jennings "is in Washington, D.C., this week, meeting with party leaders and drumming up financial support as she continues to dispute the results that appeared to hand auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) a 369-vote victory." Although Jennings "already has filed suit in a Florida circuit court seeking a revote, she said in an interview Tuesday that she also intends to contest the result with the House Administration Committee — which has oversight over federal elections — by the Dec. 20 deadline. Jennings and her attorneys already have met with Democratic staff members from the committee to discuss the filing process." Jennings said she "still held out hope that the Florida courts might order a revote for the entire 13th district or just in Sarasota County, where Jennings insists malfunctions with the electronic voting machines produced 18,000 undervotes — and changed the outcome of the election." Filing an "official protest with the House Administration Committee will automatically make the Jennings/Buchanan case one of the first indicators of just how partisan the 110th Congress will be, and observers won't even have to wait until the new year to begin to see the fissures."

The Hill (12/6, Blake) reports Jennings was "in Washington over the last two days renewing her call for a revote in her race against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), as government and independent reviews failed to support her case." Jennings said she "would do everything she could to see the legal challenge through. She set up shop at Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee headquarters and was to meet with lawmakers including Reps. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) and Rush Holt (D-N.J.). She was also asking for financial support and continuing to push her case to the news media." Jennings's visit "came as state officials continued their audit of the touch-screen voting machines in Sarasota County, where an abnormally high number of ballots cast were 'undervotes,' meaning they failed to register votes in the congressional race for the 13th District." The audit has "yet to produce any evidence of machine errors, and a review by a local newspaper published Tuesday points to ballot design as the leading cause of the undervotes."

House Urged To Declare 13th CD Vacant, Requiring Special Election. In a Roll Call op-ed (12/6), Richard L. Hasen of the Loyola Law School says, "The elections last month brought us the 2006 version of the butterfly ballot. This time, it appears that poor ballot design or machine malfunctions with electronic voting machines caused thousands of voters to skip the race for Florida's 13th Congressional district, leading to a 369-vote victory by the Republican candidate over the Democratic one. Once again the matter is in court, and once again the courts are not likely to give a remedy. But this time there's another option. The House can — and should — declare the seat vacant, requiring the seat to be filled by a special election."

Mail Voting Seen As Alternative To Flawed Election Process. In a New York Times op-ed (12/6), Ruth Goldway, a commissioner on the Postal Rate Commission, says that on election day, there was "one state where all went well: Oregon, where everyone votes by mail. Since Oregon adopted Vote by Mail as its sole voting option in 1998, the state's turnout has increased, concerns about fraud have decreased, a complete paper trail exists for every election, recounts are non-controvertible and both major political parties have gained voters. Moreover, in doing away with voting machines, polling booths, precinct captains and election workers, the state estimates that it saves up to 40 percent over the cost of a traditional election. Vote by Mail could offer real advantages if it were adopted nationwide."

Jefferson's Fate To Be Decided In Runoff For Louisiana's 2nd CD. USA Today (12/6, 8A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago." Now, the "weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer." Democratic Rep. William Jefferson "has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime. In an open primary election last month, he placed first with 30% of the vote. None of the 13 candidates got a majority, so he faces Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter in a runoff election Saturday." Jefferson has been "outraised financially and was stripped of his most powerful committee assignment by Democratic leaders, but few here count him out." If Carter "wins, Jefferson will be the only Democrat to lose his seat this year for any reason."

Vilsack Sees Energy Security As Key'08 Issue. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Feldmann, 59K) reports on outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's appearance at a Monitor breakfast. Vilsack "knows he's a long shot. He says so. But he has an answer to the inevitable question: How does an obscure Midwestern governor get past the Hillary Rodham Clinton juggernaut and now 'Obama-mania,' as the junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, also considers a run?" Vilsack said, "You have to work longer, and you have to work smarter, and that's what we intend to do." There is "nothing flashy about Vilsack," and when "asked about Obama-style charisma, he countered with his own version: 'There is a quiet charisma,' he said, a charisma that causes voters to say 'he's authentic and real and has done well.'" Vilsack also "notes that among the dozen or so other Democrats who may run for president, only two are candidates from west of the Mississippi River and are governors: himself and Bill Richardson of New Mexico." A "signature issue for Vilsack will be energy security."

USA Today (12/6, 8A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Gov. Vilsack "pitched energy independence as a path to security, jobs and health Tuesday." Vilsack "is one of several Democrats staking their cases on executive experience, appeal beyond the usual Democratic states and voters, or both." At a lunch "with journalists from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service, Vilsack struck themes meant to help him stand out in a group that includes Bayh, son of former senator Birch Bayh; former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a former Energy secretary." Vilsack said "energy security is a cause 'with extraordinary opportunity to unite this country.'"

The Washington Times (12/6, Pfeiffer, 88K) reports Vilsack said "he doesn't fear any of his fellow Democrats considering a run for president in 2008 and is happy to run as an underdog, even in his home state's important caucus." Vilsack said, "I respect everyone who is running, but I don't fear anyone." The Times adds that in "a meeting with reporters in Washington yesterday, however, the governor most frequently returned to criticism of Sen. John McCain and the Arizona Republican's call for increasing troop levels in Iraq." Vilsack said, "I don't believe he's exercised particularly good judgment."

Clinton Taking "Concrete Steps" Toward 2008 Run. The Washington Post (12/6, A1, Balz, Cillizza, 690K) reports in a front page story that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "is taking a series of concrete steps toward a likely campaign for president in 2008, settling on key members of her campaign team, recruiting potential new additions to her staff, and calling Democratic activists in states with early primaries and caucuses." Sources "knowledgeable about her thinking" said "no final decision on running is expected before the end of the year." Clinton is working "methodically through a checklist of preparatory steps," and "she and her inner circle are already ramping up for what could be a history-making bid for the White House." The "latest move is the choice of longtime adviser Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager. That follows the recent recruitment of three seasoned political operatives who, if she runs, would play key roles on what is now a rapidly expanding Clinton campaign organization." Clinton is "operating on a model she used before she decided to run for the Senate in 2000." Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson said, "If you want to understand the process she is going through now, you need only look at the process she went through in 1999. In that race, she reached out to elected officials, to potential donors [and] to policy experts and had lengthy serious meetings about whether she should run, the issues before the country, [and] what a campaign would look like."

The Washington Times (12/6, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Speculation about the presidential plans of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has reached a fevered pitch this week as newspapers and Web sites scramble to be the first with the big headline that the former first lady will run." Clinton spokeswoman Lorraine Voles said Clinton "certainly…is actively weighing whether to run for president in 2008." Voles said, "After her election, she said she was going to look at this. As part of that process, she has been making some phone calls."

Obama Boomlet Seen As Driving Force Behind Clinton's Renewed Effort. NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 3, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "A funny thing, if you listen to Democrats, happened on" Hillary Clinton's "cakewalk to presumptive Democratic Party nominee status this next election and that person was Barack Obama. Is that what is behind this accelerated talk of Senator Clinton as the Democratic candidate?" NBC (Russert) added, "Is it ever. Since October 22, when Barack Obama said he may in fact seek the nomination in '08, Hillary Clinton realizes she cannot let a vacuum be created because Obama was filling it. That's why she had to reach out to African-American New York Democrats, quickly, because she knew they would be very receptive to Obama. Brian, Obama is going to New Hampshire this Sunday. He's been in Iowa twice. Hillary Clinton on the phone -- where? To Iowa and to New Hampshire. She cannot afford to sit back and wait until February or March. The Iowa caucuses are 57 weeks away. Every day counts. She had to move."

Morris Says Clinton Can Win, But She Would Be A "Disaster." In his column in The Hill (12/6), Dick Morris says Sen. Clinton "definitely can win … and probably will. She is uniquely able to expand the electorate to bring in millions of women, mostly single, who will vote overwhelmingly for a female Democrat." The "enthusiasm that will grip many Americans — women in particular — at the cultural implications of a woman president will probably sweep through the primaries and cause many to overlook Hillary's flaws and dismiss her defects. The generic of a woman candidate will prove so attractive that millions of voters will overcome their objections to the specific person who is running." Clinton's "mastery of the establishment of the Democratic Party, her vast lead among ex-officio delegates — many of whom have received campaign contributions from her coffers — and the celebrity draw of her ex-president husband will prove hard for a mere mortal to overcome. But should she win? No way!" Those who "know both Hillary and Bill well and are willing to speak frankly in public realize the fundamental differences between the two and grasp how his abilities are the counterpoints to her defects." He "made a very good domestic-policy president. She would be a disaster at home and abroad."

Bayh Files Paperwork For '08 Exploratory Committee. USA Today (12/6, 8A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Evan Bayh "filed papers to raise money for the Democratic nomination." Bayh "said he is moving toward a 2008 race because America needs to 'get back on the path to greatness.' The former two-term governor will be in Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio and New Hampshire this week."

Edwards Hires Bonior For Possible Presidential Bid. Fox News' Special Report (12/5, Hume) reported, "Former Democratic vice presidential candidate, John Edwards has not announced that he will run for president in 2008, but he has hired former Democratic Congressman David Bonior to manage his campaign if there is one. Bonior has close ties to labor unions. Since leaving Congress, he has been a professor of labor studies at Wayne State University in Detroit and chairman of an organization that promotes workers' rights to unionize."

The Washington Times (12/6, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that "an Edwards adviser said last week that Mr. Bonior will manage the effort if Mr. Edwards decides to run. In the meantime, Mr. Bonior has signed on as a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards' leadership PAC, the One America Committee, the Associated Press reports."

McCain's Mother Hurt At Son's Holiday Party. Roll Call (12/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that the "most popular guest at Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) bustling media-and-money holiday party Monday night wound up in the hospital. Roberta McCain, the Senator's 94-year-old mother, fell as she was walking out of the star-studded bash at the Corcoran Gallery of Art and injured her hip." After "driving herself (as usual) to the party and hobnobbing for two hours with her fans in the media and supporters and guests of her son, the fiercely independent Mrs. McCain took a tumble on the front steps of the Corcoran as she was walking to her car." Friends "drove her to the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., where doctors discovered she had a 'hairline fracture below the joint,' according to a senior McCain aide." Roll Call adds McCain's "bash, paid for by his Straight Talk America political action committee, sure looked like a dry run for potential future White House Christmas parties." The party "drew an A-list of the media and politicos. Guests instinctively formed a receiving line to greet McCain and get a photo." Notable "primary- and caucus-state Senators who attended the bash: John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who reiterated his devotion to McCain's probable presidential bid while Sununu continued to play coy."

Emotional Bush 41 Praises Son Jeb. The CBS Evening News (12/5, story 8, 0:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported,

"Former President George Herbert Walker Bush has always shied away from public displays of emotion, so we wanted to show you what was a very rare and touching scene yesterday in Florida. He was giving a speech on leadership, and cited son, Jeb, as an example for the way he handled losing the governor's race in 1994. The former President said that while voters chose the other candidate..." Former President George HW Bush: "They took note of his defeated opponent, who showed not merely with words but by his actions what decency was." Couric: Jeb Bush, of course, was later elected governor in 1998 and re-elected in 2002."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 10, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The former President, an emotional guy, became emotional and had to stop more than once when talking about Jeb's 1994 loss to Governor Lawton Chiles and how his son held up in the face of a tough campaign." Former President HW Bush: "In '94, Floridians chose to rehire the Governor. They took note of his defeated opponent who showed not merely with words but by his actions what decency he and...I can do it." Williams: "With support from his son and the crowd, the former President recovered. He said his wife Barbara would 'bawl him out for breaking up.' He went on to finish his speech by saying to those Florida lawmakers, your Governor has served with honor."

Whistleblower Sworn In As Alaska Governor. The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Rosen, 59K) reports Sarah Palin "crushed Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican gubernatorial primary. Then in the general election she defeated former Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles, a political veteran who was seeking a return to the office he held for two terms." At her "swearing-in in Fairbanks, she simultaneously became Alaska's first female governor, Alaska's youngest governor, and the state's only beauty-queen-turned-chief-executive. Not bad for a suburban mother of four with a relatively thin résumé that critics claimed marked her as a lightweight." Palin's "victory stems partly from the fact that her campaign bore little connection to the rest of the US." Palin "turned her relative lack of political experience into an asset. She presented, according to campaign slogans, a 'fresh face' offering 'new energy for Alaska.' That resonated with an electorate that was in a decidedly antiestablishment, anti-incumbent mood." High on "her priority list is a plan to take a tougher line with the oil industry, which she says has been 'making mind-boggling profits' from Alaska's resources." Also a "top priority, she says, is restoring a sense of ethics to a state where citizens are weary of government scandals." Palin "gained much of her prominence as a whistle-blower."

NRC Commissioner Seeks To Inspire Others Toward Public Service. Under the headline, "A Public Servant To The Last; Before Stepping Down, He Calls a New Generation to Serve," the Washington Post (12/6, A23, Williamson, 690K) reports, "In 1961, Ed McGaffigan Jr. was a seventh-grader from Boston watching the inauguration on television when a president told him to ask what he could do for his country." That speech "inspired a three-decade career that included stints at the State Department, the White House, the US Embassy in Moscow, Capitol Hill and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, where last month McGaffigan became the agency's longest-serving commissioner. McGaffigan, who turns 58 on Friday, would normally have many more years of service ahead. Instead, he is fighting an illness that threatens to vanquish him, and he is taking on one last assignment: closing his career in a way that inspires others to consider public service."

Survey Suggests Ambivalence Toward Public Service. Under the headline, "Potential Employees Express Lukewarm Interest in Working for the Government," the Washington Post's (12/6, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many people the government wants as employees are interested in working for Uncle Sam, but they don't see the government as being as innovative and creative as the private sector, according to a Gallup survey released yesterday. While survey respondents gave the government high marks on job security and compensation, only 3 percent said they see the government as more innovative and creative than the private sector, only 5 percent think it is better at recruiting the best and brightest, and only 6 percent viewed the government as providing a more competitive work environment." The survey is the "latest in a series of efforts aimed at helping the government cope with a wave of baby-boom retirements predicted to set off a "war for talent" with the private sector. The government is particularly vulnerable because substantial numbers of federal employees are projected to retire in 2008 and 2009 and because many young Americans do not view the government as their employer of first choice."

Former GOP Aides Form Defense Firm. The Washington Post's (12/6, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "just as the Hill is staffing up with Democrats to investigate administration officials, former Republican aides are rushing to offer their services in defense." Hill veteran Mark Corallo -- formerly with the House Government Reform Committee, later Justice Department chief spokesman and most recently Karl Rove's spokesman during the Valerie Plame investigation -- is teaming up with the redoubtable Barbara Comstock, who boasts similarly top credentials" to form the firm Corallo Comstock.

Mary Cheney Pregnant. The Washington Post (12/6, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column that Mary Cheney, "the vice president's openly gay daughter, is pregnant. She and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, are 'ecstatic' about the baby, due in late spring, said a source close to the couple." It's a "baby boom for grandparents Dick and Lynne Cheney: Their older daughter, Elizabeth, went on leave as deputy assistant secretary of state before having her fifth child in July." News of "the pregnancy will undoubtedly reignite the debate about gay marriage."

US Offers North Korea Aid For Dropping Nuclear Plans. The New York Times (12/6, A14, Cooper, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Washington has offered "a detailed package of economic and energy assistance in exchange for North Korea's giving up nuclear weapons and technology," American officials said Tuesday. However, the offer, "made last week during two days of intense talks in Beijing, would hinge on North Korea's agreeing to begin dismantling some of the equipment it is using to expand its nuclear arsenal, even before returning to negotiations." The Times says it remains "unclear whether North Korea will accept the offer, which is more specific -- in both the details and the timing -- than a vaguely worded statement of principles that the North signed in September 2005, a year before its first nuclear test." According to a "senior administration official," the "combination of incentives and demands was the focal point of three-way meetings on Nov. 28 and 29 involving" Assistant Secretary Hill, North Korea's vice foreign minister, Kim Kye-gwan, and Chinese officials in Beijing. The incentives offered by the United States "include food aid from the United States, Japan and South Korea," the official said. The Times calls the offer "significant" because the administration "has resisted making clear to North Korea exactly what kind of aid it would receive if it agreed to begin taking apart facilities."

Diplomats Fail To Reach Accord On Iran Sanctions. The AP (12/6, Charlton) reports diplomats meeting in Paris Tuesday made "substantive progress" but "failed to reach an accord…on a UN resolution to punish Iran for defying demands to halt its nuclear program," the French Foreign Ministry said. "We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions targeting proliferation-sensitive activities. There remain several outstanding issues, upon which we will reflect over the coming days," the French ministry said in a statement, noting that the parties "are now close to a conclusion of this process." Despite France's insistence that a compromise is near, the AP notes that "illustrating the divisions that have tangled the negotiations," Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that imposing wide-ranging sanctions would be "irresponsible." Speaking in Brussels, Lavrov said Russia believes "that to impose these kind of sanctions would be...disproportionate to the real situation. … We believe this is wrong. We will work in a more responsible way." However, European diplomats "said the Russians made some concessions at Tuesday's talks," including agreeing to a measure "prohibiting financial transfers to 'problematic' Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs." Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "vowed Tuesday to stick by the nuclear program and issued a new threat to downgrade relations" with the EU "if European negotiators opted for tough UN sanctions." However, he gave no details on how ties might be downgraded. AFP (12/6) reports that the French ministry said the "next step will be in New York" at UN headquarters, "without specifying when the next round of talks would take place."

Iran Urges Arabs To Expel US Troops, Join Regional Alliance. The Washington Times/AP (12/6, Krane) reports Iran's top national security official "urged Arabs yesterday to expel the US military from bases in the region and instead join Tehran in a regional security alliance." The offer was seen as "a strong sign of Iran's rising assertiveness in its contest with the United States for influence in the region." However, experts says Persian Gulf countries, "suspicious of Iran's intentions, are unlikely to respond to the call and push out the US military or end US security deals they view as offering them an umbrella of protection."

Iran To Host Conference On Holocaust Evidence. The New York Times (12/6, A5, Fathi, 1.16M) reports Iranian authorities announced plans on Tuesday for an international conference on the Holocaust next Monday and Tuesday. Organizers expect "more than 60 scholars from 30 countries and would examine a range of issues, including whether the gas chambers were actually used." Deputy Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mohammadi said the conference would "provide the opportunity for scholars from both sides to give their papers in freedom and without preconceived ideas."

Lebanese Commander Says Military May Not Be Able To Halt Protests. The Washington Times/AP (12/6, Ghattas) reports Lebanese Army Commander Michel Suleiman Tuesday "warned that the military may not be able to contain further protests linked to the country's tense political standoff." Therefore, he "urged politicians to compromise," but the AP reports that the standoff "shows no sign of waning despite calls from the two sides for dialogue to resolve their differences."

The Washington Post (12/6, A14, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah has "entered territory uncharted in its 24-year history…effectively seeking an unprecedented, decisive say in Lebanese politics to protect what it sees as its interests from foes at home and abroad." The Post says the "month-long political crisis that has roiled Lebanon…marks a revealing shift for the Shiite Muslim movement that for years, at least rhetorically, tried to stay above politics."

Israeli Textbooks To Show Pre-1967 West Bank Border. The Washington Post (12/6, A15, Wilson, 690K) reports that maps in future Israeli public school textbooks "will show the boundary that existed between Israel and the West Bank before the 1967 Middle East war," Israeli Education Minister Yuli Tamir announced Tuesday. The move "drew sharp protest from lawmakers, settler groups and religious leaders who claim the West Bank as part of the Jewish state."

Consultants Warn Palestinians Developing Ties With Al Qaeda. Mideast consultants Louis Rene Beres and Clare M. Lopez write in the Washington Times (12/6, Beres, Lopez, 88K) that the "Palestinian link to al Qaeda has become more than mere sympathy and friendship. Al Qaeda has now set its sights on Israel and on an incremental takeover of the Palestinian cause. This is the next phase of its campaign to dominate the Muslim world and re-establish an Islamic Caliphate." According to Beres and Lopez, "Joint Palestinian-al Qaeda teams are planning coordinated mega-terror strikes against Israel and America." Therefore, they urge both Israel and the US to "immediately cease any and all assistance to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority."

Musharraf Hints At Resolution With India Over Kashmir. The New York Times (12/6, A6, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said in an Indian television program broadcast Tuesday that Islamabad "could accept a solution to the festering dispute over Kashmir if New Delhi were to agree to greater autonomy and gradual demilitarization in the Indian-controlled swath of the territory." In an interview with NDTV, Musharraf said, "Inherently, both sides have to give up their positions." The Times says the Pakistani leader's remarks "signal, however, that even as official peace talks yield virtually no breakthroughs, the areas of disagreement between the rivals could well be shrinking."

Frist Says Congress Will Complete India Nuclear Bill This Week. AFP (12/6) reports Senate leader Bill Frist "assured India's Prime Minister Manmohan Singh that a major US-India nuclear energy bill is on track for completion this week." Frist said he spoke Tuesday with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and assured him "that one of my top priorities for the remainder of this Congress is to enact this legislation," and he is "confident that we will be able to complete congressional action on it this week."

Somali PM Says Troops Prepared for War. The AP (12/6, Tomlinson) reports Somalia's troops are "ready for an imminent and inevitable war with the Islamic militia that has taken over much of the country and surrounded the internationally backed government," Somali Prime Minister Ali Gedi said in a recent interview. Gedi told The AP that Islamic militant leaders "are the decision makers now," and "those who believe that the situation in Somalia will be solved through dialogue and talks are wrong." However, he said his government will "continue to take part in all peace efforts while preparing to defend itself against attacks."

Rebels Threaten To Withdraw From Darfur Peace Deal. The AP (12/6, De Montesquiou) reports the "only Darfur rebel group to sign a peace agreement with the government threatened Tuesday to pull out from the deal if Khartoum-backed militias continue to attack civilians in the troubled region." The "ultimatum" from the Sudan Liberation Movement "came a day after the pro-government janjaweed paramilitary looted the central market in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur, and clashed with SLM fighters, killing at least two," the AP notes. The group's leader warned that the Sudanese government "must disarm and neutralize the janjaweed by the end of this month" or "a bridge will be crossed, and no one knows what will happen."

Russia Restricts Investigation As Suspect Identified In Poison Probe. ABC World News (12/5, story 4, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "significant developments" in the poisoning death of former Russian spy Aexander Litvinenko. "A British official tells ABC News that British detectives have identified a prime suspect -- a man who also once was a Russian spy. But now, the British detectives are finding they will not get cooperation from Russia." ABC (Sciutto) added, "British detectives had just arrived in Moscow when Russian officials said they would not let them see the man they consider their prime suspect, former Russian spy Andrei Lugovoi. He was unavailable, Russian officials said, hospitalized with signs of radiation poisoning."

NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 7, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) said "in an indication just how sensitive this probe is, today Russia warned it would conduct any interviews" with persons of interest in the case, and British investigators "could sit in." The AP (12/6, Isachenkov) reports Russia's top prosecutor said Tuesday that Moscow "will not extradite possible Russian suspects to Britain" and "warned that British detectives would not be allowed to carry out interrogations in Russia." The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A5, Cullison, Chazan, Mollenkamp, 2.04M) reports Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika also "ruled out questioning leaders at the FSB, Russia's state security service."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/6, A12, Kramer, 1.16M) reports that for Russian law enforcement the investigation has been "a delicate one because President Vladimir Putin was blamed" for the poisoning by Litvinenko on his deathbed. The Washington Post (12/6, A18, Finn, Jordan, 690K) and Los Angeles Times (12/6, Holley, 850K) also report on the developments.

Ukrainian Prime Minister Meets With Rice, Cheney. The Washington Times (12/6, Sands, 88K) reports, "Ukraine will reject any effort to be used as a pawn in any struggle for influence between Russia and the West, Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych said yesterday at the end of a two-day visit to Washington." Yanukovych said "his four-month-old government will not lobby strongly for membership in NATO in the face of weak popular support for the trans-Atlantic alliance inside Ukraine." Yanukovych held "low-key talks with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his visit," and they discussed "Ukraine's World Trade Organization bid, energy security and domestic reforms in Ukraine." Yanukovych "declined to criticize recent anti-democratic moves by Russian President Vladimir Putin," and said, "The most important thing is that Ukraine should not be allied with Russia against the United States and the European Union or vice versa. We are not going to conduct such a policy."

European Recovery Gives Boost To Global Economy. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, A1, Walker, 2.04M) reports, "Europe's economy is firing on all cylinders after years of feeble growth, helping to sustain global expansion as the US economy slows and surprising many economists who doubted the Continent could muster enough demand to break its reliance on exports." Its recovery "was ignited by rising exports, but it is now spreading to investment, job creation and consumer spending." The 12-nation euro currency area "earned Europe a reputation rivaling Japan's as the world's economic laggard." Euro-zone gross domestic product is "on course to grow by 2.7% this year," and "a strengthening euro and looming tax increases in Germany could brake euro-zone growth next year, most forecasters still expect an expansion of around 2%." Europe's recovery "still has flaws," but much of the improvement this year "has occurred in Germany, which is helping to buoy its neighbors after taking some painful steps, while many companies in France and Italy still struggle to cope with fierce global competition."

Immigration Helps UK's Economy. The Wall Street Journal (12/6, Peaple, 2.04M) reports, "An influx of immigrant labor after the European Union expanded in 2004 has fueled a surge in the UK economy and is expected to prompt the government to announce today that growth this year will be faster than expected." Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown said last week that the "faster growth trend was due at least in part to the wave of immigration that has washed over Britain," as the government "estimates that 600,000 people have moved to the UK from Central and Eastern Europe since the EU grew by 10 countries two years ago." More than two-thirds of them already found jobs, "increasing Britain's work force by 1.5%." The Centre for Economic and Business Research says "migrant workers add £54 billion ($107 billion) a year to output, or around 5% of GDP." Other EU countries, including Ireland and Sweden, "have been similarly jolted by immigration flows, though not to the extent seen in Britain, which is equipped with a heavily service-based economy and liberal labor laws that help it absorb more jobs."

Fiji Declares State Of Emergency After Coup. The Washington Post/AP (12/6, A14, Lilley) reports, "Fiji's military commander declared a state of emergency Wednesday, a day after he overthrew the elected government and brought international sanctions and censure that began to isolate the South Pacific country." This was the "fourth coup in 20 years, " and armed forces will "set up checkpoints around Suva, the capital, as part of the state of emergency." Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase "flew Wednesday from the capital to his home village on the remote, northeastern Lau Islands," said his private secretary Pene Nonu. The armed forces chief, Commodore Frank Bainimarama "justified seizing power to prevent legislation that favored indigenous Fijians, contending that the measures 'would undermine the constitution and deny many citizens their rights.'"

Worldwide Rise In Uranium Prices Creating Boomtowns In Africa. Under the headline, "Rising Interest In Nuclear Power Brings New Life To Uranium Mining; Firm's Boom Helps Namibian Town, Worries Environmentalists," the Washington Post (12/6, A16, Timberg, 690K) reports from Arandis, Namibia, that "the nuclear industry, stagnant for two decades, reversed its fortunes at a time of rising oil prices and growing realization that burning fossil fuel caused global climate change. Nuclear went from being seen as a dirty source of energy to a comparatively clean, efficient one. From that shift in perception, mainly in the minds of Westerners thousands of miles away, the fate of this remote African town went from doom to boom." The Post adds, "Roessing Uranium Mine opened in 1976 during nuclear power's heyday. But the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and Chernobyl in 1986 caused a profound political backlash that nearly halted new reactor construction." Now, "Roessing, which recently made its first delivery to an increasingly energy-hungry China, has decided to continue mining until at least 2016, mine officials say. They expect to end this year with Roessing's first substantial profit, and tax bill to the Namibian government, in five years."

US Urged To Start China-Style "Green" Industrial Revolution. In a column titled "China's Sunshine Boys" in the New York Times (12/6, Friedman, 1.16M) columnist Thomas L. Friedman writes that Shi Zhengrong, ranked as the "seventh-richest man in China today" is China's "leading maker of silicon photovoltaic solar cells, which convert sunlight into electricity." He is a "green entrepreneur," and Friedman "wishes him well" as an environmentalist. However, as an American, he worries that "if we don't start doing everything we can to develop our own clean power," like Shi, "we're going to miss out on the green industrial revolution." China is "setting high standards for renewables, but is still weak on enforcement." The United States "is better at enforcement, but still weak on setting high standards." Friedman writes, "We need to get our act together, because eventually China will bring its enforcement in line with its regulations -- or it won't breathe." At that time, "China's emerging green power entrepreneurs could clean our clock in the clean power business."

LATimes Urges Completion Of US-South Korean Trade Talks. The Los Angeles Times (12/6, 850K) editorializes that as the fifth round of free talks between the US and South Korea get underway "the stakes for both countries are high and go beyond mere economics -- though the economies of both nations would benefit from a pact." The Times warns that "a failure would further strain already frayed relations between the US and South Korea and could push Seoul nearer to China's political and trade orbit."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror War A Bust Stats Inflated: Study (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, December 6, 2006

Federal authorities' strategy of arresting terror suspects on any charge possible has proved effective in thwarting attacks, but too often prosecutors have inflated the importance of the busts, a new study says.

"The strategy of disruption has worked, but they hyped these cases to be more than what they seemed," said Karen Greenberg, author of the study by New York University's Center of Law and Security.

"It leaves their record of prosecuting the war on terror unconvincing," she said yesterday.

Of 510 cases since the Sept. 11 attacks that the government said were terrorism-related, only 30% of the defendants were actually prosecuted on a terrorism charge, the NYU study found. Most of the others faced charges such as fraud, racketeering or conspiracy.

While 169 cases are still pending, only four people charged since the 2001 attacks were convicted for trying to commit an act of terrorism, the study said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the report "reflects the underlying premise of our strategy to prevent and disrupt terrorists before they can carry out what they may be conspiring to do, by using any and all tools at our disposal in the U.S. code."

Terror prosecutions have declined from a spike in the three months following the 9/11 attacks, when 116 people were indicted. Only 57 have been indicted in 2006.

The NYU study found that only 14% of the defendants were tied to Al Qaeda. Of the 510 defendants, more than half had "no known affiliation" with any terrorist group.

Justice officials said that suggests homegrown terror is a bigger threat than many realize.

Material support for terrorism was the most common charge in cases where a defendant was slapped with a federal terrorism offense - but only 30% were convicted. Officials noted, however, that the pending cases skew that statistic.

Former federal prosecutor Andrew McCarthy, who led probes of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, said the strategy has worked. But he said when the feds oversell a case's terror ties, it's "woefully unproductive [because] it tells the bad guys that we don't know what we think we know."

The report also found that no sleeper cell with "logistical or tactical links to Al Qaeda" has been uncovered in the U.S.

Power Of Privacy Board Questioned (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Civil liberties advocates urged a White House privacy board Tuesday to review aggressively the government's warrantless surveillance program, even as they questioned whether it has the power to do so.

The Privacy and Civil Liberties Board, created in late 2004 after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission, held its first hearing with testimony from nongovernment experts on ways to protect Americans' rights during the war on terror.

Its five members, who left the agenda open, repeatedly found themselves under scrutiny.

"This board needs to bring a little sunshine," said Caroline Frederickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. She said she was disappointed panel members recently praised the surveillance program's safeguards that a federal judge initially ruled as illegal.

"It remains clear that this program was built outside of, and in direct contradiction to, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and Fourth Amendment guaranteed protections," she said. "This panel's integrity and usefulness will be questioned if it dodges its duty to undertake a full review."

Board members defended their role, saying that as an advisory panel to the president it was not their job to determine whether the eavesdropping program was illegal but to find ways - in consultation with Congress and Bush - to improve it.

"Congress put us in the office of the president," said former Clinton White House counsel Lanny Davis, the panel's lone Democrat, after several audience members unsuccessfully asked the panel to divulge what specific issues it has raised with the White House.

"Had Congress wanted us to be an independent body, they would have made us an independent body," he said, explaining that as a result many of the board's deliberations will be kept secret. "Why Congress did what it did, that's an open question."

Privacy officers from the Office of Director of National Intelligence and the departments of Justice and Homeland Security also attended in a hearing described by the board as a "listening session."

The panel was created as a compromise between Congress and the White House amid growing public concern about the government's tactics in the war on terror, including the eavesdropping program, a financial transactions tracking system and secret CIA prisons where terrorism suspects have been interrogated.

Bush appointed Carol Dinkins, a Houston Republican, to chair the board. A longtime friend of the Bush family, she was treasurer of Bush's first campaign for governor of Texas, and a longtime partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins, where Attorney General Alberto Gonzales once was a partner.

The panel's other GOP members include vice chairman Alan Raul, a Washington attorney, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore B. Olson and former Ambassador Francis Taylor.

The board does not have subpoena power, and the White House can vet its annual reports to Congress. The members serve at the pleasure of Bush, and Gonzales has final say over whether officials must comply with the board's recommendations.

After a delay of more than a year, board members last week received classified briefings on the National Security Agency's surveillance program as well as the administration's program to monitor international banking transactions.

Raul and Davis have said in interviews that they were impressed by the protections and indicated that Americans might be "more reassured" if they knew all the details.

On Tuesday, privacy advocates said they were worried the board might be partly missing the point.

"We continue to be troubled by the argument that a president has no obligation to follow the law or respect other constitutional guarantees whenever he invokes national security as a justification for his actions," David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, told the panel.

Frederickson said she was not confident of the board's ability to get meaningful information from government agencies. Americans might be better off with legislation introduced by Reps. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y. and Christopher Shays, R-Conn., that would make the board independent from the president, she said.

Board members responded that they were briefed by administration officials on the surveillance program with the understanding that they had the same level of classified detail as members on the congressional intelligence committees.

The board's first report to Congress is due in March.

Civil Liberties Panel Criticized At Hearing (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

Some groups say the advisory board is powerless. Members, picked by Bush, seem to struggle in their watchdog role.

WASHINGTON — A presidential advisory commission created two years ago to monitor the effects of anti-terrorism measures on civil liberties held its first public hearing Tuesday amid criticism from advocacy groups that the panel was a paper tiger and indications that its members were wrestling with their watchdog role.

The four-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board was urged to take a more aggressive tack in checking the power of the Bush administration in its handling of the war on terrorism. Witnesses cited concerns over such policies as the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program and an error-plagued terrorist watch list that has ensnared innocent citizens.

"This hearing is a welcome, but long overdue, first step in the right direction to air just some of the civil liberties transgressions of this administration over the past five years," said Caroline Fredrickson of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Clearly, you've been fiddling while Rome burns."

Created by Congress in response to a recommendation by the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission, the panel was conceived as a way to ensure the administration considers implications on privacy and civil liberties when implementing "all laws, regulations and executive branch policies." In practice, though, its power is limited by the fact that its members are appointed by the president, whose policies they are supposed to scrutinize.

Its authority is also likely to change next month when Democrats take control of Congress. Some Democrats have proposed making the panel independent of the White House, with the power to subpoena witnesses and documents. Others have suggested that its influence could wane if Democrats take over one of the reasons for its existence — aggressive oversight of administration policies.

But board members said at the hearing that they were taking their job seriously. They have received classified briefings on the secret surveillance program and a separate program that monitored international bank data, and were also briefed on legislation to put new limits on the surveillance program.

"This program today is an exceedingly important part of our mission to hear these points of view, and we have a great deal to learn in order to perform our statutory responsibility," panel member Theodore B. Olson, Bush's first solicitor general, said at the hearing. In recent months, he said, the board has met with senior officials of the Justice Department, the National Intelligence office and the National Security Agency, among others.

"We have had access to anyone that we wanted to have access to," Olson said. "We have been able to ask any questions we wanted to, and they have been answered."

The hearing also showed that panel members were struggling over such basic issues as whether the advice they give to the administration will ever become public.

"It is important for us to maintain the confidentiality of the recommendations that we might or might not take," Alan Raul, a Washington lawyer and vice chairman of the panel, said in response to a question. "To share some of the private views we might have would undermine our ability to be effective as the statute contemplated."

The panel's lone Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, a former Clinton administration advisor, said Congress put the board in a predicament.

"We did not put ourselves in the office of the president. If Congress wanted us to be an independent agency, they would have created us as an independent agency," he said.

Civil Libertarians Protest Privacy Policy (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The Bush administration's new privacy guidelines fail to protect the rights of Americans, and the board created to guarantee those rights lacks the independence to do the job, civil libertarians told the White House privacy board yesterday at its first public forum.

The guidelines, released Monday, are intended to protect the personal privacy and civil liberties of U.S. citizens as the government attempts to strengthen its intelligence-sharing to fight terrorism.

But, said privacy advocate Marc Rotenberg, the guidelines pale in comparison to protections offered under the Privacy Act of 1974.

"What struck me about the guidelines when compared with the federal privacy act was the absence of transparency, the absence of oversight and the inability for individuals to know what information about them is being collected by the federal government," said Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. Rotenberg was one of 10 panelists yesterday at a forum held by the White House Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, a panel created by Congress in 2004.

The new guidelines, issued by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, direct agencies to develop procedures to ensure that information on "U.S. persons" is lawfully obtained, is shared only if it relates to terrorism or law enforcement, and that data errors are corrected. They do not require the people affected to be notified.

James Dempsey, a member of a Markle Foundation task force on privacy, said the guidelines lack substance and specificity. They do not address data-collection standards or set up appropriate redress mechanisms for people erroneously targeted in counterterrorism programs, he said.

Democrats, about to take control of Congress, have promised stronger oversight over the Bush administration's terrorism surveillance program and its push for stronger data-mining programs to identify terrorists.

The five-member privacy board, which started work in March, lacks subpoena power and has only four full-time staff members. President Bush appointed all five members, four of whom are Republicans, including Theodore B. Olson, the administration's former solicitor general.

"What we have established here is an oversight mechanism within the executive branch of government," Rotenberg said at the forum at Georgetown University. "To be effective, the agency has to be independent because even well-intended people seeking to protect privacy will necessarily be under institutional pressure to move in the direction the . . . institution wishes it to go."

Caroline Frederickson, legislative director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the board lacked any power to change policies on crucial issues such as citizen redress on terrorist and criminal watch lists.

"It's all bark and no bite," she said.

Frederickson called on Congress to give the board subpoena power and remove it from the executive branch. She also urged the board to be more aggressive in reviewing the government's surveillance program, which she said violates the Constitution.

Alexander W. Joel, the civil liberties and protection officer for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, said the 1974 Privacy Act is "an important foundation" and will continue to be.

"We have to be both safe and free," Joel said. "How do we do both? Sometimes by not doing as much on one side. Sometimes it's by adding work on the privacy and civil liberties side."

Board members, including Chairman Carole E. Dinkins, noted that the panel has visited the major agencies combating terrorism and met with senior officials, including the directors of national intelligence, the FBI and the National Security Agency. They received good cooperation and their questions were answered, board members said.

"We want to do this job conscientiously, and we're going to continue," Olson said.

Lanny J. Davis, the board's only Democrat, said he was puzzled about why Congress had placed what was supposed to be an independent oversight board under the president.

"That's an open question that none of us up here have been able to quite figure out," he said.

Bush's Privacy Watchdogs Make Public Debut (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 6, 2006

At its first public meeting, a White House panel hears from civil liberties advocates, but sheds little light on its supposed watchdog role.

WASHINGTON--In a stately, wood-paneled hall at Georgetown University, a seemingly phantom White House panel charged with overseeing privacy and civil liberties issues made its public debut on Tuesday. But it didn't quite receive the warm welcome it may have liked.

At its first open meeting since it was conceived two years ago, the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board heard more than three hours of tips for future action--and not all of it gentle--from advocacy groups, think tanks and academics of various political stripes.

Of the 10 such representatives who spoke on panels at the meeting, many urged the group to probe more deeply into the constitutional issues surrounding electronic surveillance, data mining and swapping, and terrorist watch list programs conducted by the government. Some didn't mince words.

"When our government is torturing innocent people and spying on Americans without a warrant, this board should act--indeed, should have acted long ago," Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington, D.C., office, told the panel in her testimony.

Training her gaze on the five presidentially appointed board members, she added: "Clearly you've been fiddling while Rome burns."

The board, borne out of an act of Congress in 2004 based on recommendations by the 9/11 Commission, has been dogged before. 9/11 Commission Chairman Thomas Kean, congressional Democrats, and watchdog groups accused the Bush administration of not taking the endeavor seriously and dragging their feet in nominating members and getting the group up and running.

That's because it was not until March 2006 that all of its members, which include partners at high-profile law firms and the chief security officer of General Electric, were confirmed by the U.S. Senate and able to hold their first meeting. Since then, they have held more than a dozen closed-door meetings composed "mainly of phone calls or teleconferences with administration insiders and agencies," by the ACLU's critical characterization.

Some board members implicitly acknowledged that rocky past but sought to reassure the sparsely populated hall that Tuesday afternoon's meeting, which they billed as an "expert's forum," would not be a one-shot deal.

"You should always feel free to raise your comments, your concerns and maybe, even an occasional compliment," Chairwoman Carol Dinkins, who served as a deputy attorney general in the Reagan administration's Justice Department and is now a partner, told an audience of about 40 people at the outset of the meeting. Dinkins is now a partner focusing on environmental and administrative law at the firm Vinson & Elkins.

How much power?

But in an ironic twist, the very group that the participants in Tuesday's meeting hoped to call to action wields less power than critics say it should.

By law, its members serve "at the pleasure" of the president, which means they can be retained or fired at his discretion. Although the body may request documents or interviews with officials, it lacks the power to subpoena such materials that many congressional committees and federal agencies enjoy. The government is free to withhold information if it determines that divulging it would thwart national security or "sensitive law enforcement or counterterrorism operations."

According to published reports, the board wasn't briefed until late last month on the National Security Agency's once-secret warrantless terrorist surveillance program, which has drawn legal challenges from civil liberties watchdogs who claim it sweeps up the phone calls and Internet communications of millions of innocent Americans. The program came to light through a New York Times report nearly a year ago.

Some members of Congress have proposed legislation that would beef up the board's powers. But at least one board member downplayed those concerns Tuesday.

"We have had access to anyone we've wanted to have to date," said board member Theodore "Ted" Olson, a partner with the firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher who focuses on appellate and constitutional law. "We have asked any questions we wanted to ask to date and they have been answered."

Suggestions and criticisms

The public meeting included no shortage of familiar suggestions from outside panelists--namely, that they believed the president's warrantless wiretapping program is operating outside of the law and the U.S. Constitution and must be reined in. But the afternoon brought a relative dearth of specific commitments on that front from the board members.

"Our chief burden as a board is to find the right balance between my own and, I believe, my colleagues' commitment to civil liberties and privacy rights while still giving the government the ability to protect our country, our children, and all of us from these forces of evil we all experienced on 9/11," said board member Lanny Davis, a former White House counsel under President Clinton and now a partner with the law firm Orrick in Washington, D.C.

During his testimony, Electronic Privacy Information Center Director Marc Rotenberg said he would be interested to hear whether the board agrees with the president's assertion that he has inherent authority to run the surveillance program without a court order. When fellow panelist Michael Ostrolenk of the Liberty Coalition, a civil liberties activist group, pressed the board members on whether they planned to answer that question, four of the board members remained mum.

Davis, the sole member to speak up, said he would prefer that "we go back to the conservative tradition of checks and balances," but seemed to suggest it was more Congress' duty than his own to curb the executive branch's power.

During a question-and-answer session, one audience member asked the board if it could reveal whether it had been briefed on how many Americans have had their phone records or Internet and phone communications monitored by the NSA.

"All that would be appropriate to say is that we did receive a detailed briefing with information of the kind you described," responded Vice Chairman Alan Raul, who served as a White House lawyer during the Reagan administration and is now a partner with a wide-ranging focus at the firm Sidley Austin in Washington D.C.

The audience member pressed the board member further, asking whether the board planned to recommend that such information be made public, just as the government is expected to disclose how many court-ordered wiretaps it completes each year, but Raul deferred again.

"I can't address the substance of the question," he said, adding: "Part of our ability to provide advice within the executive branch is the ability to provide advice confidentially and...to share some private views we have, I think, would undermine our (work)."

Raul's seemingly vague responses all go back to the manner in which Congress designed the board, fellow board member Davis said. "We didn't put ourselves in the office of the president," he said. "If Congress wanted us to be an independent agency, they would've created us as an independent agency."

How the board is supposed to reconcile its oversight duties under that umbrella, Davis added, remains "an open question that none of us up here have quite been able to figure out."

Italy Seeks Indictments Of C.I.A. Operatives In Egyptian's Abduction (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

ROME, Dec. 5 — Italian prosecutors asked Tuesday for the indictment of the country's former intelligence chief, along with 25 operatives of the Central Intelligence Agency, for their involvement in the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric from Milan in 2003.

The case is one of the most sensitive in Italy, raising the question of whether the Italian government broke the nation's laws by approving or assisting in the abduction.

Nicolò Pollari, the former chief of military intelligence, was replaced by the Italian government last month, possibly in anticipation of his indictment. On Tuesday, prosecutors in Milan asked for his indictment for what they said was his collaboration with American agents in the abduction of the cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar.

The indictment asks for the trials of 26 Americans, all but one of whom were C.I.A. agents, including two who were the top agency officials in Italy at the time. The other American named in the indictment is an Air Force colonel at the American air base in Aviano, from which Mr. Nasr says he was flown to an American air base in Germany, then to Egypt, where he claims he was tortured.

It is the first case in the world in which local officials have been tried in the contentious program of "extraordinary rendition," a program in which U.S. agents abducted scores of suspected Islamic militants after Sept. 11, 2001. The suspects are believed to have been taken to interrogation centers in third countries, some of which permit torture.

The case has complicated relations between Italy and the United States, though until now Italy has not asked for the agents' extradition, meaning that any trials against them could take place in absentia. The American Embassy here declined to comment on the indictments.

The risk of political embarrassment inside Italy was underscored Tuesday after one of Mr. Pollari's lawyers said the defense would call to the stand both the current prime minister, Romano Prodi, and the prime minister at the time, Silvio Berlusconi. The lawyer, Titta Madia, said the men would be able to testify about the existence of documents showing Mr. Pollari was opposed to the abduction.

"We mean to show that Mr. Pollari and the institution he represented acted correctly," Mr. Madia said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Pollari, 63, has maintained his innocence, claiming that he cannot defend himself adequately without breaching national security laws.

Mr. Berlusconi has repeatedly denied any knowledge of the abduction. Intelligence experts say it is highly unlikely that American agents would have carried out the kidnapping without high-level approval in the Italian government because the American action would have violated the sovereignty of a close ally.

Mr. Berlusconi's allies have portrayed the indictments as politically motivated — and Tuesday they strongly defended Mr. Pollari. "The attack against him risks discrediting not only him personally but also our services which, in these difficult years, have effectively protected our country against criminal assaults from international terrorism," said Enrico La Loggia, a deputy with Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party.

A judge will now have to decide whether the cases go to trial.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Catch The Holiday Spirit -- And A Terrorist (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Flying out for the holidays for a little relaxation and family time? Fine. But Uncle Sam hopes you'll remain vigilant, on the lookout for terrorists who also might be heading home to see their families in such places as Myrtle Beach, S.C., or Londonderry, N.H.

To help, the State Department and the Department of Homeland Security are distributing hundreds of "wanted terrorist" posters to major airports around the country, a news release announces.

Get those visions of dancing sugarplums out of your head and focus on the "Faces of Global Terrorism" posters. Each poster shows mug shots of "26 known terrorists with reward offers of up to $25 million" for some of them.

So as you put on your seat belt, take a look at that guy in shorts across the aisle. Sure, he's got blond hair now, and he's cleanshaven, but doesn't he look just a little like Abderraouf Ben Habib Jdey, a.k.a. Faruq al-Tunisi? Look for a scar on his forehead. Get the jump on him and it could be worth $5 million.

And that short guy sitting next to him with those big ears? Okay, the picture's maybe five years old, but isn't that Faker Ben Abdelaziz Boussora, a.k.a. Abu Yusif al-Tunisi, sitting in 15B? He's worth another $5 million from the Rewards for Justice program.

Who knows, but Osama-- worth a cool $25 million -- just might be that guy in the dark glasses and cane on your right.

And remember: "You and your family may be eligible for relocation," the program Web site says, and "strict confidentiality is assured."

Liberty and security

Suffice it to say, Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, is no fan of guns. In 2003, the National Rifle Association (NRA) took one look at her pro-gun-control voting record and gave her a rating of F.

That said, this column a few days ago was the first to report that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) was alerted to a recent airport-security incident involving Mrs. Jackson-Lee, who serves on the Homeland Security subcommittee on intelligence, information sharing and terrorism risk assessment.

The congresswoman was going through security at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston when the alarm sounded not once, but twice. However, when she was placed in a queue for follow-up screening, Mrs. Jackson-Lee "complained" about the process, according to the DHS.

When she insisted on retrieving her personal carry-on items, a Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officer informed her that she would first have to be rescreened, at which point the lawmaker continued to complain.

Now, one group is actually coming to the congresswoman's defense. Or is it?

"I cannot commend you enough for criticizing the humiliating and degrading treatment that travelers must endure undergoing security screening," Michael L. Bane, founder of the Armed Passengers Project, writes in a two-page letter to Mrs. Jackson-Lee.

"However, one very valid question has been overlooked throughout the years of dialogue since September 11th. That question is whether the victims of Flight 93 -- indeed, the victims of all the doomed flights -- could have saved themselves as well as the lives of others if they had been allowed by law to carry weapons onboard," he says.

"If they had been permitted to do so, they would have had, literally, a fighting chance to stop the hijackers and at least minimize the damage done on that fateful day."

DOJ_NMG_0102685

Mr. Bane's project (www.armedpassengers.org) advocates restoring the basic human right of self-defense on planes, trains, buses and shops. He reminds Mrs. Jackson-Lee of what Ben Franklin said: "Those who would sacrifice liberty for security deserve neither."

Instant No. 2

One thing is for certain, there are more rats roaming around the city of Washington than there are Republicans.

Consider the 2006 mayoral election. In a city that counts 354,410 registered voters, Republican candidate David W. Kranich received only 6,744 votes last month, or about 6 percent of the votes cast.

We call this to your attention because, based on the documents filed with the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics, the District of Columbia Independent Party (DCIP) is expecting certification this month as the District's newest political party and organization, representing the growing numbers of registered voters designated by the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics as "independent" and "no-party."

Already the DCIP is touting itself as "the second-largest ... voting group in the District of Columbia."

Feeling blue?

What's with all the blue neckties (particularly a certain shade of baby blue) appearing in Washington of late, including at the White House -- and during Christmas season, no less?

Even yesterday's White House pool report observed that for his early-morning meeting with President Bush, Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates "got the clothing memo -- both men showed up in dark pinstripe suits, white shirts and blue ties."

Quote of the week

"I apologized to him in Philadelphia the other day. I said, 'Bill, I take it back. My dog Millie did not know more about foreign policy than you do.' And he was very understanding."

-- Former President George Bush, speaking in Tallahassee, Fla., this week about a criticism he made of Bill Clinton during the 1992 presidential campaign

Going for baroque

"When we're earmarking money for opera houses, it's no wonder the federal government is baroque."

So says Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who, while his wordplay is clever, is not happy to discover a $250,000 earmark for the Bardavan Opera House in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., in one congressional appropriations bill for fiscal 2006.

Homeland Security Extends Comment Time (WP/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Under pressure from Congress and the public, the Homeland Security Department extended the time for people to comment on its computerized risk assessment system for international travelers.

The deadline was pushed back from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29, department spokesman Jarrod Agen said Tuesday.

By Tuesday, the department had received 59 public comments. All but one either opposed the system outright as a violation of privacy and other laws or called for better means for people to correct any errors in the data. One law firm representing ship owners and importers sought more time for comment.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who will become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee when Democrats take control of Congress in January, wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff seeking extension of the comment period.

Based on a briefing that committee staff received about the system last Friday, Thompson wrote "serious concerns have arisen that, with respect to U.S. citizens and possibly lawful permanent aliens, some elements of ATS as practiced may constitute violations of privacy or civil rights."

The Associated Press reported last Thursday that for four years Customs and Border Protection agents have been using the Automatic Targeting System, or ATS, to produce assessments of the risk that any of the millions of people crossing U.S. borders, including Americans, are terrorists or criminals.

Almost every traveler entering or leaving the country is evaluated by the ATS computers, but they are not allowed to see the assessment of them or directly challenge its accuracy. The government intends to keep the assessments 40 years and the data on which they are based for up to 40 years.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, promised more congressional scrutiny next year of the government's anti-terrorist databases and called the ATS scheme "simply incredible."

The assessments are based on applying so-called rules, which are actually assumptions based on the past behavior of terrorists and criminals, to the person's travel records, including where they are from, how they paid for tickets, their motor vehicle records, past one-way travel, seating preference and what kind of meals they ordered.

The government's first acknowledgment that ATS was producing risk assessments of travelers came in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register, a dry daily compendium of rules and regulations.

Although that notice said ATS would be implemented Dec. 4 unless negative comments dissuaded officials, ATS has been operational for some time and no changes were planned for Dec. 4, Toby Levin, senior adviser in Homeland Security's privacy office told the AP.

The notice was only designed "to give greater transparency" to what Homeland Security was already doing, she said.

In fact, Jayson Ahern, assistant commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said federal agents had used ATS to develop risk assessments of travelers since the late 1990s, but the program had mushroomed in 2002 when legislation spawned by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks took effect. That legislation required all air and cruise lines to electronically give Homeland Security advance lists of all their incoming and outgoing passengers and crew members.

In addition, Ahern said Amtrak voluntarily provides passenger data on rail travelers between the U.S. and Canada and border agents keep track of many of the people and drivers who enter or leave land border crossings. Ahern said ATS is designed to pick out people who are not already on watch lists or wanted by law enforcement.

Homeland Security's Agen said a new notice announcing the extension was sent Tuesday to the Federal Register and would be published in a few days.

Furor Over 'Terror Scores' For Airline Travelers (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK

Do you know your terror score? Think you don't have one? You may, if you've traveled internationally during the past four years. And that is generating a growing controversy both in the United States and abroad.

The Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection (CBP) has been quietly assigning travelers, both American and foreign, on international flights a score that's designed to identify high-risk travelers. It's derived from a set of criteria, such as where you're from and whether you have a habit of buying one-way tickets and paying with cash.

CBP officials call the program, which was implemented with little public notice and no congressional approval, a crucial tool to protect the nation. They describe it as a kind of extra electronic border that has the potential to catch terrorists and criminals before they get to an actual border crossing.

"Without a system like this, we would in many ways be blind to potential threats before they arrive," says Jarrod Agen, a DHS spokesman.

But some congressional leaders, privacy advocates, and travel executives believe it's an unparalleled use of data-mining to invade individuals' privacy. Some European leaders also object, claiming the program - called the Automated Targeting System (ATS) - violates a privacy agreement worked out between the US and the European Union.

Opponents are calling on the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to suspend the program until privacy concerns can be addressed. They say the key problem with ATS is that there's no way for individual to determine that he or she has been flagged. CBP can also share the information it's collected with other government agencies, other governments, and even private contractors. And CBP can keep the data up to 40 years.

"For the first time, a dossier is being built on me and every other innocent citizen that tracks information on them," says Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa. "To add insult to injury ... they say they're keeping the data for 40 years - just in case Kevin Mitchell - whose profile is not threatening at the moment - has some kind of ties to a terrorist organization in the future."

The controversy over ATS erupted after privacy advocates at the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) found an obscure notice about it in the Federal Register last month. In the notice, which is required under the 1974 Privacy Act, DHS says that its data collection system "does not identify or create any new collection of information, rather DHS is providing additional notice and transparency of the functionality of these systems."

In fact, the data collection system has been in place since the mid-1990s, says CBP spokesman Pat Jones. It was started as a way to help interdict drug shipments and smugglers and was carried out by the Treasury Department. After 9/11, it was enhanced to include potential terrorists, and it was eventually moved to CBP, according to Mr. Jones. "The information that we've got is not invasive. How someone pays for their plane ticket I don't think is an invasion of anyone's privacy," he says. "These issues always involve some kind of a balance."

But privacy advocates contend the issue is far more complex. EFF's lead counsel, David Sobel, notes that prior to the publication of the November notice, the only public mention of ATS said that it was used to target and assess cargo shipments, not people.

"Congress didn't know they were doing this. Even DHS's own inspector general in a report issued this summer didn't realize they were using this to target passengers," he says.

The Transportation Security Administration has been trying to put together a similar data collection system to check air passengers for years, Mr. Sobel and other privacy advocates note. That system, called Secure Flight, has been tabled by DHS until privacy concerns raised by Congress can be addressed.

Mr. Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition says that while he and others were testifying before Congress about problems with Secure Flight, DHS was quietly collecting almost the same kind of information. And unlike Secure Flight, which is designed to "ping data" and then expunge it, the ATS data is saved in a data bank.

"None of us knew this was going on behind our backs," says Mitchell. "This looks like it was done because [other data-mining systems failed] and Secure Flight's in trouble."

Some congressional leaders, including Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont, have pledged to hold hearings on ATS. "Databanks like this are overdue for oversight, and that is going to change in the new Congress," Senator Leahy said in a statement.

For now, DHS is standing by its program and says it has no plans to suspend it for further public scrutiny. "You tell [privacy advocates] when they're able to persuade the bad guys to announce when they're coming into the country, we won't need a system like this," says Jones of CBP.

Probes Dismiss Imams' Racism Claim (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Three parallel investigations into the removal of six imams from a US Airways flight last month have so far concluded that the airline acted properly, that the imams' claims they were merely praying and their eviction was racially inspired are without foundation.

An internal investigation by the airline found that air and ground crews "acted correctly" when they requested that the Muslim men be removed from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight on Nov. 20.

"We believe the ground crew and employees acted correctly and did what they are supposed to do," US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said.

Omar Shahin -- one of the imams and the group's spokesman -- said the men did not behave out of the ordinary while on the plane, and that passengers overreacted because some of the imams conducted prayers in the concourse before boarding.

US Airways' investigation is "substantially complete" but Miss Rader said airline officials still want to meet with the imams to review the situation. "We're looking at it as a security issue and as a customer-service issue and where we might need to do outreach," she said.

Airline officials have had several discussions with Mr. Shahin, but a meeting scheduled for Monday with all six men was canceled at the imams' request.

"We talked with crew members and passengers and those on the ground. We've done what we typically do in a situation where there is a removal or some kind of customer service at issue," Miss Rader said. "We found out the facts are substantially the same, and the imams were detained because of the concerns crew members had based on the behavior they observed, and from reports by the customers."

The Minneapolis airport police department's report on the incident said the imams' behavior warranted their removal. The imams were not accused of breaking any laws.

The Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties is reviewing the actions of department members who were involved in the incident.

Secret Service agents questioned the imams, who are accused of making negative comments about President Bush and the Iraq war. Officials of the Transportation Security Administration were involved in screening the imams and their baggage.

"There is no indication there is any inappropriate activity, at least no indication at this time," DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said. "To my knowledge, we are only doing a review, and that is a fairly routine practice with incidents like this."

The Air Carrier Security Committee of the Air Line Pilots Association investigated the incident and said, "The crew's actions were strictly in compliance with procedures and demonstrated overall good judgment in the care and concern for their passengers, fellow crew members, and the company."

"The decisions made by all the parties were made as a result of the behavior of the passengers and not as a result of their ethnicity," the report concluded.

The suspicious behavior cited in the report included "changing seats, stating anti-war, anti U.S.-Iraq involvement, negative comments concerning the president of the United States." The report noted that "two of the passengers requesting seat-belt extensions when their body size did not appear to warrant their use."

Mr. Shahin told television reporters that he needed the seat-belt extension because he weighs 280 pounds. However, the police report lists his weight as 201 pounds. Weights listed for the other imams ranged from 170 pounds to 250 pounds.

The imams have retained the Council of American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) as their legal counsel. CAIR officials said yesterday that initial claims by the airline contradict the official police report.

"The imams are obviously concerned about a number of false and distorted representation of the facts and events, and one example is initial reports that all suggested they refused to get off the plane when personnel asked them to, and the police report said they all got off and cooperated," a CAIR spokesman said.

On A Wing And A Prayer (WSJ)

By Debra Burlingame

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Those are the words that started it all. Six bearded imams are said to have shouted them out while offering evening prayers as they and 141 other passengers waited at the gate for their flight out of Minneapolis International Airport. It was three days before Thanksgiving. Allahu Akbar: God is great.

Initial media reports of the incident did not include the disturbing details about what happened after they boarded US Airways flight 300, but the story quickly went national with provocative headlines: "Six Muslims Ejected from US Air Flight for Praying." Yes, they were praying -- but let's be clear about this. The very last human sound on the cockpit voice recorder of United flight 93 before it screamed into the ground at 580 miles per hour is the sound of male voices shouting "Allahu Akbar" in a moment of religious ecstasy.

They, too, were praying. The passengers and crew of flight 93 lost their valiant fight to take back the plane just one hour and 20 minutes after it pushed back from the gate. Until the hijackers stormed the cockpit door, they were just a handful of Middle Eastern-looking men on their way to sunny California. So, yes, let's be exceedingly clear about the whole matter. Some 3,000 men, women and children are dead because the unassuming people on those airplanes did not look at them and see murderers. Or dangerous Arabs. Or fanatical Muslims. They saw a few guys in chinos. * * *

In five years since the 9/11 attacks, U.S. commercial carriers have transported approximately 2.9 billion domestic and international passengers. It is a testament to the flying public, but, most of all, to the flight crews who put those planes into the air and who daily devote themselves to the safety and well-being of their passengers, that they have refused to succumb to ethnic hatred, religious intolerance or irrational fear on those millions of flights. But they have not forgotten the sight of a 200,000-pound aircraft slicing through heavy steel and concrete as easily as a knife through butter. They still remember the voices of men and women in the prime of their lives saying final goodbyes, people who just moments earlier set down their coffee and looked out the window to a beautiful new morning. Today, when travelers and flight crews arrive at the airport, all the overheated rhetoric of the civil rights absolutists, all the empty claims of government career bureaucrats, all the disingenuous promises of the election-focused politicians just fall away. They have families. They have responsibilities. To them, this is not a game or a cause. This is real life.

Given that Islamic terrorists continue their obsession with turning airplanes into weapons of mass destruction, it is nothing short of obscene that these six religious leaders -- fresh from attending a conference of the North American Imams Federation, featuring discussions on "Imams and Politics" and "Imams and the Media" -- chose to turn that airport into a stage and that airplane into a prop in the service of their need for grievance theater. The reality is, these passengers endured a frightening three-and-a-half hour ordeal, which included a front-to-back sweep of the aircraft with a bomb-sniffing dog, in order to advance the provocative agenda of these imams in, of all the inappropriate places after 9/11, U.S. airports.

"Allahu Akbar" was just the opening act. After boarding, they did not take their assigned seats but dispersed to seats in the first row of first class, in the midcabin exit rows and in the rear -- the exact configuration of the 9/11 execution teams. The head of the group, seated closest to the cockpit, and two others asked for a seatbelt extension, kept on board for obese people. A heavy metal buckle at the end of a long strap, it can easily be used as a lethal weapon. The three men rolled them up and placed them on the floor under their seats. And lest this entire incident be written off as simple cultural ignorance, a frightened Arabic-speaking passenger pulled aside a crew member and translated the imams' suspicious conversations, which included angry denunciations of Americans, furious grumblings about U.S. foreign policy, Osama Bin Laden and "killing Saddam."

Predictably, these imams and their attorneys now suggest that another passenger who penned a frantic note of warning and slipped it to a flight attendant was somehow a hysterical Islamophobe. Let us remember that but for their performance at the gate this passenger might never have noticed these men or their behavior on board, much less have the slightest clue as to their religion or political passions. Of course, that was the point of the shouting. According to the police report, yet another alarmed passenger who frequently travels to the Middle East described a conversation with one of the imams. The 31-year-old Egyptian expressed fundamentalist Muslim views, and stated the he would go to whatever measures necessary to obey all the tenets set out in the Koran.

The activist Muslim American Society (MAS) issued a press release within hours of the incident, demanding an apology and announcing a "pray-in" at Reagan National Airport in Washington, D.C. Standing just a short distance from the Pentagon, where five years ago black plumes of smoke from the crash of American Airlines flight 77 could be seen for miles, the assembled demonstrators complained that African-American Muslims, accustomed to "driving while black," must now cope with the injustice of "flying while Muslim." This brazen two-step is racial politics at its worst; none of the imams are African-American. MAS, which teaches an "Activist Training" program with lessons on "how to talk to the media," must have been thrilled when one cable news outfit, suckered by the rhetoric, compared the imams' conduct to that of civil rights icon Rosa Parks, who refused to give up her bus seat in the face of institutional racism. One wonders what the parents of the three 11-year-olds who died on flight 77 -- all African-American kids on a National Geographic field trip -- would make of this stunning comparison.

Today, MAS Executive Director Mahdi Bray says his organization wants more than an apology. He wants to "hit [US Airways] where it hurts, the pocketbook," and, joined by the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), will seek compensation for the imams, civil and federal monetary sanctions, and new, sweeping legislation that will extract even bigger penalties for airlines that engage in "racial and religious profiling." An investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties is underway. Not incidentally, it is the "fatwa department" of MAS that pushed for segregated taxi lines that would permit Muslim cab drivers at the Minneapolis airport to reject passengers carrying alcohol. * * *

Here's what the flying public needs to know about airplanes and civil rights: Once your foot traverses the entranceway of a commercial airliner, you are no longer in a democracy in which everyone gets a vote and minority rights are affirmatively protected in furtherance of fuzzy, ever-shifting social policy. Ultimately, the responsibility for your personal safety and security rests on the shoulders of one person, the pilot in command. His primary job is to safely transport you and your belongings from one place to another. Period.

This is the doctrine of "captain's authority." It has a longstanding history and a statutory mandate, further strengthened after 9/11, which recognizes that flight crews are our last line of defense between the kernel of a terrorist plot and its lethal execution. The day we tell the captain of a commercial airliner that he cannot remove a problem passenger unless he divines beyond question what is in that passenger's head and heart is the day our commercial aviation system begins to crumble. When a passenger's conduct is so disturbing and disruptive that reasonable, ordinary people fear for their lives, the captain must have the discretionary authority to respond without having to consider equal protection or First Amendment standards about which even trained lawyers with the clarity of hindsight might strongly disagree. The pilot in command can't get it wrong. At 35,000 feet, when multiple events are rapidly unfolding in real time, there is no room for error.

We have a new, inviolate aviation standard after 9/11, which requires that the captain cannot take that airplane up so long as there are any unresolved issues with respect to the security of his airplane. At altitude, the cockpit door is barred and crews are instructed not to open them no matter what is happening in the cabin behind them. This is an extremely challenging situation for the men and women who fly those planes, one that those who write federal aviation regulations and the people who agitate for more restrictions on a captain's authority will never have to face themselves.

Likewise, flight attendants are confined in the back of the plane with upwards of 200 people; they must be the eyes and ears, not just for the pilot but for us all. They are not combat specialists, however, and to compel them to ignore all but the most unambiguous cases of suspicious behavior is to further enable terrorists who act in ways meant to defy easy categorization. As the American Airlines flight attendants who literally jumped on "shoe bomber" Richard Reid demonstrated, cabin crews are sharply attuned to unusual or abnormal behavior and they must not be second-guessed, or hamstrung by misguided notions of political correctness.

Ultimately, the most despicable aspect about the imams' behavior is that when they pierced the normally quiet hum of a passenger waiting area with shouts of "Allahu Akbar" and deliberately engaged in terrorist-associated behavior that was sure to trigger suspicion, they exploited the fear that began with the Sept. 11 attacks. The imams, experienced travelers all, counted on the security system established after 9/11 to kick in, and now they plan not only to benefit financially from the proper operation of that system but to substantially weaken it -- with help from the Saudi-endowed attorneys at CAIR.

US Airways is right to stand by its flight crew. It will be both dangerous and disgraceful if the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Transportation and, ultimately, our federal courts allow aviation security measures put in place after 9/11 to be cynically manipulated in the name of civil rights.

For Mass-casualty Preparedness, Congress Should Fund 'ER One' (HILL)

By Tommy Thompson

The Hill, December 6, 2006

The old adage that "failing to prepare is preparing to fail" seems particularly poignant today. More than five years after Sept. 11, 2001, no state is adequately prepared for a potential mass-casualty disaster caused by a terrorist attack, pandemic or natural disaster. A new CDC study on the state of emergency rooms and the Institute of Medicine's report this summer on our inability to respond to large disasters and epidemics tell a very alarming tale about the state of emergency preparedness in this country.

As head of the federal government's health response to Sept. 11 and as a former governor, I am keenly aware that emergency preparedness is a critical issue for every state's chief executive and legislature. Although major efforts have been made to strengthen security and improve coordination of resources, one persistent public policy question remains unanswered: How best can the federal government help prepare 50 states with diverse assets, risks and needs for an unknown mass-casualty emergency?

Congress can now begin to answer that question. Under debate will be this year's major spending bill for the Department of Health and Human Services, and along with it, a provision to fund a hospital preparedness project that could benefit every state. The project, commonly known as "ER One," is the Washington Hospital Center's proposed state-of-the-art emergency facility. It is arguably one of the smartest investments that Congress could make, and it deserves to be approved. Conceived by physicians, scientists, infectious disease specialists, disaster relief professionals, and security experts recruited from some of the nation's most prestigious institutions, ER One will bolster states' preparedness in two critical ways.

First, as the nation's first civilian demonstration facility, ER One will serve as an education center and working research laboratory for testing and publishing new approaches to managing risks. ER One Institutes, the educational and training arm of the project, will create practical, exportable training models on emergency preparedness for every type of hospital nationwide. Medical personnel from small-town facilities to major urban complexes throughout the United States will learn how to deal with mass-casualty events beyond their scope of daily practice and maintain those skills as new treatments and new threats appear.

By having access to this thinking and training, states and localities would be much better served than if the funds designated for ER One were simply included as part of the overall hospital preparedness block grants through which funds are parceled out to the states. The money needed to fund construction of ER One will make a huge impact and ultimately benefit disaster preparedness at all levels far more than it would if it were simply thrown into the pot and parceled out in small amounts to dozens or even hundreds of potential recipients.

Training and education for the country's hospital staffs is a priority today. The Trust for America's Health (TFAH) has found that hospitals in nearly one-third of the states have not sufficiently planned for a surge of extra patients. In addition, the General Accounting Office has said the nation's emergency preparedness efforts in healthcare remain grossly inadequate. ER One and the ER One Institutes represent the most efficient and effective way to address this need.

Second, as the nation's first all-risks-ready facility, ER One would meet myriad challenges posed by a mass-casualty medical emergency in the nation's capital. A major disaster that interrupts government operations, cripples essential federal services, shuts down communications, or disrupts national security would create chaos across the country and in world markets. Every American would be affected — from recipients of government programs such as Social Security, Medicare, low-interest loans and housing allowances to state and local law enforcement officers.

Washington's unique role will always make the city vulnerable to dangers that have national ramifications. ER One would help protect government functions and personnel, as well as the general population, by managing large surges of patients, treating victims of any major disaster, and containing rare contagious illnesses, especially biological, chemical or radiological.

Rarely has an issue enjoyed this level of support from both political parties, local and national officials and the public and private sectors, particularly during an election year. The ER One project has already received federal funding for planning and design efforts. And although both the fiscal year 2006 and 2007 budgets included money for such a facility, the funds needed to begin construction became an unintended casualty during the most recent congressional debate over earmarks.

Now Congress has another opportunity to boost states' preparedness by approving a Health and Human Services budget that includes funds for ER One. The choice is clear: Congress can give states the ER One tools and training they need to meet the challenges of a dangerous world — or it can prepare to fail by failing to prepare.

As an open and free society, we may be more vulnerable, but we also have the ability to be more resourceful. We must be aware of danger, but always recognize opportunity. ER One is that opportunity.

Package Tossed Near White House (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0102692

Streets around the White House were closed Tuesday morning after a woman threw a package into the courtyard of the adjacent Old Executive Office Building.

The woman was taken into custody without incident and was being questioned by the Secret Service, said Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the service. The package was being investigated but no immediate details were available.

The president was in the White House at the time of the incident.

Streets were closed along Pennsylvania Avenue, between 17th and 18th streets, and along 17th Street between State Place and H Street.

Report Finds New Problems In FEMA Aid Distribution (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The Federal Emergency Management Agency has recouped less than 1 percent of an estimated $1 billion in fraudulent or unjustified payments it distributed after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a new report by Congressional investigators says.

At the same time, the agency continued to wrongly send out millions of dollars of new aid this year, including $17 million in rental assistance to families living rent-free in FEMA trailers, the Government Accountability Office report says.

The auditors' findings, set to be released on Wednesday, demonstrate how the agency has remained open to criticism from advocates for evacuees as being too stingy with people who have real needs, and to criticism from auditors as being too willing to give taxpayer dollars to scam artists and cheats.

Just last week, a federal judge ordered the agency to restore housing assistance and pay back rent to thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees who had been deemed ineligible for long-term housing aid.

Yet the new report by the Congressional investigators said that, in addition to the rental aid given to more than 8,600 victims living in trailers rent-free, the agency distributed $20 million to people who registered for both hurricanes, meaning they received double payments for rent and other emergency aid.

The investigators also recently determined that the agency gave at least $3 million to more than 500 foreign students or other foreigners in the United States on work visas even though federal law specifically prohibits such aid.

"FEMA has much work to do before we can be confident that it is providing assistance to those who are eligible and who need it, while denying it to those who do not," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut. Mr. Lieberman is the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which has scheduled a hearing for Wednesday on Hurricane Katrina-related fraud and abuse.

The agency's officials on Tuesday said they had not yet seen the new report and would not comment in detail until they had. But they acknowledged the serious flaws in distribution of financial aid after the hurricanes. A copy of the report was given to The New York Times.

"The stringent controls instituted this past year by FEMA will dramatically improve safeguards and help eliminate processing errors and fraudulent abuse," Pat Philbin, an agency spokesman, said in a written statement.

But the Government Accountability Office report made it clear that the inappropriate payments continued into this year. For example, 10 residents of an apartment complex in Plano, Tex., collected $46,000 in rental assistance from FEMA through June, even though the City of Plano was paying their rent, with money from the federal agency.

FEMA estimates that of the $7 billion in emergency aid given out to individuals and families after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, about $290 million was unjustified. But based on more than a year of spot-checking applications, Congressional auditors said they believed the federal agency was grossly underestimating the figure, and that a more accurate amount would be at least $1 billion.

That would include money that went to thousands of inmates and people who used falsified Social Security numbers or submitted applications for phantom homes, all cases turned up by the investigators.

FEMA has recouped about $7.5 million of these inappropriate payments, an agency official said Tuesday, and he estimated that an additional $8.1 million was on the way.

DOJ_NMG_0102693

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, chairwoman of the Homeland Security Committee, said the small percentage of money recouped showed how important it was for the agency to improve how it screened applications for disaster aid.

"Once the money is out the door, it is very difficult for it to be recovered," Ms. Collins said.

At the time Hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit, the agency had systems in place to prevent fraud, including a computer program that looked for applications with the same Social Security number. But officials said they turned the system off, claiming that they were worried it might prevent legitimate victims from getting help, the report said.

That is why, for example, the 7,600 individuals had been able to collect $20 million in emergency aid for properties supposedly hit by both storms, the report said.

Ms. Collins said she did not accept the assertion that the agency could not figure out how to distribute emergency assistance quickly while preventing widespread waste and fraud.

"It's a false choice," she said.

FEMA Appeals Katrina Housing Order (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

The Bush administration is challenging a court order requiring it to make housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why housing funding was cut. He said that violated the Constitution, and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately.

FEMA said Tuesday it would appeal that ruling.

The government is still under a court order to make housing payments for people displaced by last year's storm, but the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which won last week's ruling, said in court documents Tuesday that FEMA has refused to disclose its plans for restarting the program.

FEMA may ask an appeals court to put the judge's ruling on hold while the appeal plays out.

Leon criticized the agency's handling of the housing program and described the process as "Kafkaesque."

FEMA Director R. David Paulison told reporters last week that he was disappointed by the ruling.

"It's almost a thing of no good deed goes unpunished," he said. "We felt like we did a good job."

Storm Evacuees Remain In Grip Of Uncertainty (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

BAKER, La., Dec. 2 — Wynaen Walker keeps a change of clothes, her prescription medications and important papers in the trunk of a friend's car. When she leaves her FEMA trailer, she tapes handwritten signs on the door with her phone number. "I still live here," one of them says.

Ms. Walker does this not so much because Hurricane Rita destroyed her house in Lake Charles, but because in October, she came home from church to find her trailer, in a park here operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, occupied by someone else. The lock had been changed. The meager belongings she had accumulated since the hurricane were gone.

"Imagine leaving your house, and you're going right up the street," said Ms. Walker, known as Nina, who was told by FEMA officials to seek out a homeless shelter. "I come back, I ain't got no place."

"They left me out in the cold," she added. "I really panicked."

Ms. Walker had been displaced by a family from one of five FEMA trailer parks at the nearby Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport that are scheduled to close in April. Though her move was a mistake, it is one that residents say the agency has made repeatedly in its trailer parks. And when the trailers at the airport are shut down next year, more than 600 families who took refuge in those parks will find themselves on the move once again.

More than a year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, life is still precarious and unpredictable for many evacuees, especially those who have depended on the government for a modicum of stability. About 102,000 families are still living in government trailers scattered around the region, and an additional 33,000 are living in apartments paid for by FEMA. What trauma victims need most, stability, is just what has proved most elusive.

Most families in the five parks that are closing have not been told where their new homes will be. In New Orleans, residents at two FEMA trailer parks were notified that the construction of a film studio nearby would mean ceaseless noise for months. Initially they were told the parks would close, but the families refused to move yet again.

For thousands more displaced families living in apartments, FEMA has cut off aid with little explanation, but the agency was ordered by a federal judge late last month to reinstate the aid and pay months of back rent. The judge described the ordeal of the families, many of whom have already left their apartments or are on the brink of eviction, as "Kafkaesque."

The seesaw of daily life for the displaced is playing out against a backdrop of still larger uncertainties. Billions of dollars intended to help homeowners rebuild have yet to be distributed. And on Saturday, at a "town hall" meeting held simultaneously in five cities, Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans said he did not expect the city's rebuilding plan to be finished until mid-January.

Mental health experts have repeatedly warned of the importance of a consistent environment for adults and children who are recovering from trauma, and evacuees complain that stress has aggravated their physical ailments, literally making them sick.

And people who work at the agencies trying to help evacuees no longer bother to conceal their anger and astonishment at the constant change in policies and how they are carried out.

"People are basically in many instances left to fend for themselves, while being hampered, if not prevented, from fending for themselves," said Raymond A. Jetson, the chief executive of the Louisiana Family Recovery Corps, a nonprofit organization started at the behest of Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

Mr. Jetson added, "There is a misunderstanding that in some way these people have abdicated the expectation of being treated with respect and dignity."

Jim Stark, the director of the Louisiana Transitional Recovery Office at FEMA, acknowledged that finding permanent housing had been "more difficult than anyone anticipated." On the other hand, he said, "The travel trailers aren't meant as permanent homes."

For those who got apartments instead of trailers, the rental assistance program has been rife with confusing letters, repetitive requests and conflicting information from FEMA. The agency has consistently defended the process, saying that any denial of benefits can be appealed within 60 days.

But in last month's ruling, Judge Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court disagreed, saying the inconsistencies amounted to a denial of the due process rights of evacuees. He ordered FEMA to clarify the eligibility requirements and "immediately restore" many families to the program. [On Tuesday, FEMA appealed the ruling.]

So far, though, said Cindy Gabriel, the spokeswoman for the Community Settlement Network, which has taken over for Houston's evacuee housing program, the ruling has done little but create confusion, in part because FEMA's lawyers have given no indication of how they will carry it out.

Christalyn Mavis, 20, an evacuee living in Austin, Tex., said she and her fiancé had been threatened with eviction for months while they tried to convince FEMA that they were eligible for rental assistance. In September, Ms. Mavis, who lost her mother in Hurricane Katrina, gave birth to a boy, adding urgency to the couple's need for resolution.

"We were in the recovery room," she said, "and I was getting in touch with my lawyer and caseworker from the hospital hours after giving birth."

Tired of fighting, the couple now hope to move to a less expensive city.

In Baton Rouge, the five trailer parks are closing because the airport has declined to renew the lease. Mr. Stark said the residents who did not find their own housing would be moved, but the agency is not yet sure where. "We're going to try to be as least disruptive to the families that live there as possible," he said.

Yet even the moves that FEMA has already orchestrated have not necessarily been smooth. Kim Landry, the transitional communities coordinator for the Family Recovery Corps, said caseworkers knew of five cases like Ms. Walker's in which people had returned home to find their property, or in some cases their entire trailer, gone.

"We do make regular sweeps through the parks, and we often find that people have moved without telling us," Mr. Stark said. "If it looks like no one's home and we haven't been able to contact the folks, we will close the trailer."

FEMA procedures call for three attempts to contact a resident by phone and the posting of an abandonment notice before a trailer is cleaned out. The contents are supposed to be "bagged and tagged" and stored for 30 days. But, an agency spokeswoman said, "maintenance and deactivation contractors" have a "realistic margin of error."

Ms. Walker, who is 49 and has diabetes, high blood pressure and arthritis, was eventually issued a new, empty trailer. But the belongings on her carefully written list — "engagement ring $1249.99 pl. tx." and "clothings new — (7) outfits" — have not been recovered. On Tuesday, she has an appointment at the FEMA storage facility to look for them. At the mention of this, Ms. Walker, who with her chipper grin, multicolored sweater and braided pigtails is a picture of stoic cheer, broke down like a c hild.

"The stuff that was taken out of my trailer wasn't bagged and tagged," she wailed. "Mine wasn't bagged and tagged. It's hard starting over again. You know. Everything. It's very hard."

Then she pulled herself together, straightened up, and smiled.

WAR NEWS:

Gates OK'd For Defense By Senate Panel (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 6, 2006

Robert Gates, seemingly clinching confirmation as the new secretary of defense, said Tuesday the United States is not winning in Iraq and he's confident President Bush will listen to his ideas about forging a new war strategy.

He won speedy and unanimous approval from the Senate Armed Services Committee after five hours of testimony, a bipartisan show of support that suggested how eager many lawmakers are to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. The full Senate could seal Gates' confirmation as early as Wednesday.

"In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq," he told the committee. But he also acknowledged the complexity of the challenge.

"There are no new ideas on Iraq," he said during a discussion of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which previewed its findings and recommendations to President Bush Tuesday and will release them Wednesday. Gates was a member of the group until Bush announced his nomination for the Pentagon job last month.

The senators voted 24-0 to support the nomination to replace Rumsfeld, who has become a symbol of the Bush administration's steadfast course in a war that has long since soured with the public and much of the world.

"I voted yes because in both the substance of his answers and the tone of his answers, he seemed open to course correction," said Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will be the committee's chairman when Democrats take control of the Senate next month.

During his appearance, Gates would not commit to any specific new course of action in the conflict. He said he would consult first with commanders and others.

Asked directly by Levin whether the U.S. is winning in Iraq, Gates replied, "No, sir." That response appeared to contradict Bush, who said at an Oct. 25 news conference, "Absolutely, we're winning."

Gates later said he believes the United States is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

His statements on the war — and his professed openness to change — underscored pressures heaped on Bush since Democratic victories in last month's congressional elections, votes widely read as a rejection of the administration's steadfast course in the war.

Unrelenting violence by insurgents and between ethnic groups, and a U.S. death toll that has soared past 2,900, have raised questions about the effectiveness of Iraq's government. Bush in recent weeks has expressed a willingness to consider a fresh course in the war, but has shown no sign of a willingness to heed Democratic calls to start withdrawal of the 140,000 U.S. troops.

Bush has said he wants to keep U.S. forces there until Iraq is able to govern and defend itself without being a haven for terrorists.

"It seems to me that the United States is going to have to have some kind of presence in Iraq for a long time ... but it could be with a dramatically smaller number of U.S. forces than are there today," Gates said.

Iraq dominated the hearing, which began with Gates saying, "I am under no illusion why I am sitting before you today — the war in Iraq." Without mentioning Rumsfeld by name, Gates made clear that he hopes to find a strategy that is more effective in Iraq than the current Pentagon approach.

After lunch, Gates told the committee he wanted to amplify on his morning remark about not winning in Iraq. He said he did not want U.S. troops to think he believes they are being unsuccessful in their assigned missions.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Gates said. "Where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments and so on." He said other federal agencies should do more in Iraq.

Gates, a former director of the CIA, fielded questions with apparent ease, acknowledging at times that he simply did not know the answer or needed more time for study. He was armed with details, such as the exact U.S. death count in Iraq (2,889 as of Monday, he said), and the number of extra troops NATO has been asked to provide in Afghanistan (2,500, he said).

There was little of the confrontational tone that sometimes emerged when the pricklier Rumsfeld testified before the same committee, which is responsible for overseeing the Defense Department.

If confirmed, Gates said, he planned to visit U.S. commanders and troops in Iraq "quite soon."

Gates, 63, said he believes Bush wants to see Iraq improve to the point where it can govern and defend itself, while seeking a new approach. "What we are now doing is not satisfactory," Gates said.

On other high-priority subjects, Gates said:

• He worries about the prospect of growing Iranian influence in Iraq.

• He would be open to the idea of direct talks with Iran and Syria about stabilizing Iraq.

• He is uncertain whether the Army and Marine Corps need to expand, as many in Congress advocate.

• He is "sympathetic to the notion" of adding more U.S. or allied troops in Afghanistan.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow was pressed by reporters about Gates' remark that the U.S. is not winning in Iraq. Snow said Gates' overall testimony showed he shares Bush's view that the U.S. must help Iraq govern and defend itself.

"I know you want to pit a fight between Bob Gates and the president, it doesn't exist," Snow told reporters.

Gates said he came to some of his conclusions during his time on the Iraqi Study Group, but he did not say what information or testimony in that process led him.

Asked whether announcing a specific troop withdrawal timetable would send a signal of U.S. weakness, he said it "would essentially tell (the insurgents) how long they have to wait until we're gone."

Gates also expressed concern about political divisions in Iraq. Unless the dominant Shiite faction shows a new willingness to share power and national wealth with the minority Sunnis and Kurds, then the country will fracture, and "it will not be long before we have a government in Baghdad that is as hostile as the one in Tehran," he said.

Much of the questioning from panel members focused on whether Gates was committed to providing unvarnished advice to Bush. He assured the committee he would not shirk from that duty.

He said he did not give up his position as president of Texas A&M University and return to Washington to "be a bump on a log."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a likely 2008 presidential candidate and an advocate of increasing U.S. troop strength in Iraq, asked whether Gates believes the U.S. had too few troops at the outset of the war in 2003.

"I suspect in hindsight some of the folks in the administration would not make the same decisions they made," including the number of troops in Iraq to establish control after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, Gates said.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether the American and Iraqi people and the next president of the United States will face a slowly but steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region or will face the very real risk, and possible reality, of a regional conflagration," Gates said.

Gates Gets Unanimous Approval Of Senate Panel (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Armed Services Committee today unanimously approved the nomination of Robert M. Gates to become secretary of Defense, hours after he acknowledged that the U.S. was not winning in Iraq.

In a 21-0 vote, the Senate committee sent the nomination of Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld to the full Senate. The vote was announced by committee Chairman Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) this afternoon.

At the morning session of his confirmation hearing, Gates said he believed that President Bush, by nominating him, was looking for a new approach in Iraq. Gates vowed under questioning by both Democrats and Republicans that he would give the White House his frank opinion regardless of the conclusions reached by his predecessors.

"Mr. Gates, do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" asked Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who will become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee when Democrats take over Congress next month.

"No sir," Gates replied.

Gates' views before the committee sharply contrasted with the public stance of the Bush administration in several ways.

He told senators that "there clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country." And he said he would consider increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps. Rumsfeld has resisted increasing the size of the force and has opposed troop withdrawals.

Gates pledged to maintain his independence and speak "boldly" to Congress and the White House.

"I am not giving up the presidency of Texas A&M ... to come back to Washington and be a bump on a log," Gates told the committee. "I don't owe anybody anything."

In addition, he expressed concern over "offline analytical organizations" in the government, an apparent reference to efforts by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to set up groups outside the established intelligence agencies to examine information gathered by U.S. agents.

Most strikingly, Gates refused to say whether he believed the decision to invade Iraq was correct, saying that was a judgment that should be left for historians.

But at the beginning the afternoon session, Gates sought to clarify his remarks and told the committee he didn't want to give the military the wrong impression.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Gates said. "Where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments and so on."

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow defended Gates and Bush despite what seemed to be different positions.

"I know you want to pit a fight between Bob Gates and the president. It doesn't exist," Snow said.

Gates' testimony appeared to assuage leading Democrats, who indicated they were ready to quickly approve Gates as the nation's Defense secretary. Levin said he found Gates' stance "a necessary, refreshing breath of reality."

Committee aides said they anticipated that the Gates hearing would conclude today and that the panel could vote on the nomination this evening, though it was more likely to come Wednesday.

"Things are going pretty well for you right now," laughed Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a leading centrist on the committee.

Quick approval would contrast with Gates' confirmation hearings in 1991, one of the longest and most contentious in recent Senate history. At the time, Gates was grilled on his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal and accusations that he bullied analysts into shaping intelligence to fit his worldview.

Some of those charges were raised again today, particularly accusations by George Shultz, the secretary of State when Gates was the No. 2 official at the CIA, who accused Gates in his memoir of using intelligence to paint the Soviet Union in the worst possible light.

Gates responded by sharing some inside Washington lore, saying he believed Shultz's view was shaped largely by his strained relationship with Gates' boss, then-CIA Director William Casey, who opposed efforts by Shultz to reach out to the Soviets and once tried to get Shultz fired.

"It was an open secret in Washington that the two didn't get along," Gates said, adding that his relations with Shultz on a day-to-day basis were more cordial.

Gates sought to portray himself as a practical moderate, open to proposals for withdrawals as well as increases in the size of the Army and Marines — his views on troop levels, he said, were "too unformed to be helpful."

On other issues in the Middle East, he warned that military attacks against Syria and Iran could hinder U.S. efforts in Iraq and harm U.S. standing in the region. He also noted that Iraq's downward spiral into further instability could lead to a regional conflagration.

"My greatest worry if we mishandle the next year or two and leave Iraq in chaos is that a number of regional powers will become involved in Iraq," Gates said, noting that Sunni-dominated countries such as Saudi Arabia could move to back Sunni Iraqis, Iran could become even more active among Iraqi Shiites, and Turkey could become involved in the Kurdish north. "All of that could spread very dramatically."

Gates said that along with finding a path forward in Iraq, the reason he agreed to accept Bush's nomination was to find a bipartisan consensus on the global war on terrorism that would mirror the post-World War II consensus in dealing with the Soviet Union.

He argued that a baseline agreement on underlying principles would allow for ongoing debate on tactics, but would give potential adversaries certainty that the U.S. would continue to pursue a common goal.

Gates Says U.S. Isn't Winning Iraq War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates yesterday said the U.S. is not winning in Iraq, but he declined to endorse any one of scores of new options floating in Washington for ending the stalemate and the American troop commitment.

Mr. Gates' Iraq assessment before the Senate Armed Services Committee, which later gave its unanimous approval to his nomination, came in response to a question from Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, who asked, "Do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?"

"No, sir," answered the man who is likely to become the president's chief military adviser on overhauling Iraq strategy. Mr. Gates later testified that he agreed with Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, who has said the U.S. is neither winning nor losing at this point.

The response seemed to put the nominee at odds with the commander in chief.

President Bush declared: "Absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq during an October press conference. He added, however, that he was not satisfied with overall developments, including a big spike in sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Mr. Gates said of the president, "I also believe that he understands that there needs to be a change in our approach in Iraq, that what we are doing now is not working satisfactorily."

The committee later, as expected, voted unanimously to approve the Gates nomination. The full Senate will take up the matter this week.

The question dominating Washington, as the White House weighs a shift in Iraq strategy, is whether to increase, decrease or rearrange the 135,000 troops on the ground. Mr. Gates said he does not know enough today to make a recommendation to Mr. Bush.

If confirmed, he said, he plans to first travel to Iraq to meet commanders and receive their assessments. The timeline suggests that any comprehensive change in policy will not come for weeks.

Mr. Gates did signal that he does not favor an immediate pullout, as favored by Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat.

"There is a risk that others looking around the world would see that we don't have the patience and we don't have the will," Mr. Gates said. "So I think those are some of the concerns that we would face if we ended up leaving Iraq in chaos."

During the hearing's lunch break, Mr. Gates noted that press coverage was dominated by his not-winning comment.

"I want to make clear that that pertains to the situation in Iraq as a whole," he told Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican and committee chairman, in the afternoon session. "Our military forces win the battles that they fight. Our soldiers have done an incredible job in Iraq, and I'm not aware of a single battle that they have lost."

The former CIA director, in sober clipped testimony, made a dramatic overture to both Democrats and Republicans. Under questioning from Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who supports the war, Mr. Gates implored Congress to agree on a bipartisan framework for winning in Iraq, and in the larger struggle against Islamist terrorism.

"I think that it is imperative in this long war on terrorism that we face, that could go on for a generation, that there be a bipartisan agreement," he said. "Then there would be consistency on the part of whoever is elected president in 2008 and beyond, so that we can carry on this struggle in a way that they don't think we're going to cut and run."

Mr. Gates clearly distanced himself from early Bush administration Iraq policy and the war planning presided over by outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"There clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country," he testified.

He also labeled as a mistake the decision by L. Paul Bremer, the first U.S. administrator in Iraq, to dissolve the Iraqi army. Mr. Gates said it left thousands of armed men without a means to support their families and pushed them toward the insurgency. Instead, the soldiers should have been sent home -- with pay, he said.

Mr. Gates said options from the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, are "not the last word" and will likely differ from ideas from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Baker-Hamilton panel, whose report will be released today, is expected to recommend a gradual troop drawdown, but not a specific timetable.

"Frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Mr. Gates, 63. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches is pretty much out there, and the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

Democrats and Republicans both eye Mr. Gates as the fresh face in Mr. Bush's war Cabinet who will change Iraq strategy in the fourth year of fighting and more than 2,900 American military deaths. Some on both sides are so happy to have Mr. Rumsfeld leaving the Pentagon that Mr. Gates' confirmation by the full Senate is a certainty.

Although Mr. Rumsfeld was typically feisty at Armed Services hearings as Democrats hurled charges, Mr. Gates gave measured answers to generally polite questions.

Mr. Gates is the first defense secretary nominee to undergo confirmation in time of war since 1968. Then, the Senate confirmed Clark M. Clifford to succeed Robert McNamara, who quit after a Vietnam War policy break with President Lyndon B. Johnson.

"I don't owe anybody anything," Mr. Gates said in response to a question from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, on his independence. He said he did not give up the presidency of Texas A&M University "to come back to Washington to be a bump on a log, and not to say exactly what I think."

He confronted two starkly different views on the committee itself. Mr. Levin is pushing a date-certain U.S. pullout, brigade by brigade, beginning in March. On the other end of the debate, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, wants a substantial increase in troops in Iraq beyond the current 135,000.

Mr. Gates told Mr. McCain he is "very open" to increase the Army's end strength -- its congressionally authorized force. Critics say the Army, with a half-million active soldiers, is stressed to the breaking point. Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the Iraq region, told the committee last month that he does not want more troops, in order to let the Iraqis prove themselves.

The Baker-Hamilton 10-member bipartisan group is expected to call for direct talks with Syria and Iran, two bordering regimes that support the deadly insurgency in Iraq.

Mr. Gates said he would not recommend military action against Syria and came close to ruling it out against Iran.

He called war with Iran an "absolute last resort" to stop the Islamic republic's nuclear-weapons program, but agreed that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is "lying" when he says Tehran is not pursuing an atomic arsenal.

"I think that we have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable," he said.

Gates Says U.S. Is Not Winning In Iraq; Heads For Confirmation (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

Robert Gates, President Bush's nominee to become the next secretary of defense, yesterday admitted that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq.

Senate critics of the war saw the nominee's opinion, given in a response during his nomination hearing, as a sharp departure from the president's position in late October — that America was "absolutely" winning.

Asked by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, whether he thought the United States was winning in Iraq, Gates answered, "No, sir."

The committee yesterday endorsed the Gates nomination unanimously. The full Senate will likely vote on the nomination by the end of this week.

In the second part of his hearing, Gates refined his view, saying he agreed with a statement by Gen. Peter Pace of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who said, "We are not winning, but we are not losing." Gates said he did not want to give troops in Iraq the impression that he thought they were failing in their mission.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prospective 2008 presidential candidate, asked the same question as Levin and used his time to express frustration that the U.S. military does not have enough troops in Iraq.

He has been pushing for more troops in Iraq, a view considered unpopular, as has his close ally, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

McCain is heeding the call of several military leaders who said at the onset of the war in Iraq that the U.S. needed more troops to stabilize the country after the invasion. Gates acknowledged that the United States should have sent more in 2003.

"At this particular point … when the suggestion is made, as the situation deteriorates and the status quo is not acceptable, that we reduce troops or, as General [John] Abizaid said, that he had sufficient number of troops, in your study when did we reach the point where we went from not having enough troops to having sufficient number of troops as the situation — boots on the ground — as the situation deteriorated?" McCain asked Gates at the hearing.

"That's a non sequitur that I have yet found to — I'm unable to intellectually embrace," the senator concluded.

Levin has pushed for swift withdrawal of U.S. troops and is due to become the armed services panel chairman in January. McCain will be the ranking GOP member.

Gates cautioned that setting a timetable for withdrawal would tell extremists "how long they have to wait until we're gone."

But Levin said he would still press for a phased troop withdrawal.

Gates, a former CIA director, said there are no new ideas on Iraq, but "all options are on the table."

His nomination hearing came just a day before the congressionally created, bipartisan Iraq Study Group is due to release its policy recommendations.

Gates said these recommendations will not be the be-all, end-all and that he would be open to a wide range of ideas and proposals on Iraq, including an analysis conducted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other reports commissioned by the White House.

Gates said that as soon as he is confirmed he would travel to Iraq to seek advice, including that of Gen. George Casey, commander of multi-national forces Iraq, and Abizaid, head of the Central Command. If confirmed, he said, he would immediately consult other military leaders and Congress.

America would be in Iraq a long time because the Iraqi military does not have any logistics or airpower of its own, he added.

He was open to new ideas, he said, but developments in Iraq would shape the future of the entire Middle East, possibly with dire consequences.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether the American and Iraqi people and the next president of the United States will face a slowly and steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region or will face the very real risk of a regional conflagration," he said.

His greatest "worry" was that if U.S. forces left the country "in chaos," regional powers including Iran and Syria would get involved "and we will have a regional conflict on our hands."

The likely 2008 presidential candidates praised Gates for his open-mindedness and candor, but pressed him to prove his independence from Vice President Dick Cheney.

Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) asked Gates what made him believe the president would heed his advice after shooting down advice from prominent figures in his administration, such as Secretary of State Colin Powell.

"Senator, because he asked me to take the job," Gates answered, adding that the situation has changed since other political appointees were asked to serve five years ago.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), another high-profile candidate for the presidency, was skeptical that President Bush would look at all alternatives.

"Based on your experience, do you believe that the president, the vice president and the existing secretary of defense are intelligent men?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am," he replied

Clinton: "Are they patriotic men?"

Gates: "Absolutely."

Clinton: "Do they care about our men and women in uniform?"

Gates: "Absolutely."

Clinton: "Do they believe that the decisions they have made for the last five years have been in America's best interest?"

Gates: "I have not had that discussion. I'm sure that they believe that they were in the country's best interest."

Gates told Clinton that the process of changing strategy and tactics in Iraq would proceed with "considerable urgency."

Levin opposed Gates's confirmation 15 years ago, in part because Gates had been accused of skewing intelligence reports while at the CIA. This time around he said that he wants to ensure that Gates is independent-minded.

Defense Nominee Gains Approval Of Senate Panel (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Mark Mazzetti

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to be defense secretary, won unanimous approval from a Senate panel on Tuesday after testifying that the United States was not winning in Iraq and that American failure there could ignite "a regional conflagration" in the Middle East.

At one point, Mr. Gates said it was "too soon to tell" whether the American invasion of 2003 had been a wise decision. He added: "My greatest worry if we mishandle the next year or two and leave Iraq in chaos is that a variety of regional powers will become involved in Iraq, and we will have a regional conflict on our hands." [Excerpts, Page A20.]

Mr. Gates is expected to win confirmation from the full Senate as early as Wednesday to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld. At the daylong hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Democrats and Republicans praised what they called Mr. Gates's refreshing candor.

Mr. Gates gave few firm signals on Tuesday about his own favored options for Iraq, but portrayed himself as a flexible realist, open to all options for adjusting American strategy. But he made clear that he had concerns about a rapid military withdrawal, and said the recommendations to be made public on Wednesday by the Iraq Study Group would be important but not "the last word."

"It's my impression that frankly there are no new ideas on Iraq," Mr. Gates said, pointing out that there are multiple other government reviews under way. "The question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a way forward?"

The group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to propose that American combat troops be pulled back from Iraq, but not necessarily withdrawn, by sometime in 2008.

In 2003, Mr. Gates supported the administration's decision to invade Iraq. In his testimony on Tuesday, however, he made clear that his operating style and approach would be in some respects different from those of Mr. Rumsfeld and his deputies, who have led the Defense Department for nearly six years. Mr. Gates expressed grave reservations about taking military action against Iran, an idea that the Bush administration has not ruled out in trying to halt its nuclear program.

"I think that military action against Iran would be an absolute last resort," Mr. Gates said. "I think that we have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable. And I think that the consequences of a conflict, a military conflict, with Iran could be quite dramatic. And therefore, I would counsel against military action, except as a last resort."

Mr. Gates said he also opposed any attack on Syria, which the Bush administration has criticized, along with Iran, for contributing to the instability in Iraq.

Mr. Gates's most direct statements about Iraq came during exchanges with Senators Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will take over as the panel's chairman, and John McCain of Arizona, who will become the top-ranking Republican.

"Do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" asked Mr. Levin, who has pushed for announcing a date to begin withdrawing American troops from Iraq. "No, sir," Mr. Gates replied, adding that he did not believe that the United States was losing, either.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, pointed out that Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had used language similar to Mr. Gates's at a policy forum in Washington on Monday.

As recently as October, Mr. Bush said that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq, though he also made clear he was dissatisfied with the pace of progress.

Mr. Warner, the chairman of the Senate committee, said the message from last month's elections was that "change is needed."

Mr. Gates said he agreed with Mr. Levin that it was "worth looking into" the idea of withdrawing troops to instill a "sense of urgency" in the Iraqi government to resolve sectarian strife. But he ruled out setting a date for a withdrawal.

Under questioning from Mr. McCain, Mr. Gates said there had not been sufficient troops in Iraq immediately after the 2003 invasion. If confirmed, he said, he would consult with ground commanders about whether they wanted additional forces.

Mr. Gates also appeared to differ slightly with Mr. Bush's frequent declaration that Iraq is the "central battlefield" in fighting terrorists. Asked if he agreed with that description, Mr. Gates called Iraq "one of the central fronts in the war on terror" but said the United States also faced a "dispersed" enemy of Islamic militants worldwide.

But he was more direct in criticizing the Bush administration's decision to disband the Iraqi Army and, for a time, to bar from government jobs tens of thousands of Iraqis who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

Several Democrats, while applauding Mr. Gates's forthrightness and willingness to consider new tactics, questioned whether Mr. Bush would follow his advice on a new strategy.

"Senator, I'm not coming here to be a bump on a log and not say exactly what I think," Mr. Gates told Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. He added: "There is still only one president of the United States. He will make the final decision."

Mr. Gates said he had abandoned certain positions he once held on certain national security issues. Asked about an article he wrote in 1994 advocating a military strike against North Korea's nuclear facilities, Mr. Gates said he had changed his mind about how to deal with the communist country's developing nuclear program. "I believe that clearly at this point, the best course is the diplomatic one," Mr. Gates said.

If confirmed, Mr. Gates said, he would make an early visit to Iraq to assess the situation. He visited Iraq in September as a member of the Iraq Study Group, a post he resigned after being nominated by Mr. Bush on Nov. 8 to take charge at the Pentagon. On Tuesday, Mr. Bush and Mr. Baker ate lunch together to talk about the recommendations the group would make, said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Mr. Gates did not say whether he intended to roll back any of Mr. Rumsfeld's initiatives, but there were indications that his tenure at the Pentagon would be vastly different from the nearly six-year term of Mr. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived at the Pentagon brimming with ideas for a leaner, more agile military. He promised to challenge what he saw as the status quo thinking of the military services, and he brought in civilian aides who clashed repeatedly with senior uniformed officers.

Mr. Gates offered no such agenda or vision. He said the campaign to transform the military needed to continue, but admitted that he was not familiar with the details of Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts. He also questioned some of the Pentagon's efforts before the Iraq war to analyze raw intelligence.

Mr. Gates's presumably easy path to confirmation contrasts with his two previous nomination hearings before the Senate, both for the post of director of central intelligence. Mr. Gates withdrew his nomination the first time, in 1987, after questions arose about his role in the Iran-contra affair.

After being nominated again by Mr. Bush's father in 1991, Mr. Gates was confirmed, but 31 Democrats voted against him, including 12 senators who are still in office.

Mr. Levin, one of those who opposed him in 1991, said after Tuesday's vote, "I voted yes because in both the substance of his answers and the tone of his answers, he seemed open to course correction."

As the day wore on and his confirmation appeared increasingly secure, Mr. Gates seemed to absorb the weight of the job. He asked to expound on his morning remark about not winning in Iraq, saying he did not want the troops to believe they were being unsuccessful.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Mr. Gates said. He added that "where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments," and that he believed that other federal agencies should contribute more assistance in Iraq.

Dinner for Secretary General

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The White House under Mr. Bush and the United Nations under Kofi Annan have not exactly gone together like Mom and apple pie. But the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, predicted that all would be amicable when Mr. Bush, Mr. Annan and their top aides met for a final time Tuesday over dinner in the White House residence, where Mr. Bush was to toast Mr. Annan on the completion later this month of his tenure as the United Nations secretary general.

It was unclear, however, whether the White House had a table long enough or wide enough to separate John Bolton, who has resigned as United Nations ambassador, and Mr. Annan's top deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, who was visibly pleased on Monday at the news of Mr. Bolton's departure.

Mr. Snow said he was not worried. "We practice effective diplomacy," he said. "I expect it will be perfectly pleasant." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Gates' Main Appeal: He's Not Rumsfeld (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Once one of the most controversial men in Washington, Robert M. Gates stepped into what passes in the nation's capital for a congressional love-fest Tuesday for the simple reason that he was not Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The last time around, when Gates was nominated to head the CIA in 1991, the hearings stretched over months — with the nominee facing hundreds of tough, personal questions. This time, Gates, nominated to become secretary of Defense, was questioned publicly for less than a day. Few, if any, of the questions could be considered difficult.

The soft-spoken Gates, it seemed, could do no wrong, eliciting praise from Republicans and Democrats for his "candor" and "forthrightness."

In addition to not being Rumsfeld, Gates had the decided advantage of not having yet made up his mind on U.S. strategy in Iraq. And so, as various senators laid out their competing plans for the future of Iraq — more trainers, more troops, fewer troops, hard deadlines — Gates could answer that every option was on the table.

Gates told Sen. John McCain (R.-Ariz.), who favors increasing forces, that if confirmed he would inquire as to whether the military commanders wanted more American forces, and said he would consider increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

Gates told Sen. Carl M. Levin (D.-Mich.), who favors withdrawing U.S. troops as a way to force Iraqis to take more responsibility, that such an option also would be considered.

Even on the question of winning and losing, Gates was able to have it both ways.

When Levin, now a war skeptic, asked whether the U.S. was winning in Iraq, Gates answered "no." But when Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) asked whether the nominee agreed that the United States was not losing, Gates was able to say: "Yes, sir. At this point."

Gates gave few hints of precisely where he was inclined to try to steer U.S. policy. But he did say the new strategy probably would be a mix of the ideas for strategic changes that are being discussed.

"It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," Gates said. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches is pretty much out there, and the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

It may appear unlikely that Gates can craft a policy that combines both Levin's call for a scheduled draw-down with McCain's demand that the military send in more troops for a last attempt to win the war.

But Gates could well intend to try. He told Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), a war supporter, that he agreed to take the Defense Department job because he saw the need to help create a basic foreign policy that both Republicans and Democrats agreed with — akin to the broad accord that prevailed during the Cold War.

"I think that it is imperative in this long war on terrorism that we face, that could go on for a generation, that there be a bipartisan agreement," Gates said.

To that sentiment, Gates added exactly what the committee members wanted to hear: a promise that he would work with them to craft the policy.

Inclusion is not something Rumsfeld was keen on offering the Senate. And throughout the day, it seemed as if Gates was working hard to come off as the anti-Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld, both with Congress and the media, had a habit of restating questions to make them more to his liking before embarking on long answers. Gates appears to favor the more straightforward "yes" and "no."

While Rumsfeld would offer up a belittling "goodness gracious" or a strategic pause when presented a supposition with which he disagreed, Gates was taking all comers seriously Tuesday.

After Gates suggested the U.S. would capture Osama bin Laden when someone close to the Al Qaeda leader turned him in to collect the reward, Sen. Ben Nelson (D.-Neb.) asked for Gates' opinion on a plan to increase the bounty by $1 million a week.

"Sort of 'Terrorist Powerball,' " Gates quipped.

But a moment later, intent on including all suggestions, Gates added: "I'm certainly open to that, senator."

Defense Nominee Candid On Iraq Views (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States is not winning the war in Iraq and “all options are on the table,” defense secretary nominee Robert Gates said at his confirmation hearing Tuesday.

Gates, 63, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he was “open to a wide range of ideas and proposals” regarding the American presence in Iraq, but he made clear he felt a precipitous withdrawal would not be the best solution.

“My greatest worry is if we mishandle the next few years … and leave Iraq in chaos, we’ll have a regional conflict … that would spread fairly dramatically” and involve Syria, Iran, Turkey and Saudi Arabia, Gates said. “There is the risk that others would see we don’t have the patience and we don’t have the will.”

Gates also noted that one of the reasons President Bush nominated him was to get a fresh approach on Iraq. But while he pledged to be a strong, independent voice within the Bush administration, Gates said there was ultimately one authority: Bush.

“Of course, it is the president who will decide what if any changes will be made in our approach,” he told the Senate panel.

Later, Gates said: “There is only one president of the United States, and he will make the final decision.”

DOJ_NMG_0102705

If confirmed, Gates would lead the Defense Department at a time of nearly unprecedented challenges: a difficult war in Iraq, a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran, military readiness as dangerously low levels, and a procurement system under fire.

But it was Iraq that dominated the hearing.

"This is our last chance to save this situation," Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain told Gates, a conclusion Gates did not challenge.

Gates received a warm, if stern, welcome during the first part of the hearing from both Republicans and Democrats, all of whom urged regular, substantive contact between Congress and the Pentagon.

Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner of Virginia told Gates he "simply had to be fearless" in delivering his advice; ranking Democrat Carl Levin of Michigan urged Gates to "speak truth to power."

But even Levin, who voted against Gates when was nominated as CIA director in 1991, said he would take a "fresh and fair look" at Gates this time around.

Gates promised not to let them down.

"I will speak candidly, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue," Gates said. "I don't owe anybody anything."

Senate Panel Approves Gates (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Robert M. Gates was unanimously approved by a Senate committee yesterday to become President Bush's new defense secretary, after a day-long confirmation hearing in which he bluntly stated that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq.

Gates also told the panel that "it's too soon to tell" whether the Bush administration made the right decision in launching the invasion in March 2003 to topple Saddam Hussein.

In confirmation hearings that left both Democrats and Republicans praising his candor, Gates warned that the war risks provoking a "regional conflagration" in the Middle East unless a new strategy can arrest Iraq's slide toward chaos.

"My greatest worry, if we mishandle the next year or two and if we leave Iraq in chaos, is that . . . we will have a regional conflict on our hands," he said. "You could have Saudi Arabia, you could have Turkey, Syria, Iran -- all would be involved. We're already seeing Hezbollah involved in training fighters for Iraq. I think all of that could spread fairly dramatically."

Gates's cordial reception by the Senate Armed Services Committee signals he will almost certainly be confirmed as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. He would replace Donald H. Rumsfeld, who announced his resignation a day after the Nov. 7 elections, in which Democrats regained control of Congress. Gates's view that the United States is not winning the war stood in sharp contrast to Bush's own statement on Oct. 25, when he declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

"What we heard this morning was a welcome breath of honest, candid realism about the situation in Iraq," Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) said during a midday break. Levin, who will become committee chairman next month, said this "bodes well . . . for a speedy confirmation."

At the end of the session, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) said, "I think you're going to be a good secretary."

In return, Gates emphasized "the importance of the bipartisan approach" and laid out several ways in which he would operate differently than Rumsfeld. "I think the first step is the tone at the top," he said.

Gates promised to treat the top brass respectfully, a subject that became an issue earlier this year after several retired generals called for Rumsfeld to be fired, in part because they felt he ignored their professional advice.

Gates said a "great deference" should be shown to the judgment of generals once a policy is decided that they have to implement, and he emphasized that one of his first steps as secretary would be to "urgently" consult with U.S. ground commanders in Iraq. "When you treat the professionals in an organization who deliver the mission . . . with respect and you listen to them . . . I think that everybody is better served," he said.

Gates, who was CIA director from November 1991 to January 1993, was also critical of a Pentagon office that had independently examined intelligence on Iraq during the run-up to the war, second-guessing the CIA and other agencies. "I have a problem with that," he said.

Against fairly light probing by senators, Gates defended his record over past allegations that as CIA deputy in the 1980s he had skewed intelligence reports to fit his views. He said such charges grew largely out of personal animosity between then-Secretary of State George P. Shultz and then-CIA chief William J. Casey.

Several senators, listing the immense challenges Gates would face as defense secretary, urged him to be bold in expressing independent views. "You simply have to be fearless -- I repeat, fearless" in counseling the president on Iraq and other critical Pentagon matters, advised the committee chairman, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Gates responded later that he has no intention of coming to Washington "to be a bump on a log and not to say exactly what I think, and to speak candidly and, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue." He also emphasized that he did not seek the job of defense secretary, saying, "I don't owe anybody anything."

Gates, 63, made it clear that if confirmed, Iraq will be his highest priority. "I am under no illusion why I am sitting before you today: the war in Iraq," the white-haired Wichita native told a packed committee hearing room. Gates said the president nominated him to bring "fresh eyes" to the problem, stating repeatedly that "all options are on the table" on Iraq strategy.

As a member of the Iraq Study Group, the commission led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), Gates studied those options for several months, until leaving the group when he was nominated for the Pentagon slot.

Currently president of Texas A&M University, Gates said he has known some of the 12 university students who have been killed in Iraq. "This all comes down to being very personal for all of us," he said, reciting the exact count of the 2,889 U.S. troops who had died in Iraq as of Monday.

Even so, U.S. forces will be in Iraq for "a long time," Gates predicted, although he said the number of troops could be "dramatically smaller" than the current 140,000. Pressed by Democrats, he said beginning modest troop withdrawals -- a suggestion included in a recently leaked Nov. 6 memo to the White House by Rumsfeld -- is one possibility.

Questioned by Republicans, however, Gates suggested a specific withdrawal timetable would be detrimental because it would tell U.S. enemies in Iraq "how long they have to wait until we're gone."

He also allowed for the possibility of a surge of U.S. ground forces into Iraq.

"That certainly is an option," he said, saying that such an increase could involve dispatching more military training teams to work with Iraqi security forces. "If our focus is on training and bringing up the Iraqi army, do we have enough trainers to do that job in Iraq?"

Gates declined to call the Iraq situation a civil war and agreed with senators that he did not want to see U.S. troops caught in a crossfire between Iraqi factions. Nor was he willing to predict whether beginning to withdraw troops would exacerbate sectarian violence, as the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, testified last month.

Several times during the hearing, senators mentioned an assessment offered Monday at a think tank by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the United States is neither winning nor losing in Iraq. (Pace had spoken on an off-the-record basis, but the senators quoted him by name.) Gates said he agrees with Pace's view.

While the hearing concentrated on Iraq, Gates appeared to depart from administration rhetoric by saying Iraq is just one central front in the anti-terrorism effort. Moreover, he said that over the past five years, Osama bin Laden has posed a greater threat to the United States than has Saddam Hussein.

Gates said the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban government in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001 led to a "metastasized terror threat from the jihadists" around the world. "Indigenous radicals in countries like Britain, like Spain and like the United States are in fact planning terrorist operations," he said, adopting a tone reflective of his past as a career intelligence expert.

But he sighed audibly when Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) asked how he plans to catch bin Laden. "The way we'll catch bin Laden eventually," Gates said, is "one of his own people will turn him in."

On Iran, Gates said he thinks Tehran is pursuing nuclear weapons but is lying about it, and he cited threats the country poses to the region, including the potential to shut down vital oil lanes and install a like-minded regime in Baghdad. Still, he said that U.S. "military action against Iran would be an absolute last resort" and that diplomacy is his preferred course.

Senators So Very, Very Not Contrary Toward Gates (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

And so it came to pass, in the 12th month of the sixth year of the reign of Bush, that a prophet came forth to deliver us from the war in Babylon.

Actually, it was only Bob Gates at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, but the rapturous senators seemed to regard the president's second defense secretary as a harbinger of the Second Coming.

"We're very pleased," Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) said twice.

"Very, very pleased," added soon-to-be-chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.).

"We're very grateful," proffered John McCain (R-Ariz.).

"Very proud," contributed Pat Roberts (R-Kan.). "Very enthusiastic . . . and very happy."

Gates earned these very, very nice words because of one very important attribute: He is not Donald Rumsfeld. He gave no wiseacre answers, asked himself no questions and said nothing to disparage the "Army you have." Instead, he made the obvious statement that the Bush administration, until yesterday, had refused to utter: We are not winning in Iraq. Where Rummy was incurably aloof -- he originally used an automatic signature machine to sign letters to the kin of dead troops -- Gates sounded human.

"The pressures of the hearing are nothing compared to the pressures I got from a woman who came over to me at the hotel while I was having dinner the other night, seated by myself," the nominee said. "She congratulated me on my nomination and she said, 'I have two sons in Iraq. For God's sake, bring them home safe.' "

The room went quiet as Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.), who had been questioning Gates, smiled and nodded in agreement. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) joined the nodding, and the smiles spread down both sides of the dais as Gates vowed independence. "I can assure you that I don't owe anybody anything," the nominee promised.

Gates, who won the committee's unanimous support by day's end, was confident enough about his prospects that he told the senators his wife had skipped the hearing to accompany "the Texas A&M women's basketball team to an away game in Seattle."

The senators, too, exhibited few signs of tension: Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) read a news clipping about himself headlined "Nelson Defeats Harris," then perused a housing report. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) worked his way through a box of candy and a large cup of coffee. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John Thune (R-S.D.) thumbed their BlackBerrys. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) rehearsed her questions, written in large type on numbered index cards. An evidently distracted Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) spoke of communing with fallen troops. "I talk to those who've lost their lives, and they have that sense of duty and mission," he reported.

Even the war protesters lacked enthusiasm: Only six dissenters answered organizers' call to picket in front of the Hart Office Building before the hearing. In this environment, Gates felt comfortable enough to lighten things up a bit. When Ben Nelson proposed continually increasing the bounty for Osama bin Laden, Gates noted: "A sort of Terrorist Powerball."

Gates made no promise to end the war in Iraq or to bring home the troops. But he endeared himself to the candor-starved senators at the start with just two words. "Mr. Gates, do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" Levin asked.

"No, sir," Gates replied. In fact, he worried about "the very real risk and possible reality of a regional conflagration."

Seven times, Gates assured the senators that all options are "on the table" -- even a "dramatically smaller" number of troops in Iraq. Nine times, Gates and his questioners agreed on the need for "fresh eyes" or a "fresh look" or a "fresh approach" -- a development Levin, Bill Nelson and Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) declared "refreshing."

But if Gates was offering fresh eyes (his reading glasses rested on the witness table), he could not promise a fresh face. The veteran of the George H.W. Bush administration was ushered into the room by a literal old guard: former senators Bob Dole and David Boren.

The current senators, having embraced Gates as the ticket out of Iraq, encouraged him to say something bad about Bush policies. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.) got Gates to criticize the administration's disbanding of the Iraqi army and de-Baathification of the government. McCain got him to say that "there clearly were insufficient troops." Byrd got him to say that it would be folly to attack Iran or Syria. Warner got him to say that Bush "understands that there needs to be a change in our approach in Iraq." Lindsey Graham (R-S.C) got him to say that Iraq wasn't necessarily the "central front" in the fight against terrorism. Levin got him to criticize the Pentagon's handling of intelligence.

But it was Kennedy, the old liberal, who elicited an emotional response when he noted that 59 Americans had been killed in Iraq since Gates was nominated.

Gates, unlike some predecessors at the Pentagon, knew the war's total tally: 2,889 dead as of Monday morning. "Twelve graduates of Texas A&M have been killed in Iraq," said the nominee, who is A&M's president. "I would run in the morning with some of those kids. . . . I'd hand them their degrees, I'd attend their commissioning, and then I would get word of their death. So this all comes down to being very personal for all of us."

Very well said.

A Fresh Old Hand (WP)

ROBERT M. GATES, asked by President Bush to provide "fresh eyes" at the Defense Department, began yesterday by offering the Senate Armed Services Committee a refreshingly candid voice. Asked near the beginning of his confirmation hearing if the United States was winning the war in Iraq, he responded with two words: "No, sir." He later spelled out some of the mistakes that explain that failure -- including the deployment of too few troops -- with a frankness rarely heard from a Bush administration Cabinet member. Where outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld commonly batted down or evaded legitimate congressional questions, Mr. Gates was responsive to the most tendentious queries, calmly explaining to Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) why he would not favor a U.S. invasion of Syria. He said one of his two principal goals was to help forge a truly bipartisan policy for the war on terrorism; his performance yesterday was a good start.

Mr. Gates's first challenge, as he acknowledged, is Iraq, and there he no more possesses a simple solution than does the Iraq Study Group, which is due to report today. The Defense nominee said he would be open to all options, but he made clear that he does not favor a quick or unconditional withdrawal of American forces or the abandonment of efforts to shore up the elected Iraqi government and its army. He warned that such an abandonment could lead to "a regional conflagration" that would deeply damage U.S. interests in the region. "Frankly," he said, "there are no new ideas on Iraq. The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches, is pretty much out there. And the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

We share Mr. Gates's view that a consensus can be reached on a new course for Iraq, one that would involve a mix of the pieces that he and senators from both parties returned to yesterday: more training for Iraqi forces and a handoff of combat duties that would allow for a reduction of U.S. troops; pressure on Iraqis to reach a political settlement; more aggressive regional diplomacy. A couple of Democratic senators questioned whether President Bush accepted Mr. Gates's view that the status quo is unacceptable. The veteran Washington operative responded forcefully: "I am not . . . [coming] back to Washington to be a bump on a log and not to say exactly what I think, and to speak candidly and, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue about . . . what I think needs to be done."

We hope Iraq will not be the only subject for such candor. Mr. Rumsfeld also leaves behind the pressing question of whether the Army and Marine Corps are too small to handle the press of engagements around the world -- as we believe they are. Also, how can the department manage a procurement budget intended to "transform" the military for 21st-century battles and also pay for big conventional weapons systems conceived during the Cold War? Was the enormous expansion of Defense Department intelligence operations since 2001 a necessary shift or a wasteful byproduct of Mr. Rumsfeld's bureaucratic infighting? Mr. Gates promised to investigate all these matters; we hope his answers will be as sure and unvarnished as those he offered yesterday.

The Un-Rumsfeld (NYT)

The nearly universal (and bipartisan) relief at the departure of Donald Rumsfeld ensured that Robert Gates would have an easy confirmation hearing. And Mr. Gates played the role of the un-Rumsfeld masterfully yesterday. He offered just enough candor and conciliation to persuade most senators that he plans to be a very different sort of defense secretary, while deftly holding back any real information about how he plans to clean up President Bush's mess in Iraq.

Mr. Gates's truth-telling did not go much further than acknowledging what is obvious to everyone but this White House. He agreed with various senators that the United States is not winning in Iraq, that politicians in Baghdad need to be pressured into negotiating a political settlement, and that the Pentagon botched the post-invasion by failing to send enough troops and committing other now infamous errors.

He was less accommodating when asked to share his prescriptions for Iraq, saying only that he was open to all ideas. Given both President Bush's and Mr. Rumsfeld's unrelenting denials of Iraq's disastrous reality — and their refusal to accept the advice of others — even statements of the obvious and a pledge to keep an open mind sound good. But Iraq is unraveling so fast that Mr. Gates will have to come up with opinions quickly, and be willing to express them to the president forcefully.

Mr. Bush has certainly shown little sign of opening his mind. Since announcing Mr. Gates's nomination, he has sought to pre-empt the much-anticipated advice of James Baker's Iraq Study Group (on which Mr. Gates served), brushing off suggestions that he talk directly to Iran and insisting that there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq.

Still, Mr. Gates seems at least game to try to break through the wall. He said that Iraq was only "one of the central fronts" in the war on terror — a departure from the official litany. He said that he did not believe that the president had been given authority — either under the 9/11 war resolution or the Iraq war resolution — to attack Iran or Syria (and would counsel against it). And he said bringing both countries into negotiations about Iraq's future at least "merits thinking about."

In any other time that would all be considered pretty bland stuff. But for an aspiring member of this administration, that came close to speaking truth to power.

A More Honest Assessment Of Iraq Draws Cheers (USAT)

USA Today, December 6, 2006

After almost four years of prickly denials from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld that anything was wrong with the Pentagon's plan in Iraq, it was refreshing Tuesday to hear his successor acknowledge that things are not going so well. During a Senate confirmation hearing, Robert Gates conceded that U.S. forces aren't winning and that new approaches need to be considered.

This is obvious to nearly everyone now, but it nevertheless was so sharp a departure from Bush administration dogma that it won over some of Gates' strongest detractors.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who advocates withdrawing U.S. troops and who becomes chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take over Congress next month, gushed that Gates' testimony was a "welcome breath of honest, candid realism." This from one of 31 senators who voted against Gates' confirmation as CIA director in 1991. The committee voted 21-0 on Tuesday for confirmation, and the full Senate is certain to follow.

So two cautionary notes:

One is that Gates' fans should hope he's no longer the man his critics said he was during his painful CIA confirmation hearings 15 years ago. Then, Gates was portrayed as an arrogant bully who distorted intelligence findings to fit administration policy, refused to listen to dissenting opinions, and was never entirely forthcoming about his role in the Iran-contra scandal — precisely the sort of arrogance and bad judgment that got Rumsfeld in trouble and chained the nation to a failed policy in Iraq. Gates' friends say he has evolved since that confirmation experience, and he went on to win generally favorable reviews for his tenure as CIA director. But wartime Defense secretaries face far more pressure and far more scrutiny.

The other worry is that no matter how adroit Gates is, no matter how clear-eyed about the magnitude of the mess he faces, the outlook is bleak. As Defense secretary, Gates will be playing a weak hand for a politically damaged administration with few friends in Washington or around the world. He will get lots of advice, starting with today's much-anticipated recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, but what happens next is as much about the public's willingness to support any new plan as it is about the Pentagon's ability to execute it.

For now, Gates' chief strength — and it's significant — is that he's not the man he'll replace. Given Rumsfeld's radioactivity in Washington and around the world, that should give Gates a useful honeymoon.

The signs are that he realizes he's walking on the edge of an abyss. At the very end of the morning session Tuesday, a time when many onlookers have left and participants are mostly thinking about lunch, Gates mused about possible outcomes in Iraq. He sketched a scenario in which U.S. forces remain bogged down and unable to win, and another in which they slowly manage to right the situation and impose order.

"Seems to me," he said, "it could go either way." That's the right place to start.

Goodness Gracious! The Truth! (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

WASHINGTON

First Junior took over the house with grandiose plans to remodel it and make it the envy of the neighborhood. But then he played with matches and set the house on fire. So now he's frantically trying to stop the flames from torching the whole block.

The Bush administration has gone from a breathless plan to change the Middle East to a breathless plan to preserve it, from democracy promotion to conflagration avoidance.

That was the cold shower offered yesterday by Robert Gates, the former C.I.A. chief, on his way to being unanimously endorsed as the new defense secretary by a Senate panel craving a cold shower.

He told the Armed Services Committee, peppered with wannabe future presidents, that the American occupation could lead to a Baghdad as hostile as Tehran, and set off "a regional conflagration" if Iraq is not deftly handled in the next couple of years.

Mr. Gates asserted that if America left Iraq in chaos, Iran and Syria could encroach more, and Turkey and Saudi Arabia might jump in to stop the ethnic cleansing of Sunnis by Shiites. "We're already seeing Hezbollah involved in training fighters for Iraq," he said. "I think all of that could spread fairly dramatically."

It was the sort of realistic assessment that never came from Rummy, except when he privately admitted in a classified Nov. 6 memo that their Iraq strategy was "not working well enough or fast enough," offering a silly hodgepodge of wildly tardy or dubious options, like telling the Iraqis to "pull up their socks."

It was chilling to see in print that the man who spent nearly four years overseeing the war did not have any idea what to do in Iraq; his basic plan was not so much to fix the problem as to lower expectations. The memo, reported by Michael Gordon in The Times on Sunday, offered the following lame-brained prescriptions to manage perception:

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' " And this: "Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist."

So with the Pentagon deciding whether to Go Big, Go Long or Go Home, Rummy urged the White House to Go Minimalist and simply streamline the spin.

Junior took the advice to manage perceptions by minimizing Rummy two days after he sent the memo. The walls had closed in on W.; he could no longer minimize the war, which was escalating, or the perception that it was not going well, which had spread into Republican ranks. Even Gen. Peter Pace, yes man that he is, acknowledged on Monday that "We're not winning but we're not losing."

The old criticisms of whether Mr. Gates massaged intelligence were forgotten; the senators would have embraced an ax-murderer if he had seemed sensible about Iraq.

There was no blathering yesterday about "known unknowns" or "Henny Penny" pessimists. The soft-spoken, vanilla Mr. Gates offered a sharp contrast from the finger-wagging, flavorful Rummy. In a remarkable shift from the mindless bellicosity and jingoism of the last few years, Mr. Gates said he did not favor military action against Iran or Syria.

Even though he was a member of the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Gates conceded that there would be no silver bullet. "It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," he said. Asked by Robert Byrd who was responsible for 9/11, Saddam or Osama, Mr. Gates did not try to fudge. "Osama bin Laden, Senator," he replied. Asked who has represented a greater threat to the U.S., he repeated "Osama bin Laden."

W. insisted to Fox News's Brit Hume on Monday that his "objective hadn't changed" and that "we're going to succeed in Iraq." Asked by Carl Levin if America was winning in Iraq, Mr. Gates answered, "No, sir."

After lunch the nominee clarified his remarks, saying he had not meant to criticize the troops, that the reversals in Iraq were not their fault. They don't lose battles in Iraq because there are no battles. There's just a counterinsurgency that they can't see and that they weren't prepared or equipped to fight.

Gates's friends from the old Bush 41 gang have been watching closely to see if 43 brought the old Washington hand back for "cosmetic reasons," as one put it, simply to try to change the perception that W. has been stubborn and deaf on Iraq. Or whether 43 really will give his new defense chief the parameters he needs to make real changes in strategy. Will he let him Go Maximalist? <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

This Time Around, A Shorter Confirmation Hearing And Praise For Candor (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — When Robert M. Gates faced Senate confirmation to be director of central intelligence in 1991, the hearings stretched over four months and featured hundreds of witnesses, thousands of documents and the nominee responding to 1,000 questions in written and oral form over four long days of testimony.

On Tuesday, Mr. Gates was welcomed back by the Senate as "a refreshing breath of reality," applauded by people on both sides of the aisle for his candor and forthrightness, his pledges of bipartisanship and dialogue. And the committee rewarded him with unanimous confirmation in less than eight hours.

This time, of course, he was appearing as the anti-Rumsfeld, and as a symbol to the incoming Democratic majority in particular of fresh thinking on Iraq. No one on either side spent much time defending the departing defense secretary on style or substance.

If the comparison was not obvious enough, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, made it so in her questioning late in the morning. "Thank you for your candor — that's something that has been sorely lacking from the current occupant in the position that you seek to hold," Mrs. Clinton said. "We need a strong secretary of defense, but that doesn't mean strong-headed."

In contrast to Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sometimes had to be coaxed to his appearances before the committee and then rarely ceded an inch, Mr. Gates declared that the United States was not winning in Iraq and that mistakes had been made all around.

The Democrats seized the opportunity to relish their victory in the midterm elections, which provided the final push out the door for Mr. Rumsfeld, and to hammer home their campaign themes.

Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, displaying his feistiness at age 89, asked Mr. Gates who he believed was responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks, Saddam Hussein or Osama bin Laden. "Osama bin Laden, sir," Mr. Gates replied quietly.

Who has represented the greater threat to the United States? Mr. Byrd pushed. "Osama bin Laden."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who was sitting next to Mr. Byrd, raised an eyebrow and smiled.

Republicans for the most part were content to sit back and lob softballs suited more to a first job interview or college application. "You've been in tough situations before," said Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama. "Do you feel that that experience can help you think through with some new perspective on these issues?"

With the White House and Congress awaiting the release of the Iraq Study Group's conclusions on Wednesday, Democrats sought to remind President Bush, through Mr. Gates, that Congress intends to have a say in the conduct of the war. Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the pocket-kerchiefed Senate parliamentarian, backed them up from across the aisle, opening with a statement that pointedly reminded the president that he had "a moral obligation" to listen to both parties and to work with the legislative branch.

Mr. Warner, the departing Republican chairman of the committee, reminded Mr. Gates of his own reflections in his book, that the White House works best when it works in concert with Congress. And Mr. Warner urged him not to hold back in offering his personal recommendations to the president. "You simply must be fearless," Mr. Warner said. "I repeat, fearless."

The seats behind the nominee, normally filled with family, White House escorts and other defenders, were left largely empty behind Mr. Gates, who sat alone at the table. (His wife of 40 years, Mr. Gates said, had asked to be excused to travel with the Texas A&M women's basketball team to a game in Seattle.)

But Mr. Gates did not need much protection, except perhaps from the 40-odd photographers tripping over themselves to capture his every hand gesture.

He displayed a knack for flattering the committee. "Secretaries come and go, but the Senate Armed Services Committee remains," he said. "If confirmed, I will seek your counsel and take it seriously."

"We all work for the same boss," he added. If it was not clear that he did not mean the president, he added, "That boss is the people of the United States."

Mr. Gates paid moving tribute to the nearly 3,000 American service members killed in Iraq, including 12 graduates of Texas A&M, where he has been president for four years. He spoke of the woman who came up to him as he dined alone in a Washington restaurant and told him: "I have two sons in Iraq. For God's sake, bring them home safe."

"So this all comes down to being very personal for all of us," Mr. Gates said.

It was a day of compliments and warm chuckles; when Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, suggested increasing the bounty for capturing Mr. bin Laden by a million dollars a week, Mr. Gates offered, "Sort of terrorist Powerball?"

Introducing Mr. Gates, former Senator Bob Dole made the obligatory joke about how he realized too late that Mr. Gates's handlers wanted the other Senator Dole — his wife, Elizabeth, beaming in a red suit and matching lipstick from her seat alongside the other committee members — to do the honors.

Mr. Dole then reminded the committee of the seriousness of the task at hand; the last time a secretary of defense was changed in wartime, he said, was in 1968 when President Lyndon B. Johnson nominated Clark Clifford to succeed Robert S. McNamara. "Make no mistake about it," Mr. Dole said, "history is being made here today."

The most aggressive questioning came from those committee members eyeing the presidency: Mrs. Clinton and Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who continued to press his case for more troops in Iraq. It was a "non sequitur," he insisted, to say that there were not enough troops going in, but also that current troop levels are sufficient despite the deteriorating situation.

But even he seemed to recognize that he would not win his point, concluding, "I hope you will help us gain consensus."

Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, another possible Democratic contender, asked Mr. Gates how he could be confident the president would heed his counsel. "Senator, because he asked me to take the job," Mr. Gates replied. Mr. Bayh waited for a more elaborate answer, and, realizing one was not coming, said simply, "He asked the others to take the jobs as well."

Gates Wins Senate Committee Approval, 21-0 (USAT)

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee for secretary of Defense told a Congressional committee Tuesday that he agreed to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld so he could help shape a new course in Iraq, not "to be a bump on a log." Robert Gates said he expected President Bush to listen to his advice even when he disagreed.

"I think that the president was very direct in saying, both privately to me and then publicly, that he saw the need for fresh eyes on the problem," Gates said during his Senate Armed Services Committee confirmation hearing.

Committee Democrats said they were encouraged by Gates' statements that were seemingly at odds with the White House. For example, Gates said the United States was neither winning nor losing in Iraq, adding that he wasn't criticizing U.S. troops. They, Gates said, were doing well and had not lost on the battlefield.

U.S. forces will be in Iraq for a long time, Gates warned, and failing to secure the country could cause a "regional conflagration" involving Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and other Middle Eastern nations.

Gates said the United States needs to communicate with Iran and Syria, although Bush has rejected direct talks with those two neighbors of Iraq.

"A channel for communications is not necessarily a vehicle for negotiations," Gates said, adding he doubted the U.S. could gain much in negotiations with Iran.

After the U.S. invasion toppled Saddam Hussein's regime in April 2003, the United States should not have disbanded the Iraqi military or purged the government of Saddam's Baath Party, Gates said.

In another diversion from current administration policy, Gates criticized Rumsfeld's creation of a small group at the Pentagon to mine intelligence reports for signs that Saddam was threat.

"The one thing that I don't like is offline intelligence organizations, or analytical groups," said Gates, who worked at the CIA for more than two decades before becoming its director from 1991 to 1993. Instead, Gates said, he prefers depending on professional intelligence analysts and preserving their independence.

Gates said his first move as Defense secretary would be visiting U.S. commanders in Iraq and Afghanistan to seek their recommendations, which he will give "great weight."

The panel liked what it heard. Gates won unanimous committee approval that set up a final Senate vote that could come as early as today. The 21-0 vote Tuesday evening came after a day of public and private questioning of the former CIA director. Democrats and Republicans alike praised Gates as an independent voice for changing policies in Iraq the Bush administration now concedes aren't working.

"I think you're going to be a good secretary," Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., told Gates near the end of about five hours of public questioning. "You come to the table for all the right reasons … and I think you're doing this out of a sense of loyalty to our country and a sense of patriotism."

Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said he asked Senate leaders to hold debate and a vote on the Gates nomination today, but no decision had been made Tuesday evening.

Gates' approval is all but inevitable, said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat. "The faster the president can hear the kind of candor we heard this morning on Iraq, the better." Levin told reporters during a break in the hearings.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, one of at least three potential 2008 presidential contenders on the Senate panel, praised Gates while simultaneously criticizing Rumsfeld's prickly relationship with Congress.

"Thank you for your candor," she told Gates. "That's something that has been sorely lacking from the current occupant in the position that you seek to hold."

Gates was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group until Nov. 8, when Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination. That panel's recommendations, due to be released today, will be helpful but aren't the only ones to consider, Gates said.

"It's my impression that there are no new ideas, really, on Iraq," Gates said. "I think the report of the Iraq Study Group is important. I don't think it's the last word."

Gates Says 'US Is Not Winning Iraq' (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Robert Gates, the White House choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary, on Tuesday acknowledged the US was not winning the war in Iraq.

Asked at his nomination hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee whether the US was winning the war, Mr Gates responded: "No sir."

DOJ_NMG_0102714

Following the hearing - notable for the lack of acrimony that was present when Mr Rumsfeld testified - the committee voted unanimously to approve sending his nomination to the full Senate for final approval, which is expected to come this week.

Mr Gates later clarified that his remarks did not mean he thought the US was losing in Iraq. But his blunt assessment was at odds with an October statement by President George W. Bush that the US was "absolutely...winning".

Mr Gates also demonstrated clear differences with Mr Rumsfeld. Asked by John McCain, the Arizona senator who is the frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination for 2008, whether he believed there had been enough troops in Iraq, he replied: "There clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country."

In another display of independence that won Mr Gates admiration from Democrats, Mr Gates said he did not believe Iraq was "the central front" in the war on terror, which President Bush has consistently argued.

Asked by Lindsey Graham, an influential Republican on the committee, whether Iraq was "the central front", Mr Gates paused before replying: "I think it is one of the central fronts in the war on terror".

The Iraq Study Group, the bi-partisan commission mandated by Congress to examine US policy on Iraq, is on Wednesday expected to release its recommendations for a new policy direction on Iraq, although Mr Bush is not expected to respond until after he has heard the conclusions of two internal administration reviews.

Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will chair the Armed Services Committee from January, praised Mr Gates, saying his acknowledgement that the US was not winning in Iraq was "a necessary, refreshing breath of reality that is so needed if we're going to look at ways of changing course in Iraq to maximise the chances of success". Mr Gates said he was open to a "wide range" of ideas for US policy on Iraq. But the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency – who was an ISG member until being nominated to replace the controversial Mr Rumsfeld – said he did not believe the group's recommendations would be the "last word".

"It's my impression that . . . there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Mr Gates. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches, is pretty much out there. And the question is: is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

Mr Gates said the next two years in Iraq would be crucial in determining whether the US could help the country stabilise.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether American and Iraqi people and the next president of the US will face a slowly but steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region, or will face the very real risk and possible reality of a regional conflagration."

Mr Gates was also outspoken on Iran, saying he would only advise an attack on the country as an "absolute last resort".

"We have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable. And I think that the consequences of a military conflict with Iran could be quite dramatic." He said he did not support an attack on Syria, which, along with Iran, the US has accused of meddling in Iraq, adding that an attack on either country would likely worsen the violence in Iraq.

His reservations on military action against Iran were a shot across the bows of weakened but still influential neo-conservatives in Washington who have called for strikes against the Islamic republic's nuclear facilities. Glen Howard of the Jamestown Foundation, a security think-tank, said: "The neo-cons are regrouping around the Iran threat."

Gates' Assets Include Defense Stock (WP/AP)

By Sharon Theimer, The Associated Press

The Washington Post/AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Defense Secretary-nominee Robert Gates' assets include up to $250,000 in stock in a defense contractor on whose board he serves, a financial disclosure report made public Tuesday shows.

If confirmed as defense secretary, Gates will divest his holdings in the company, NACCO Industries, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. He will step away from any Defense Department matters involving NACCO for at least a year, she said.

Gates is a member of the board of directors of NACCO Industries, the Cleveland-based parent of the NACCO Materials Handling Group, a lift truck company and Defense Department contractor.

He holds stock worth $100,000 to $250,000 and earned $134,750 in director fees from the company from 2005 to the present, according to the financial report he filed with the federal government.

Gates plans to sell all the stock he owns in individual companies and sever all ties with them if the Senate confirms him as Pentagon chief, Perino said.

The Cabinet post would mean a pay cut for Gates. Like the man he would succeed, Donald H. Rumsfeld, Gates is a millionaire. The defense secretary post pays $183,500 a year; Gates earned nearly that much from speeches alone over the past few years.

Among his other holdings, Gates is part of BLO Family Properties, a family-owned company in Mount Vernon, Wash. He described that asset as worth $1 million to $5 million.

Other assets and earnings detailed in Gates' financial report from 2005 to the present include:

_ $752,788 in salary as president of Texas A&M University.

_ $397,834 in compensation from Fidelity Investments, where he is chairman of the board of trustees.

_ $163,000 from a total of 10 speeches, including $16,000 each in speaking fees from National Pest Management, AIM Investments, Mellon Financial, Target Corp. and others and $20,000 for addressing the Securing America's Future Energy Foundation.

_ $80,033 in director fees from Brinker International.

_ $64,749 in consulting fees from The Mitchell Group, an energy consulting group in Houston.

_ A $5,000 consulting fee from Temple Inland, a real estate firm in Austin, Texas.

Gates' report also lists positions he holds with nonprofit organizations.

Gates is a member of the boards of directors of the Boy Scouts of America in Irving, Texas, and the United Way of Brazos County in College Station, Texas. He is president of the National Eagle Scout Association in Irving and a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, the Aspen Strategy Group and the Center for Strategic and International Studies Transnational Threat Project, all in Washington.

All The President's Men Are Down To One (SH)

By Martin Schram

Scripps Howard, December 6, 2006

(SH) - They were all this President's men - Cheney and Rummy and Wolfie and Bolton - neoconservatives, hard-line conservatives, iron-fisted conservatives, unyielding conservatives.

Once they were not only The Untouchables but also The Unbudgeables. Now there is only one.

Don Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz and now John Bolton have been bulldozed and/or forklifted out of power. Once the Team Bush Neocons controlled Bush's Situation Room. Now they can caucus in a telephone booth - except it is unlikely Cheney can find one anymore.

So perhaps the once-dominant neocons will make do with just a morning caucus in Dick Cheney's bathroom mirror.

And that may be Cheney's most visible appearance of the day. For it seems that Dick Cheney may be on his way to becoming just another one of those veeps who is seldom seen and hardly heard. After all, Cheney's last assigned mission was to be unceremoniously summoned to Saudi Arabia, where not a single public event was held. And that was just as well because the word in the Washington think tanks is that the Saudi monarch used Cheney to send his sternest warning that if the Untied States leaves Iraq too rapidly and the Iranian-backed Shiite take over, the Saudis may step in to prevent a massacre of the Suunis.

The last Cheney sighting you may recall was his Nov. 3 appearance on ABC News, where he defined President Bush's resolve: "It's victory in Iraq. And it's full speed ahead on that basis." That, of course, was part of the pre-election bravado when Bush himself had promised that both Cheney and Rummy would stay on the job as long as he was president. Then, faster than you can say, "Brownie you're doing a heck of a job," Rummy was told his resignation was accepted, so would he please write it?

Rummy has had a heck of a run in Washington - a marathon. As a 1960s congressman from Chicago's suburbs, he was known as a moderate Republican back before GOP moderates became a rare breed. Then he got cabinet-rank domestic jobs in the Nixon White House - even though the Old Man (as Nixon's favorite guys, like Pat Buchanan and Bill Safire, called their boss when he wasn't around) suspected he was a secret dove on the Vietnam War.

One day when a young Washington correspondent arrived for a scheduled interview, Rumsfeld had another fellow there, too. "This is a new guy on my staff and, if you don't mind, I'd like him to sit in just to see how I handle press interviews," Rumsfeld said, adding, "Say hello to Dick Cheney."

Rummy and Cheney. Mentor and protege. They were cautious, thorough, insightful yet careful not to leave fingerprints on anything that could explode in their faces ... or all over their resumes. They excelled at avoiding controversy, skillfully putting their best and blandest face forward.

But Rummy did his best work behind the scenes and Cheney quickly learned the craft of politics. Including the great manipulation of November 1975. President Ford was under pressure to dump his veep (Nelson Rockefeller) from the 1976 ticket and Ford's chief of staff. Rumsfeld (Cheney was his deputy there. too) coveted the job. But a potential rival was another ex-congressman, ex-United Nations ambassador and currently ambassador to China: George H. W. Bush. So Rummy engineered Bush's appointment as CIA director. Bush felt trapped into accepting - and furious.

"It's a graveyard for politics... ," he wrote his three brothers and sister. Offering his reluctant acceptance to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the elder Bush lamented: "Your message came as a total and complete shock ... I see this as the total end of any political future."

Strange turns. Voters weren't spooked by Bush's CIA past and he, not Rummy, became a president. And when Bush's son was elected, it was Cheney who landed a return engagement as defense secretary for his old mentor, Rummy.

Speaking of strange turns, Rummy apparently had one last writing job before getting to his resignation note - that classified memo to President Bush, listing every conceivable new course option for Iraq. His memo, written without the usual detailed analysis, seems intended mainly for our eyes only. It quickly materialized on page one of The New York Times - and we saw everything but the leaker's fingerprints.

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote. His memo was dated Nov. 6, just three days after his protege had assured us that the Iraq plan was "full speed ahead" - and three days before the president told the world he needed a new man at the Pentagon to help us find a new direction.

The dynamic duo has run its last course.

Iraq Panel To Urge New Policy Wednesday (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 6, 2006

President Bush got a preview Tuesday of the Iraq commission's ideas for changing war policies, as the White House sought to dampen the report's impact by emphasizing that Bush will be listening to other voices as well.

Over lunch at the White House, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the Iraq Study Group's Republican co-chairman, gave Bush a private briefing on the general outline of the conclusions, said Dana Perino, a presidential spokeswoman.

The report — which Baker referred to during the lunch, Perino said — will be released Wednesday morning. The full commission, led by Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, will give a copy of the report to Bush at 7 a.m. EST.

Following the presentation to the president, the group is to brief Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his team via secure videoconference from the White House.

Bush, to be joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolton, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and other senior White House aides, was to thank the commission but not comment on the specifics of its recommendations, the official said.

"We're going to give it a careful review," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "As we have mentioned, there are other ongoing studies within the administration."

Bush is expected to hear in about two weeks the conclusions of in-house examinations of Iraq policy, anchored by a review of military options by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Snow said the president already is taking the advice of Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who said Bush has a "moral obligation" to seek input on a new Iraq strategy from Democrats who are about to take control of Congress.

Tuesday afternoon, the president consulted on Iraq with House Republicans and is due to see House and Senate leaders after Wednesday's briefing by the Iraq Study Group.

On Capitol Hill Tuesday, the confirmation hearing for Robert Gates — who is expected to be approved to replace embattled Pentagon chief Donald H. Rumsfeld — became a vehicle for lawmakers to express their displeasure. Democrats as well as some Republicans have urged Bush to present a plan for some of the 140,000 U.S. troops to begin coming home.

Replying to a question, Gates contradicted Bush's previous statements and said the United States is not winning in Iraq — a conclusion he said he reached while a member of the Iraq commission. But he played down the likelihood of the commission coming up with a quick solution.

"It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Gates, who left the commission when Bush nominated him to be defense secretary. The Senate panel voted 21-0 to recommend his confirmation.

But even as the administration pushed back against the idea that a major change is coming, it appeared to be maneuvering separately from the commission to set the stage for adjustments.

The war has surpassed the length of American involvement in World War II, and U.S. deaths have passed 2,900. A relentless insurgency and the added complication of increased fighting between religious and ethnic factions have raised questions about whether Iraq is embroiled in a civil war and whether the al-Maliki's U.S.-backed government will ever be able to calm the country.

A changed political environment at home has added to the pressure on Bush. Democrats wrested majorities in the House and Senate from the president's Republican Party in last month's midterm elections, in large part because of dissatisfaction with the war.

The Iraq commission members gathered at a Washington hotel Tuesday to receive their copies of the report, thick black binders that each carried out, and their marching orders for media interviews on Wednesday. "But of course," said lobbyist and commission member Vernon Jordan when asked if the group was satisfied with its product, but everyone stayed mum on details, as did the White House.

The report was expected to urge the U.S. to reach out for more help on Iraq's security — including Iran and Syria as part of a larger group — and to gradually change U.S. troops' mission from combat to training and support, with a broad goal of withdrawing the Americans by early 2008.

Bush has resisted engagement with Iran and Syria, which the U.S. accuses of being bad actors on the world stage as well as fomenting instability in Iraq. Bush has rejected any timetable for U.S. troop drawdowns.

From Baghdad, though, the top American military spokesman said the Pentagon expects all of Iraq to be under the control of Iraqi forces by the middle of next year.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said this is part of an accelerated timetable discussed by Bush and al-Maliki during a meeting in Jordan last week. Previous Iraqi predictions of their abilities to take over have fallen by the wayside, but al-Maliki's statement last week that Iraq soldiers and police would be up to speed by June was seen as one way out for the administration.

And the White House reacted warmly to al-Maliki's announcement Tuesday that his government wants a conference with neighboring nations, such as Iran and Syria, on ending the violence.

"It's a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security," Snow said.

A powerful Iraqi Shiite political leader, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, returned to the White House Tuesday to meet with Vice President Dick Cheney. He met with Bush the day before.

Report's Rollout Precisely Planned (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Beginning with an early morning presidential briefing, the long-awaited Iraq Study Group report will be unveiled and promoted with a well-choreographed plan.

Group members have a 7 a.m. appointment today at the White House to present their report to President Bush, starting a day-long series of briefings and media appearances on their recommendations for Iraq.

"The purpose is to inspire and inform public debate," said Lauren Sucher, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Institute of Peace, a federally funded think tank that has assisted the Iraq Study Group.

After their White House visit, group members will head to Capitol Hill to brief House and Senate leaders. They plan to hold a news conference at 11 a.m., when they will release the report to the public.

The rest of the day features a string of television, radio and newspaper interviews of study group members, including its co-chairmen: former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., now director of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington.

The interviews are being coordinated by the Edelman public relations firm, which will continue to assist the institute through appearances on this Sunday's news talk shows.

The U.S. Institute of Peace, which is devoted to global conflict resolution, received a $1 million appropriation from Congress to assist the Iraq Study Group.

Sucher would not reveal how much of that budget is going to Edelman.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush and his aides probably won't be saying much today because they want to study the report first.

Pressure Builds On Bush To Change Track (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

The Iraq Study Group report, to be released on Wednesday, will increase the pressure on President George W. Bush to adjust US military policy in Iraq to stem the rising violence and pave the way for an eventual troop withdrawal.

Leaks from the bipartisan commission led by James Baker, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, suggest it will recommend a gradual withdrawal to step up pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian violence without outlining a timetable for a complete pull-out.

White House officials said Mr Bush would make a strategy decision within weeks after he has absorbed two internal reviews of Iraq policy, including a Pentagon military "scrub" and the Baker-Hamilton recommendations.

The initial drumbeat surrounding the ISG suggested Mr Baker, a Bush family friend, would help the president extricate himself from Iraq, where almost 2,900 US troops and tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died.

In Amman last week, Mr Bush appeared, however, to reject that. "I know there's a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there's going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq," he said. "We're going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the [Iraqi] government wants us there."

In a classified memo leaked over the weekend, however, Donald Rumsfeld, the outgoing defence secretary, laid out policy options that included a modest withdrawal of troops to force the Iraqis to "pull up their socks".

Regardless of the ISG recommendations, most experts say Mr Bush cannot continue along the same track and there is likely to be some change to the levels and structure of US forces in Iraq.

With the exception of small, temporary increases around events such as elections, the number and composition of US troops has been relatively stable since the March 2003 invasion.

The US has about 139,000 troops operating from 55 bases across Iraq. The Pentagon has cut the number of bases from a peak of 110 and has reduced the number of troops from a post-invasion high of 159,000 in January last year.

The Pentagon was forced to abandon plans to bring the number down to about 100,000 this year because of the escalating violence, which many experts are now calling a civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0102719

One option that will be debated in the wake of the ISG report is whether to move troops to Baghdad from Anbar, the Sunni-dominated province in western Iraq which houses the insurgent strongholds of Falluja and Ramadi and where most of the marine units operate.

Anbar has recently been eclipsed as the most violent area in Iraq by the capital, which is seeing an escalation of kidnappings, suicide bombings and killings carried out by sectarian squads.

In his memo, Mr Rumsfeld outlined several "less attractive options" which included moving a large proportion of US forces in Iraq to Baghdad in an effort to secure the capital.

At the congressional hearing last month, Gen John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East, conceded that Anbar was "not under control" but said the "preponderance of the military activity" should be in the Baghdad area. A recent marine intelligence report concluded that the US could not defeat the insurgency in Anbar.

While the marines had previously been doing most of the difficult fighting, the army has borne more of the brunt in recent months because of the violence in Baghdad, where six of the 14 US combat brigades in Iraq are now based.

The other main army division is based outside Tikrit where, in addition to patrolling the Sunni triangle, it has responsibility for Mosul, Kirkuk and Baquba.

A separate military command, known as Anaconda because of the twisting supply lines, has responsibility for logistics -support.

The US military in Baghdad declined to provide a breakdown of the numbers of the different kinds of troops engaged in operating in Iraq. But military experts say that anywhere from 45,000-70,000 troops are involved in combat operations, several thousand are involved in the increasingly important mission to train the Iraqi security forces, while the remainder are engaged in logistics.

One ISG proposal that Mr Bush should have less difficulty endorsing is a recommendation to increase the number of US troops training the Iraqi army and police. The New York Times reported on Tuesday that the US military was already starting to shift combat troops to become advisers in Iraqi units.

Tom Donnelly, a defence expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the military faces a trade-off in increasing the number of trainers because of a lack of personnel. "If you are going to get serious about it, you have to really rearrange the incentives and pull your good guys out of combat units. There is no free lunch in all this."

James Carafano, a military expert at the Heritage Foundation, said the army had previously been reluctant to do this but is starting to change.

"The most significant thing is that before the advisers would stop at the battalion level and now there really is an effort to get advisers down to the lowest level and infuse throughout the chain of command," said Mr Carafano.

An increased focus on training might require US troops to pull back to garrison. This would probably result in a reduction in the casualty rate of US troops. Michael O'Hanlon, a defence expert at the Brookings Institution, said: "There has been less garrisoning in the last few months which is why the fatalities are so much higher."

War Denials Vs. Too-simple Solutions (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With his unwavering insistence that U.S. military forces must stand, fight and "win" in Iraq, President Bush has taken on the look of the last man standing.

Both inside and outside the White House, voices are calling for at least a new war strategy—and at most a target date for withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Bush, while acknowledging frustration with the progress of the U.S. mission, so far has refused to fundamentally alter it.

Another call to change course is likely to come Wednesday from the Iraq Study Group, chaired by Republican James Baker, a former secretary of state, and Democrat Lee Hamilton, an ex-congressman from Indiana. They are expected to recommend a drawdown of U.S. combat troops with a soft deadline of early 2008, with remaining troops focusing on training Iraqi forces, logistics, support and quick reaction in case U.S. advisers are in trouble.

The White House has downplayed the report, saying the president will have no "snap reaction" to the congressionally mandated review.

After nearly four years of war, the president has said he welcomes "fresh eyes" and new tactics. At the same time, he has kept his position that U.S. forces will not stand down until Iraq's nascent government is able to defend itself against terrorism.

And while growing ranks of authorities warn that sectarian violence is consuming Iraq in civil war, the president steadfastly rejects that assessment, calling most of Iraq "relatively peaceful."

"I just think this president simply doesn't want to believe how bad things have gotten," said Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the non-partisan Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Parallels to Vietnam are always terribly dangerous, but you are beginning to see in George Bush some striking resemblance to Lyndon Johnson. Both became failed presidents and tragic figures long before they left office."

Dangerous path

More dangerous, Cordesman suggested, is the temptation of Washington to seize upon simple solutions, such as a premature withdrawal of forces from Iraq, without considering the far-reaching implications of a potential collapse of civil society inside Iraq and the opportunity that would provide for both terrorists within the country and regional neighbors with designs on greater power.

"If the president is in denial, his critics are in oversimplification. I don't know which is worse," said Cordesman, who predicted a rush to flee Iraq if the Baker-Hamilton report bolsters a movement for quick withdrawal. "Everybody is running out to … catch the wave, rather than wondering where the ocean is going to lead."

Bush would be hard-pressed to embrace any formula for troop withdrawal because of his insistence that U.S. troop deployments are dependent on the Iraqi government's ability to operate without them.

Bush met Tuesday with Baker. The Baker-Hamilton study isn't the only review under way. The administration's National Security Council is reviewing the war policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is reviewing the policy. The joint chiefs of staff, led by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, is reviewing the policy.

"I think anybody who expects … a magic bullet out of the Baker-Hamilton commission is probably placing an unfair burden on them," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday. "The way out of Iraq is to have an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself."

For Bush, some say, the solution might lie in embracing one of the recommendations made by his own advisers—or even the Iraq Study Group—without publicly acknowledging that he is taking a dramatic course change in Iraq.

"He is, rhetorically, the last man standing, but from where he is standing he can also see the writing on the wall," said Fred Greenstein, professor emeritus of politics at Princeton University. "This is an extreme situation, but Bush has often been in a situation where he has said he wanted X and settled for X minus whatever he can get, and said this is a great victory. …

"It wasn't very long before he announced [Donald] Rumsfeld's retirement, after he had said he wanted Rumsfeld [to stay] until the end of his presidency," Greenstein said. "He is existing in the real world. He's got very poor cards to play with now."

Bush will play host to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his staunchest ally in the war, on Thursday. The British government has been striving to soft-pedal a recent Blair comment to broadcaster David Frost, who interviewed Blair for Al Jazeera's English-language channel and said the invasion of Iraq has been "pretty much of a disaster." Blair replied: "It has. …" But Blair's spokesman immediately called that "a straightforward slip of the tongue."

Both Rumsfeld, the president's retiring Pentagon chief, and Robert Gates, the president's nominee to succeed Rumsfeld, have issued sobering assessments of the war.

"In my view, it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote to the White House the day before midterm elections handed control of Congress to the Democrats—a memo leaked and published last weekend.

Gates, at his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday, was asked whether the U.S. is winning the war.

Gates: All options on table

"No, sir," replied Gates, adding later that the U.S. is neither winning nor losing. Gates said: "In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0102721

He also remained non-committal about a troop withdrawal: "It depends on the conditions on the ground under which troops were withdrawn."

The president, too, insists that any withdrawal must be based on ground conditions.

"My objective is to succeed," Bush said this week in an interview with Fox News Channel's Brit Hume. "Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for your grandchildren. And the reason … is because we're now in an ideological struggle between extremists and people who want to live in peace."

Democrats Likely To Be Cautious On Iraq Report (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

Congressional Democrats will use today's report by the Iraq Study Group as another opportunity to seek validation for a change of course in the region, but they privately acknowledge that they will be careful not to go too far in embracing the study.

Democrats say they want to make sure that the report — which is expected to call for a transition out of Iraq — doesn't provide cover for the Bush administration over its policies. As part of that approach, both House and Senate Democratic leaders will be driving home the message that the research serves as a strong rebuke of a conflict they believe has devolved into a civil war.

A senior Senate Democratic aide said there will be a "significant attempt" by Democrats to "embrace as much [of the report] as possible, while calling it a clear repudiation of the Bush administration's failed stay-the-course strategy."

"The president owns this lock, stock and barrel," the Senate aide added. "We don't want to be too closely identified with the president."

House and Senate Democrats have largely rallied around the message that 2007 will be a transition year in Iraq and have insisted on some type of troop redeployment in the nearer term. But the party, recently thrust into the majority in both chambers of Congress, has struggled to find a unified position on the war, and many Democrats still disagree on whether, and when, to redeploy from the region.

Still, Democratic leaders used Tuesday to reach across the Dome to present a unified party message on today's unveiling of the report. Sources said they were "still working" to coordinate their talking points in advance of the report's release.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton (Ind.), will brief House and Senate leaders this morning on their six-month study on the war. House Democrats and Republicans will meet with the group at 8:30 a.m., while Senate leaders will hold their session an hour later.

Later today, House and Senate leaders are scheduled to head to the White House to discuss the study with President Bush. Bush got a personal preview of the report from Baker on Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Democratic sources said they plan to drive home three key messages: that the report shows need for a new policy in Iraq, that Iraq is embroiled in a civil war and that Bush must use the report as a wake-up call. But Democrats also will make clear that the report is "not the be-all-and-end-all."

"If what we're hearing is true, it validates what we've been saying," a senior House Democratic staffer said Tuesday. "We need to change what we're doing; it's not working."

Iraq Study Group Finds Options Are Limited (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr., Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

As the Iraq Study Group prepares to release recommendations today, the panel and the Bush administration are broadcasting a similar message: There are no dramatic fixes to end the war or to get U.S. troops home in a hurry.

The group's long-awaited report, people familiar with the matter say, will describe the situation in Iraq as deteriorating, but will acknowledge that its own recommendations are flawed and far from a magic solution. The panel plans to put the main focus on the need to launch an immediate effort to gain international support for rescuing Iraq, including from nettlesome neighbors Syria and Iran.

At the same time, the group will argue that the U.S. should redouble its effort to train the Iraqi army while diminishing its own military presence there largely to an advising and support role, with an eye toward pulling out all combat units by the first three months of 2008. Tens of thousands of U.S. troops will likely remain.

During the past few months, Democrats vying in congressional elections had talked up the possibility of beginning an immediate troop withdrawal, and anticipation had been high that the Iraq Study Group might offer some unexpected solutions. Now, most factions in Washington seem to agree that the room for maneuvering in Iraq is narrow and that any changes in U.S. strategy are likely to come largely on the margins.

Former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, who is co-chairman of the bipartisan group with former Secretary of State James Baker, made that point to a number of ambassadors and former U.S. officials at a Christmas party Saturday. "The expectations are up here," he said, putting his hand shoulder-high, "while our options are down here." He then lowered his hand below his knees, according to two other guests at the gathering.

The lack of any clear solutions for Iraq underscores the sentiment in Washington that U.S. involvement is likely to continue for years, even without obvious signs of progress.

"We are in a position where, politically, it may soon be impossible to stay in Iraq, but where, strategically, we simply can't leave," said Brent Scowcroft, a former national-security adviser to President George H.W. Bush.

During his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, Robert Gates, Mr. Bush's nominee for secretary of defense, acknowledged that the U.S. isn't winning in Iraq. "All options are on the table in terms of how we address this problem," he said. The panel later unanimously approved the nomination and moved it to the full Senate for a vote.

Mr. Gates, who was a member of the Baker-Hamilton panel until he was selected to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as Pentagon chief, declined to discuss the timing or size of any potential military withdrawal from Iraq. He also didn't offer specifics about what other options the administration would consider to stem the violence.

Mr. Gates's role on the panel had led many to believe that Mr. Bush might be keen to embrace the group's findings, which will be laid out in a 100-plus-page report. But in recent days, Mr. Bush and his aides have downplayed its importance, depicting the report as just one review among many.

In detailed private briefings, U.S. officials have told close allies that Mr. Bush plans no abrupt shifts in Iraq and will stick by U.S. troop commitments there. Senior U.S. military commanders in Iraq also say no major changes are in the works, arguing that their current strategy will succeed if given enough time.

That strategy aims to shift thousands of U.S. personnel from combat to training-and-advisory roles while temporarily increasing the numbers of American combat personnel in Baghdad to stabilize the city.

The administration is collecting recommendations from the Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council. Mr. Bush plans to set out his response in a speech later this month, U.S. officials say. U.S. military officials in Iraq said they expect to hear results of the reviews in January and don't expect major changes in policy. "If there was an easy way to do it, we'd have done it by now," one senior official said.

The report of the 10-member bipartisan group, which began work in April, is titled, "The Way Forward: A New Approach." Yesterday, Mr. Baker briefed Mr. Bush at the White House on the general direction of the report. Officials involved with the panel's work said some members are troubled by the increasing violence in Iraq and worry that their recommendations might make little difference, even if followed.

The recommendations put forward in the report may get a cool reception from the administration. White House officials have said the U.S. would be open to considering negotiations with Tehran if it drops its support for the militant group Hezbollah and agrees to suspend its uranium-enrichment work. But Washington has given little sign of what it would be willing to offer Iran in exchange for help in Iraq. During a visit to Amman, Jordan, last week, Mr. Bush told King Abdullah that "this is not the time for engagement with Syria," a senior administration official said.

The White House has rejected calls for beginning a U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq. Administration officials have said they are committed to maintaining current U.S. troop levels there indefinitely.

The administration's apparent reluctance to make sweeping changes in Iraq reflects two factors, said senior U.S. officials familiar with the deliberations. First, Mr. Bush continues to insist that the U.S. can still win, despite evidence that the initial goal of helping build a stable country with a democratic government capable of enforcing order is out of reach.

Second, Mr. Bush and his top advisers believe the White House can resist political pressures to change course in Iraq for at least a few months, Bush aides said. They said Mr. Bush feels that he has a short window to continue his current policy before the 2008 presidential-election cycle intensifies.

The administration's apparent commitment to largely staying the course in Iraq is certain to trigger debate within the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate. Democratic lawmakers have coalesced around a proposal by incoming Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) to begin drawing down U.S. forces in the spring. Democratic leaders have said they won't use their power over the nation's purse strings to cut funding for U.S. personnel in Iraq for fear that it would open them up to charges of endangering the troops.

But some Democrats said they will consider reducing the money available for other administration priorities in Iraq -- like continuing small-scale rebuilding projects or training and equipping Iraqi security forces -- if the administration refuses to change course there or if the country slides deeper into conflict.

Panel To Urge Pressure On Iraq (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group plans to recommend to President Bush that he threaten to reduce economic and military support for Iraq's government if it fails to meet specific benchmarks intended to improve security in the country, a source familiar with the report said yesterday.

The congressionally chartered panel, which is due to deliver its much-anticipated report to Bush at the White House this morning and then unveil it to the public, outlined diplomatic and military ideas intended to change the course of the 44-month-old war. Among other things, the source said, the report urges Bush to aggressively tackle the Israeli-Palestinian dispute to reduce the broader regional tensions fueling the Iraq conflict.

The latest details to emerge from the commission's report help flesh out a plan that also calls for the United States to withdraw nearly all combat units by early 2008 while leaving behind tens of thousands of troops to advise, train and embed with Iraqi forces. The report suggests that the Bush administration open talks with Iran and Syria about ways to end the violence in Iraq and proposes holding a regional conference to bring together all of Iraq's neighbors.

Some proposals in the report track measures that the administration is already carrying out or is considering, but several directly challenge Bush in areas in which he has refused to compromise. The president has rejected talking with Iran and Syria and has resisted linking the Iraq war to the Palestinian issue. He has dismissed timetables for troop withdrawals, although the panel cites 2008 as a goal rather than a firm deadline. He has also declined to punish Iraqis for not making progress in establishing security.

Although the study group will present its plan as a much-needed course change in Iraq, many of its own advisers concluded during its deliberations that the war is essentially already lost, according to private correspondence obtained yesterday and interviews with participants. The best the commission could put forward would be the "least bad" of many bad options, as former ambassador Daniel C. Kurtzer wrote.

An early working draft from July stated that "there is even doubt that any level of resources could achieve the administration's stated goals, given the illiberal and undemocratic political forces, many of them Islamic fundamentalists, that will dominate large parts of the country for a long time."

In private e-mail exchanges over the past two weeks, members of the commission's working group, including former ambassadors, military officers and CIA analysts, expressed equally bleak outlooks for Iraq and skepticism that Bush would accept the panel's recommendations.

The report that resulted from that process is a mix of initiatives and conclusions that cover an array of areas, including a long diplomatic section, a security section and the proposed benchmarks for Iraqi leaders. Former secretary of state James A.

Baker III, who served under President George H.W. Bush and co-chaired the commission, briefed the current president on its conclusions over lunch yesterday.

Baker and his co-chairman, former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), and the rest of the 10-member panel will meet with Bush at the White House at 7 a.m. today to formally hand over the report, then travel to Capitol Hill for an 11 a.m. news conference. The report will be released at that time on four Web sites and is being published today as a mass-market paperback by Vintage Books, a division of Random House, under the title "The Iraq Study Group Report: The Way Forward -- a New Approach."

Some of its conclusions, such as the need for a phased withdrawal and for shifting the mission of U.S. forces, have been reported over the past few days. Much of the report, though, emphasizes diplomatic options. Advisers said they pushed for dialogue with Iraq's immediate neighbors, Iran and Syria, as a major path toward improving the situation, despite a belief that Bush would reject the recommendation outright because of those countries' ties to terrorism.

Baker, who as secretary of state spent much time working to bring peace to the Middle East after the Persian Gulf War, made a personal point of including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the report and "laying out the importance of why it needs to be dealt with and a strategy to deal with it," said a source familiar with the report. Baker has been close to the Saudi royal family and his ideas may provoke opposition from Israel and its allies.

The benchmarks laid out for Iraqi forces are similar to the goals the Iraqi government recently embraced, the source said. Unlike Bush, though, the commission recommends consequences for not meeting them. "If they don't do it, we ought to reduce the military, economic and political support," the source said.

At the same time, the source said, the U.S. military strategy ought to be implemented regardless of whether Iraqis meet their benchmarks. But the commission warns against turning over control of security to Iraqi forces until reforms are in place.

Clifford May, one of the working group's advisers and a former Republican Party spokesman, was one of two advisers who opposed withdrawal and supported Bush's strategy, but he said he "was willing to concede from the start that what Bush hoped for is probably not achievable. But it doesn't mean that nothing is achievable."

May said the report includes "at least 70 recommendations," but a timetable for troop withdrawal is not among them. "Instead, it says we have a mission that can be accomplished, and it defines that mission as the need to leave behind a government that can sustain itself," May said.

Much debate in e-mail exchanges among the most outspoken advisers to the study group focused on whether adding troops would help. But most feared that bringing in the large numbers required would break the military, lead to a surge in U.S. deaths and do nothing to better protect civilians.

In the end, the experts did not agree on sending additional forces beyond military advisers for the Iraqi national army. They seemed certain that Bush would reject most of their recommendations and that few could work anyway.

"Very early on, the notion of achieving some sort of victory didn't take," said Chas W. Freeman Jr., a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "So if victory is not possible and not feasible, even if you could define it, then what you're left with is to find some way to mitigate defeat."

James Dobbins, a principal U.S. architect of the Afghan reconciliation process, said he supported "an intensified regional dialogue that would be comprehensive and encompass all of Iraq's neighbors." But he and others on the staff said a push for more U.S. engagement with Israel and the Palestinians was rarely discussed beyond a few e-mail exchanges.

"It was kind of assumed by everybody that if the U.S. devoted more attention to it, it would be a good thing in its own right, but we didn't devote much time to that, so if it becomes a recommendation, it would likely come directly from Baker and Hamilton," said Kurtzer, who served as U.S. ambassador to Israel and Egypt.

Key Day On Iraq As Report Unveiled (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Tom Vanden Brook

DOJ_NMG_0102725

WASHINGTON — President Bush today receives a high-profile report suggesting new approaches for the Iraq war, a day after a Senate committee signaled it wants change by unanimously approving Robert Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Gates, who was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that is releasing its recommendations, acknowledged at his confirmation hearing Tuesday that the United States is not winning the war. He said he would be open to new options.

After the Armed Service Committee vote, senators praised Gates' willingness to alter course. "I voted yes because … he seemed open to course correction," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will be the panel's chairman after Democrats take control of the Senate.

The vote and the report come at a critical time in the war and Bush's presidency. Violence in Iraq has escalated as U.S. public support for the war has fallen.

Asked directly by Levin if the United States is winning in Iraq, Gates replied, "No, sir." Later he clarified his answer by saying that the country is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

He also acknowledged that there are "no new ideas on Iraq" but added that "all options are on the table."

President Bush, who had lunch with James Baker, the Republican co-chairman of the study group, will get the report at a 7 a.m. meeting today.

Among the issues to be raised by the commission and others:

•Withdrawing U.S. troops. The commission is expected to propose withdrawing about 70,000 combat troops by 2008.

Gates, who dismissed any timetable, told senators that any withdrawal of troops will depend on "conditions on the ground."

A timetable, he said, would tell insurgents "how long they have to wait until we're gone." There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

• Engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran. Gates said he would support such a move.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday it would be a good idea for Iraq to work with its neighbors. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also said he'd be receptive to a conference with Iran and Syria.

•Increasing U.S. troops. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, talked to Gates about whether there have been enough troops in Iraq. Gates said he would travel to Iraq to speak with commanders about troop levels.

Gates' nomination now goes to the full Senate for a vote, which could be held as early as today.

A Study In Comity (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Whatever the final impact of the Iraq Study Group report being issued today, for the 10 commission members this was an exhilarating experience, a demonstration of genuine bipartisanship that they hope will serve as an example to the broader political world.

"It was a very wonderful experience," former Republican senator Al Simpson of Wyoming told me last weekend. "We very quickly stopped considering ourselves as Republicans and Democrats, but as Americans trying to deal with a most urgent problem."

The nine men and one woman serving on the commission -- five from each party -- represented a wide range of political backgrounds and philosophical views. Several had been on opposing sides in past presidential campaigns.

But as commission member Vernon Jordan, the Democratic lawyer, noted, they were also "professionals" -- veterans of public service. Jordan has served on presidential commissions of one sort or another since 1965, and said, "This process has been a lesson in civility."

Leon Panetta, a former Democratic congressman and Clinton White House chief of staff, said the high average age of the 10 commission members contributed to its success. "This is a different generation of policymakers," said Panetta, who at 68 was one of the youngest members. "These are people who have very different views but are comfortable trying to understand each other and coming together to solve a terrible issue facing the country."

The analogy suggested by Simpson and Panetta, both veterans of Capitol Hill, and endorsed by Jordan, is that the commission functioned like a successful House-Senate conference committee. Members fought to include (or exclude) points that were especially important to them, "but in the end," as Jordan noted, "you have to have the votes to pass it."

"We went over the recommendations word by word until everyone was satisfied," Simpson said. "No one was trying to sneak anything in, and no one was laying traps. It was a very powerful experience."

Despite all the goodwill, several of the members recounted that toward the end of their deliberations, one commissioner -- not someone who had served in Congress, they noted -- said he would not sign the report if one part was not removed.

James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, glanced at his co-chairman, former Democratic representative Lee Hamilton, and calmly said to the dissenter, "Okay, don't."

A little later, others recalled, the dissenting member asked to return to the disputed passage and, in short order, agreed to slightly modified language.

"No one wanted to see us embarrassed by being unable to come to consensus," Simpson said.

Panetta observed that while most of the commission members had had some dealings with each other in their previous positions, they really bonded during their inspection trip to Baghdad earlier this year. "Fifteen hours on the plane together and three days in a tough place -- that was a human experience where we shared a lot and really got to know each other," he said.

When I asked the commission members whether they thought their experience of coming to agreement could serve as an example to others, the answers were emphatic.

"Hopefully," Jordan said, "the House and Senate and both political parties will be instructed by our process. In the rollout, we're going to try to provide that example. I'll be going around with Ed Meese," the former Republican attorney general, "and there will be other bipartisan pairs, led by Baker and Hamilton."

When I put the question to Panetta, he said, "Our forefathers intended that a process like this work for people elected to office -- the president and members of Congress in both the House and Senate. They believed they would come from different places but ultimately find consensus -- that was the Miracle of Philadelphia," the compromise that produced the Constitution.

"What's unusual now is their contracting out to people like us a job that elected officials are supposed to do -- finding consensus on difficult issues. I hope this will be a lesson to them; otherwise, we're in for continued trench warfare."

Panetta concluded: "This is an opportunity to look at the realities we're confronting in Iraq. For too long, both sides have been trapped by their sound bites. I hope they realize that if they're going to govern this country, they have to work together."

Simpson was even more expansive. "This could be an example, not only of how to handle Iraq, but it could apply to immigration, Social Security and all those other things that have been hung up for so long. That's what this last election said: Get serious and get your work done."

I hope Washington is listening.

Lee H. Hamilton, A Compromiser Who Operates Above The Partisan Fray (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The choice before the Sept. 11 commission in late 2003 was whether to subpoena the Pentagon to turn over classified documents, and four of the panel's five Democrats were eager to do so.

The dissenter was the commission's vice chairman, Lee H. Hamilton, a retired Democratic House member from Indiana, who had come to be trusted by the Bush administration as an honest broker. He told the other Democrats that he wanted to give Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, an old friend from Congress, time to cooperate.

Mr. Hamilton's disdain for partisan battle, often to the annoyance of fellow Democrats, and his willingness to work toward compromise on national security policy, are likely to be on display again on Wednesday with the release of the findings of the Iraq Study Group, the independent panel established by Congress to rethink American policy in Iraq.

Panel members say the co-chairmen, Mr. Hamilton and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican, have formed a close partnership that has allowed the group's five Democrats and five Republicans to transcend what might have been bitter partisan differences over the conduct of the war. The group's report is unanimous.

"At a time when foreign policy issues are part of the partisan trench warfare of Washington, there aren't many people who can rise above it, but Lee is one of them," said Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic member of the Iraq group.

He said Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Baker had a "strong relationship," in part because "they are both cut from the same cloth — they're pragmatists who are willing to face realities and not get trapped in political posturing." They both practiced the "lost art" of negotiation, he said.

A Republican on the panel, Alan K. Simpson, a former senator from Wyoming, said Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Baker developed a "remarkable symbiosis — they trusted each other, they respected each other." He said their leadership was a welcome reminder of a time when Democrats and Republicans typically reached across the aisle to find consensus on foreign policy.

Mr. Hamilton has said little in public about the deliberations of the panel but said recently that the successes of the Sept. 11 commission resulted from an effort to "respect one another as individuals — I didn't see my Republican friends with a big R on their head." He added: "We talked, and we talked, and we talked. And if you know a way to build a consensus without talking to one another, let me know."

With his assignments on the Sept. 11 commission and the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Hamilton, 75, has had nearly the public recognition he enjoyed during 34 years in the House, where he was a leading Democratic voice on foreign policy.

On the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Hamilton is demonstrating, as he did in Congress, that he is not in lock-step with Democratic leaders, who have mostly recommended a sharper reversal of American policy than the group will propose.

While never criticizing him in public, Democrats on the Sept. 11 commission and Congressional leaders were often at odds with Mr. Hamilton during that investigation, describing him as too trusting of the Bush administration and too patient in negotiations with the White House over access to classified documents.

At the same time, his willingness to hear out the White House won him the respect of the commission's Republicans, making them more willing to compromise when it came time to write a final report.

Similar complaints from Democrats about Mr. Hamilton's dealings with the White House were heard in the mid-1980s, when he led the House intelligence committee and appeared reluctant to follow up on news reports that the Reagan administration had sold weapons to Iran and diverted the proceeds to Nicaraguan rebels, called the contras.

The reports proved to be true, and Mr. Hamilton acknowledged later that he had been duped by senior Reagan administration officials. "I basically believed them," he said after the Iran-contra affair was exposed. "My attitude was, 'I don't have any hard evidence not to believe.' " He later led the House investigation of the scandal.

Lee Herbert Hamilton was born on April 20, 1931, in Daytona Beach, Fla. His father was a Methodist minister, and the future lawmaker's traditional, religious upbringing in Evansville, Ind. might help explain his reputation in Congress for fair play and his enthusiasm for hard work. He arrived at his desk in the House by six most mornings.

After graduation from DePauw University in 1952 and the Indiana University School of Law in 1956, he practiced law before entering Democratic politics. He was first elected to the House in 1964, swept into office in a traditionally Republican district as part of President Lyndon Johnson's landslide that year.

Mr. Hamilton ended up on what was then called the House Foreign Affairs Committee, now known as the Committee on International Relations.

He found he liked it and, when later asked to join other committees and to consider a Senate bid, Mr. Hamilton turned the offers down, preferring to remain in the House and cement his reputation as a spokesman for the Democratic Party on how the United States should deal with the rest of the world. He went on to become chairman of both the international relations and intelligence committees.

Mr. Hamilton said in a speech last spring that in his decades in Congress, he was often asked, "Why don't you focus on problems here at home?"

The answer, he said, was simple. Americans lived in a world, he said, in which a foreign-born terrorist "can endanger more Americans than a drug dealer in Brooklyn, where a terrorist strike can take the lives of 3,000 Americans in a few horrifying minutes." More and more, he said, the United States needed to "see our problems in the context of the world we live in." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Americans' Iraq Views Sink To New Lows, Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

A majority of Americans say the situation for U.S. troops in Iraq has grown worse and confidence in U.S. policies in Iraq is at a new low, a Harris poll shows.

Fifty-eight percent of U.S. adults say the situation for troops in Iraq is getting worse, according to the online survey from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20, 2006, compared with 45% in September and 36% in January. Nine percent said the situation for troops in Iraq is getting better, while 27% said there was "no real change."

The percentage who are confident U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful fell to 17% from 26% in January, while those who aren't confident increased to 63% from 55% at the first of the year.

In addition, more Americans have a negative view of President Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months: 71% said he is doing only fair or poor, compared with 26% who think he is doing a pretty good or excellent job. In September, 64% had a negative view of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 32% rated him positively.

When asked if taking military action against Iraq was the right or wrong thing to do, 36% said it was the right thing and 46% said it was the wrong thing.

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Nov. 13-20, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,429 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

House Democrats May Attach Conditions To Iraq Funding (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - On the eve of the Iraq Study Group's long-awaited recommendations for how to exit Iraq, congressional Democrats were eyeing a different document as leverage for change: President Bush's anticipated request for more money to keep fighting.

House Democratic leaders, who will take control in January, said Tuesday they are considering attaching a series of conditions to the estimated $160 billion supplemental war funding request for Iraq and Afghanistan that President Bush is expected to send them early next year.

They wouldn't specify what their conditions would be, including whether they might attach a troop-withdrawal timeline, as many Democratic lawmakers want to do.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said the supplemental funding request "is going to be the turning point" for the direction of the war. "Those dollars are going to be treated differently," he said.

"There may well be attached to those $160 billion various parameters that the Congress expects to be met," said Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

The Study Group's recommendations, to be formally released Wednesday after weeks of leaks, aren't expected to trigger much in the way of immediate results. But a big war-budget request that requires congressional approval could give Democrats a hand in forcing change.

If they use the funding request to pressure the administration, two political questions arise: Will Senate Democrats have the will or the power to act as boldly as House Democrats? And how far can Democrats push without being accused of cutting off funds for troops fighting on the ground?

In an interview last week, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., showed little appetite for holding up the supplemental budget request. "We'll see if there's any fluff in it and make sure there's no pet projects," he said. "But if it's legitimate I think we'll have to go along with it."

"We will not cut off funding for the troops," Pelosi said Tuesday, but she added: "The days of rubber-stamping any request by this administration are over."

She underscored that her ally, Rep. Jack Murtha, D-Pa., incoming chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a strong advocate for troop redeployment, would be heavily involved in setting Democratic strategy for the war budget request.

Thomas Donnelly, a defense policy expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right think tank, said that Democrats aren't likely to play their new power to the hilt, but they will have room for pressure.

"They could say, `We're not going to pay the bills for a force larger than X size,' or `You can't have this money unless you start withdrawing troops from Iraq.' (But) I think they haven't got the votes or the nerve."

Instead, Donnelly said, Democrats could opt for less controversial steps.

"You start demanding a lot of reports. Or you force the president to certify that things are getting better in Iraq. You can refuse to fund certain White House operations. Or they could say `I'm going to cut missile defense funding to pay for war costs, or other executive branch operations.'

"This is how it works when you have a political division between the legislative branch and the executive branch," Donnelly said. "Obviously in a wartime situation this game of chicken is conducted at a much higher level."

Top Democrats Rebuff Calls To Cut Off War Funds (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Top Democrats in Congress are ignoring calls from within their caucus to eliminate funding for troops in Iraq, a strategy some say is necessary to end U.S. involvement in the war.

"There is only one way in which the United States will withdraw from Iraq prior to the end of President Bush's term," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat. "Congress must vote to cut off funds."

Democratic leaders flatly rejected the idea yesterday, insisting they will move to "change the course" of the war but will continue to appropriate money to support the troops fighting in Iraq. The Democrats won back the House and Senate leadership in large part with staunch opposition to the Iraq war, but many worry that cutting off funding would seem unpatriotic.

"My only real comment is you have to support the troops," incoming House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton said about the Kucinich proposal. The Missouri Democrat initially supported the war but now wants gradual troop withdrawal.

Mr. Kucinich is trying to convince his colleagues that resolutions to withdraw troops have no legal effect as long as the president receives appropriations to continue the war. He said Congress must "force a new direction" in Iraq.

"Even a substantial reduction of funds could leave open the door for a legal claim that Congress still intends to keep troops in Iraq," said Mr. Kucinich, a Democratic presidential contender in 2004.

Several members of the Out of Iraq Caucus support a less drastic measure to end war funding.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, said his plan would send "a signal that our occupation has to end." It would cut off most funding but leave money for the "safe and orderly" withdrawal of troops, economic recovery and international peacekeeping.

Mr. McGovern's proposal has 18 co-sponsors. Mr. Kucinich's plan, which has not surfaced in the form of a bill, has received no endorsement.

Party leaders instead favor setting conditions on appropriations.

"As long as our troops are in harm's way, Democrats will be there to support them," said House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California. "We will not cut off funding for the troops."

Democrats downplayed intraparty divisions. "No matter how you look at it, there is a consensus this war needs to end," Mr. McGovern said.

Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, dismissed the Kucinich plan as "silly," but one Republican said it is the most genuine proposal he has heard from a war opponent.

"I completely disagree with him, but he is the only honest voice of liberalism in the House," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina.

Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the incoming chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, told fellow Democrats that he will now allow an emergency request from the White House for billions of dollars in supplemental appropriations and will insist that the president lay out exact spending plans for completing the mission in Iraq.

Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said conditions "may well be attached" to the next such bill, expected to total $160 billion.

Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats will insist on oversight, which includes investigations into missing defense appropriations and subcontractors such as Halliburton Co.

Some anti-war groups think that cutting off funding would be a quick way to end the conflict. Democrats took such action in 1974 during the Vietnam War. When a $70 billion spending measure was up for a vote in September, only 20 House Democrats opposed it. It received unanimous support in the Senate.

War Cost Has Hidden Tolls (MH)

By Kevin G. Hall And Dave Montgomery

The Miami Herald, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - During a recent visit to a military family center at Fort Hood in Texas, Joyce Raezer was dismayed to find a sign in a stall in the ladies' room. It asked women to clean up because janitorial service had been cut back.

"What message does that send to a family member when they walk into a family center?" asked Raezer, the director of government relations for the National Military Families Association.

At Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri, swimming pools closed a month early this fall, and shuttle vans were sharply curtailed in an effort to trim spending. At Fort Sam Houston in Texas, unpaid utility bills exceeded $4 million, and the base reduced mail delivery to cut costs.

Belt-tightening at the bases is only the beginning. As the United States spends about $8 billion a month in Iraq, the military is being forced to cut costs in ways big and small.

Soldiers preparing to ship to Iraq don't have enough equipment to train on because it's been left in Iraq, where it's most needed. Thousands of tanks and other vehicles sit at repair depots waiting to be fixed because funds are short.

At the Red River Army Depot in Texas, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reported in October that at least 6,200 Humvees, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, trucks and ambulances were awaiting repair because of insufficient funds.

There's a virtual graveyard of tanks and fighting vehicles at the Anniston Army Depot in Alabama. Depot spokeswoman Joan Gustafson said that the depot expects to repair 1,885 tanks and other armored vehicles during the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1. That's up from the 1,169 and 1,035 vehicles repaired in the prior two fiscal years.

Some of the depot's private-sector contractors haven't been able to supply enough parts in time to make all the repairs, she said. The depot is trying to reduce the time it takes to get repair and replacement parts from 120 days to 60 days.

Tanks and helicopters are one thing; the toll on America's warriors and their families is another.

More than 73,000 soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan have been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and with problems such as drug abuse and depression. That's enough people to fill a typical NFL stadium.

Internet blogs written by soldiers or their wives tell of suicide attempts by soldiers haunted by the horror of combat, civilian careers of reservists who've been harmed by deployment and redeployment, and marriages broken by distance and the trauma of war.

"Back-to-back war deployments has changed both of us -- to where it's as if a marriage does not exist anymore," wrote a woman calling herself Blackhawk wife on an Iraq war vets Web site. ``We just go through the daily steps of life and raising children as best we can."

A mother of a returning soldier posted this: "Since he has been back, he has had 3 DUIs, wrecked his truck, attempted suicide, been diagnosed with PTSD" and is being kicked out of the Army.

The length of the war in Iraq has strained all aspects of the armed forces, said Dov Zakheim, who was the Pentagon's chief financial officer from 2001 to 2004.

"In 2003, I don't think anybody predicted it would go as long as World War II and the wear and tear on equipment would be as intense," said Zakheim, now a vice president for global strategy consultant Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. ``When I left the department, we were spending less than $4 billion a month on Iraq. Now it's pretty much doubled."

The length of the Iraq war surpassed that of World War II last month. The costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the global fight against terrorism are expected to surpass the $536 billion in inflation-adjusted costs of the Vietnam War by spring. That's more than 10 times the Bush administration's $50 billion prewar estimate.

Through the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, Congress authorized about $436 billion in war spending, according to the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress.

In October, President Bush signed legislation that tacked on $70 billion, bringing the total to more than $506 billion. That number will rise again once Congress appropriates Iraq stabilization and reconstruction funding.

The armed services, seeking to replace aging equipment and address quality-of-life issues for military families, are believed to be seeking $100 billion to $160 billion in a supplemental spending bill for spring.

If that's approved, war funding -- three-quarters of it going to Iraq-related operations -- would reach nearly $700 billion. If U.S. troops remain in Iraq through 2010, it will approach $1 trillion.

In January, Nobel Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz released a study that said the true costs of the Iraq war could exceed $1 trillion and perhaps reach $2 trillion.

"When I saw that figure, I thought it was an exaggeration. I no longer think it's an exaggeration," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a decorated Vietnam veteran who's criticized how the war has been fought and funded.

The Stiglitz report focused on hard-to-measure things such as lifetime care for injured soldiers and the economic effect of higher oil prices as a result of the war. But his final numbers for unofficial costs are on pace to be matched by the official costs -- which don't add the intangibles.

"We were very conservative on the numbers, and the numbers have repeatedly come in higher than we estimated," said Stiglitz, a former chief economist of the World Bank, in a telephone interview from Spain. "Those costs continue to pile up: the healthcare costs, the disability costs, the replacement costs -- and there's obviously an open question now if we ever reconstruct" Iraq.

Here's a look at some of the costs:

• RESET

Until recently, little of the authorized war funding went toward reset, the military term for replacing fighting vehicles, tanks, helicopters and other equipment that are wearing out from heavy use.

"We have a backlog of maintenance work to reset, fix, retool all our equipment, and at the same time we have to take care of our civilian soldiers," said Rep. Solomon Ortiz, D-Texas, who in January will become chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on readiness. ``Many of the units in the United States Reserve or National Guard do not have any equipment because their equipment stayed in Iraq . . . Humvees, weapons, trucks, tanks. You name it, they need it."

Gary Schmitt, a defense expert for the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, said the problem existed before 2001. "The war has obviously made that much worse," he said. "People would be surprised, but the reality is the increases in defense spending have been personnel and operational," not for upgrading or modernizing the armed forces.

The October bridge funding, which bridges the gap that occurs when the fiscal year begins before funds have been appropriated, included $24 billion for reset costs across the armed services. The Army's deputy chief of staff, Lt. Gen. David Melcher, told Congress in March that he expected reset costs of at least $12 billion a year while troops are in Iraq and for two years after withdrawal. In the 2006 fiscal year, the Marine Corps' reset request was three times bigger than its regular procurement budget.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimated a $60 billion reset price tag through 2016, assuming a reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq by 2010.

'As long as the current level of intensity is maintained in Iraq operations, there's not going to be enough money to meet all the services' needs," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a military think tank. ``We're really burning up money over there at a furious pace."

Policymakers are stymied in their efforts to predict war costs, partly because the Department of Defense provides only vague estimates of future costs.

"DOD has provided little information about overall requirements to replace worn equipment or to upgrade capabilities, or how war requirements relate to ongoing peacetime investment," Amy Belasco, a defense budget analyst for the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, said in a September report.

As the chief economist on President Bush's Council of Economic Advisors in 2002 and director of the CBO from 2002 until last year, Douglas Holtz-Eakin wrestled with that same problem. "It was hard to get actual cost data," he said.

• HEALTH

Between Oct. 1, 2001, and June 30, 2006, 35 percent of returning active-duty soldiers and 31 percent of Army reservists and National Guardsmen sought medical care from Veterans Affairs health centers. That figure from the Veterans Health Administration doesn't include treatment at VA hospitals.

In that period, more than 33,000 returning troops received preliminary diagnoses of post-traumatic stress disorder. Others experienced depression and drug abuse.

"The wear and tear on soldiers and the wear and tear on their families have been immense," said John Grady, a spokesman for the Association of the United States Army, a nonprofit group that lobbies on behalf of active and retired soldiers.

Problems are getting corrected, he said, ``but they're getting corrected very slowly because the money is very slow in arriving."

In the first Gulf war, in which 700,000 U.S. soldiers were involved, 44 percent filed for some sort of disability compensation.

More than 1.4 million U.S. soldiers have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since late 2001, and about 26 percent have filed disability claims, according to raw data provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. That percentage could grow as soldiers leave the armed forces.

"I see the whole thing as a mini-Medicare, another huge entitlement program which is going to be sprawling out over the course of our lifetimes and our children's lifetimes," said Linda Bilmes, a Harvard University public finance professor and co-author of the Stiglitz study. ``The big costs come when they get back . . . they stand a good chance of being really underfunded and not taken care of properly."

Veterans groups worry that they'll be forced to compete with other government programs for funds. Not enough attention is being given to the future mental health and medical needs of Iraq and Afghanistan war vets, they say, especially given how those wars differ from previous ones.

"First, they are deployed to war longer. Second, they are being deployed to the war zone two or three times. The combat there is more intense than the Gulf War for nearly everyone deployed," said Paul Sullivan, a Desert Storm veteran and director of programs for Veterans for America. ``There are no rear-area jobs. Everyone is on the front lines . . . cooks and clerks and truck drivers . . . the entire country is a war zone."

• FUTURE READINESS

Military commanders complain that they've been forced to fight a war on the cheap, despite its large costs. That's because military spending totals about 4 percent of the broader economy, a historically low level. Some critics, including Murtha, want to see more funds dedicated to the military's long-term needs.

"As the ships get older, the airplanes get older, we won't have the deterrent capability that we need," Murtha said.

Big-ticket U.S. military programs have been delayed since the 1990s, said Schmitt at the American Enterprise Institute. There are now so many unfunded replacements and upgrades scheduled in the years ahead that the nation faces a "procurement bow wave" that could swamp the federal budget.

Zakheim, the Pentagon's former CFO, said diverting money from acquisition programs is akin to ``eating our seed corn for the future."

Iraqi Premier Moves To Plan Regional Talks (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Helene Cooper

BAGHDAD, Dec. 5 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Tuesday that he would send envoys to neighboring countries to plan a conference on Iraq, adding momentum to calls for a regional approach to quell the increasingly anarchic war here.

Such a proposal is already gaining attention in the United States, where the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to recommend Wednesday that the American government should approach Iran and Syria to seek their aid in ending the war. Last week, Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, suggested convening an international conference.

Publicly, the White House has resisted the idea of widening its own diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria, saying that even opening a regular dialogue would be a concession to two governments suspected of fomenting violence in Iraq. But senior Bush administration officials now say they are working out ways to talk to those countries without the White House appearing to have conceded on its principle of giving them the diplomatic cold shoulder.

A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States approved of Mr. Maliki's proposed conference.

"It's absolutely consistent with what the Iraqis have said, that they have the reins on their own diplomacy and how they will relate to their neighbors, and how their neighbors will relate to them," he said.

American diplomats say they could use an international conference on Iraq, possibly the one called for by Mr. Maliki or a resurrection of a forum held in Egypt in 2004, to engage in talks with Iran and Syria.

The talk of a regional conference came as a spokesman for the American military command, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said the Iraqis would take operational control of all Iraqi Army divisions by early summer, and responsibility for security in all 18 provinces by next fall.

He said the timetable resulted from discussions last week in Jordan between President Bush and Mr. Maliki, who has been pressing the White House for an accelerated transfer of authority. So far, the American command has given the Iraqis operational control of 3 of the 10 Iraqi Army divisions and security oversight in two provinces.

Mr. Maliki's statement on an international meeting was the first time the prime minister had indicated that he wanted a wider regional discussion. It contradicted the stand taken by Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, as well as that of a powerful Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush in Washington on Monday. Both rejected a conference, saying that Iraq would find solutions through internal deliberations.

Mr. Maliki told reporters that a conference should held in Iraq, and that he was seeking support — not interference — from his neighbors.

"We will send envoys to neighboring countries to exchange opinions on matters and to ask the governments of these countries to help reinforce security and stability in Iraq," Mr. Maliki said. "After settling the political climate, we will call for a convening of only those countries that want to ensure the security and stability of Iraq."

Though Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia have long been accused of aiding militants in Iraq, and the country's Shiite revival has already sent ripples across other Arab nations, most noticeably Lebanon, rulers around the Middle East have been expressing even more concerns about cross-border destabilization. King Abdullah II of Jordan warned late last month, for example, that the Middle East could be shaken by civil wars in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories by early next year.

Representatives from the region have met before to discuss Iraq, most recently in September, when foreign ministers from predominantly Sunni Arab countries converged in Cairo. The conference proposed by Mr. Maliki could take place at a higher level and would presumably be more wide ranging, to possibly include Turkey and Iran. Syria reopened its embassy in Baghdad last month after a hiatus of more than two decades.

One of the first international conferences on Iraq was held in 2004 at the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Sharm el Sheik. The conference was attended by the United Nations and the Arab League, as well as Saudi Arabia, Jordan, the United States, Britain, France, Canada, Japan, Iran and Syria.

American officials said the format of that conference might be a good vehicle for indirect talks with Syria and Iran. Administration officials have been working with the United Nations and the Iraqi government to set up the next meeting of the conference, which is sometimes called the Iraq Compact Group and other times called the International Compact on Iraq.

The parties had planned to meet this week in Saudi Arabia, but postponed those plans when Mr. Maliki asked for more time to reach out to Iraq's neighbors, according to senior Bush administration officials.

The question is whether the administration can make the next, yet-unscheduled meeting of the conference substitute for the direct talks with Iran and Syria that many politicians are calling for. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputies have been pointing recently to the forum begun in 2004 as a sign that America and Iran have a channel available to talk whenever they want.

"We already have a transparent process we can use to talk to Iran," Mr. McCormack said. "You know, we have this international forum."

General Caldwell's discussion at a news conference of the handover of military authority to the Iraqis next year dovetailed with the other main recommendation expected from the Iraq Study Group's report on Wednesday — that the Americans should steadily reduce the number of combat units in Iraq while increasing the size and number of American training teams embedded with Iraqi units.

Senior American commanders in Iraq say that they doubt that many of the Iraqi units will be capable of fighting the Sunni-led insurgency on their own, even after the Iraqi government gets full operational command of the military, but they say that the influx of advisers should strengthen the Iraqi forces. The Iraqis would then be able to take over most of the fighting by the end of 2007, the commanders say.

The immense security challenge facing the Iraqi and American forces was highlighted Tuesday by a series of particularly brutal attacks across Baghdad that resulted in at least 54 Iraqis killed and scores wounded.

In the deadliest assault, gunmen set off a bomb to stop a bus carrying workers for a government organization that maintains Shiite mosques, then opened fire on the passengers, killing at least 15 people and wounding nine, an Interior Ministry official said. In the Bayaa neighborhood, a triple car bombing near a gas station killed at least 14 people and wounded 25, a hospital official said.

The American military said Tuesday that a soldier had been killed and four were wounded by a guerrilla ambush in northeastern Baghdad on Monday, and that a soldier was killed and another wounded by a roadside bomb in Diyala Province on Monday.

In pushing for a regional conference, Mr. Maliki appeared to be showing more flexibility in looking for solutions to the violence than either Mr. Talabani, the Iraqi president, or Mr. Hakim, the head of the main Shiite political bloc and a rival of Mr. Maliki's.

Over the weekend, Mr. Talabani and Mr. Hakim had reacted with disdain to Mr. Annan's suggestion of an international conference on Iraq.

Mr. Hakim has very close ties to Iran, ruled by Shiite Persians, and has chafed at the prospect that Sunni Arab countries in the region could get more involved in Iraq. Like many Kurds, Mr. Talabani fears interference in Iraqi affairs by Turkey, which has threatened to invade the autonomous region of Iraqi Kurdistan if the Kurds try to move toward independence or take control of the oil city of Kirkuk.

Mr. Maliki is a conservative Shiite, but is believed to be less closely allied to Iran than Mr. Hakim.

The different positions staked out by the two Shiite politicians suggested that the White House might not have an easy time getting Mr. Hakim to lend full political support to Mr. Maliki, if that had been one of President Bush's goals in inviting Mr. Hakim to the White House.

In a classified memo written last month, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, suggested that the Americans could build a new political base for Mr. Maliki by urging Sunni Arab leaders and Shiite politicians, especially Mr. Hakim, to back Mr. Maliki. That would then in theory allow Mr. Maliki to break with Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who is Mr. Maliki's main political backer.

For months, American officials have been urging Mr. Maliki to crack down on Mr. Sadr's formidable militia, the Mahdi Army, which has been responsible for waves of reprisal killings of Sunni Arabs. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Maliki Seeks Regional Meeting On Iraq Security (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 5 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called Tuesday for a regional conference on stabilizing his country but rejected a proposal from U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan that it take place outside Iraq.

"After preparing the proper political atmosphere, we will call for holding a conference in which all those countries that are interested in the security and stability of Iraq will participate," Maliki said in a televised speech in Baghdad.

He said he would send envoys to neighboring countries, which he did not name. He also did not explain what a proper political atmosphere would be. An aide close to Maliki said the prime minister wants the conference to take place in Iraq under the Iraqi government's terms.

In an earlier statement e-mailed to reporters, Maliki rebuked Annan for suggesting that Iraq was not the right venue. "We consider his invitation to hold an international conference about Iraq as just another way to confiscate the will of Iraqis and their achievements that established democracy, a national unity government and the elected Parliament," he said in the statement.

Under pressure from the Bush administration to rein in violence, Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, said Iraqi leaders would meet in mid-December to reconcile feuding factions and "strengthen the Iraqi national unity."

His comments came a day before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is set to release a report in Washington recommending ways to reduce the U.S. military presence in Iraq and end sectarian violence. The report is expected to include a recommendation that Iraq and the United States engage in talks with Iran and Syria, which border Iraq. Iraq recently resumed diplomatic relations with Syria after more than two decades of severed ties.

But the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about what officials believe to be Iran's support for Shiite militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency. High-ranking Iraqi leaders also have reservations about involving the two neighbors.

"What are other countries going to do?" Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish Coalition member of Iraq's parliament, asked after Maliki's speech. "The problem is between Iraqis now."

Late Tuesday, Maliki released a statement urging university professors and students to ignore "the desperate attempts" of a Sunni insurgent group to keep them from class. The group had sent e-mails to students and posted signs at schools and mosques saying students should stay away while it cleanses the campuses of Shiite death squads.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said at a Baghdad news conference that the military expects the country to be under complete control of Iraqi forces by the middle of 2007, which he called "the year of transition."

"We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring, early summer," he said, echoing a timetable discussed by Bush and Maliki at their meeting last week in Jordan.

Nasar al-Rubaie, who leads the parliamentary bloc of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, said Tuesday that he had collected signatures from 115 of the 275 members of parliament calling on the government to draft a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces. The bloc suspended its participation in the government last week. The number of signatures could not be independently verified.

Dozens of civilians died in various shootings and car bombings across the country Tuesday.

The U.S. military reported that 14 Iraqi members of the "Society of Shia" were killed and four wounded when small-arms fire hit the bus carrying them in the Adhamiyah section of northern Baghdad Tuesday morning. A car bomb exploded after they died, a military statement said. Then a BMW was driven into the area and exploded as the injured were being taken to a hospital. The bomb caused no further injuries, the military said.

Three car bombs exploded near a fuel station, killing 16 people and wounding 25, in the southwestern Bayaa district of Baghdad, according to the Associated Press.

In central Baqubah, gunmen raided a house, killing two residents and wounding a third before setting the house on fire, according to an official with the Diyala Joint Coordination Center.

The U.S. military announced that three more soldiers died Monday. A soldier from the 1st Cavalry Division died from wounds suffered from an explosion near his vehicle in Diyala province. A second soldier was wounded in the blast. One soldier died when his vehicle rolled over north of Camp Anaconda in north-central Iraq. Another soldier was killed and five were wounded when insurgents attacked them as they were enforcing curfew restrictions in a northeastern neighborhood of Baghdad.

Baghdad Wants Control Of Talks With Neighbours (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Baghdad has been trying to take ownership of regional policy ahead of the Iraq Study Group report, fearing that changes in US policy will undermine the elected government.

Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, said on Tuesday he was sending envoys to neighbouring countries to improve security co-operation and that he would call for a regional conference.

Iraqi leaders have underlined in recent days their opposition to any proposal for an international conference and warned that they, rather than the US, should lead any direct engagement with Syria and Iran.

Direct US talks with Syria and Iran as part of a broader regional initiative is said to be among the policies that will be advocated today by the bipartisan group co-led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state.

While another core proposal may be a gradual redeployment of US combat troops, the Iraqi government has sought to focus the military debate on the need to accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi forces and on giving greater authority to Baghdad to command and control military operations.

"We have our own views," Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister, told the Financial Times. "We have concerns about an international conference because we're past that stage."

Iraq "should involve the neighbours instead of the US," he added. "The elected Iraqi government should take the lead and hold neighbours to account."

Both the Shia coalition that dominates government and the minority Kurds worry that broader regional involvement will bring new demands on how power should be shared in Iraq.

Sunni Arab states, which would have to be brought into any discussion, for example, are urging a larger political role for Iraq's Sunni community.

"We the Iraqis are not ready to allow neighbours to dictate the form of political system we have and how we should act," said Mr Zebari.

Iraqi officials fear that direct US engagement with Syria and Iran could embolden the two neighbours and enhance their regional standing, without necessarily bringing an end to their alleged support for violent sectarian groups.

To underline that the government should be the only party engaging with neighbours Mr Zebari recently invited Walid al-Muallem, his Syrian counterpart, to Baghdad, while Jalal Talabani, the president, held talks in Tehran.

Mr Zebari said he was pushing for a February gathering in Baghdad of foreign ministers from neighbouring countries. Such meetings take place periodically but diplomats say that they have proved no more than a talking shop.

Although much work still needs to be done with neighbours, said Mr Zebari, the dramatic escalation in sectarian violence in recent months has alarmed the whole region. "Everyone is starting to understand that what's going on has reached a certain level that it could be out of everybody's control and could spill over," said Mr Zebari.

Al-Maliki To Call For Regional Meeting (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, December 6, 2006

Iraq's prime minister reversed course Tuesday and said his envoys will talk with Iraq's neighbors about the possibility of a regional conference on quelling the violence here, despite opposition to the plan by some key political allies.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki made the announcement as more than 100 people were killed or found dead in and around Baghdad, underscoring the urgency of finding a solution to the bloodshed.

The U.S. military said three more American troops had died Monday — two as a result of insurgent attacks and one in a traffic accident.

Despite a string of ambushes, mortar attacks and bombings Tuesday, the chief U.S. military spokesman told reporters that all of Iraq would be under Baghdad's control by the fall of 2007, with U.S. soldiers and Marines and other coalition forces playing a supporting role.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, told reporters that his envoys would talk with other governments in the region, most of them Sunni-dominated, about how they might help establish security and stability in Iraq.

"After the political climate is cleared, we will call for the convening of a regional conference in which these countries that are keen on the stability and security of Iraq will participate," al-Maliki said.

The prime minister's statement fell short of an unconditional call for a conference. Previously, Iraqi leaders have resisted suggestions they include outsiders in efforts to settle their bitter internal divisions.

In recent days, President Jalal Talabani and a leading Shiite politician, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, have rejected U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's proposal for a regional peace conference. Annan said such a gathering could be useful if the parties met outside Iraq.

Al-Maliki, though, said any conference should take place in Iraq. Any proposals to emerge, he added, should conform to "what the national unity government wants."

The Bush administration welcomed the announcement. "It's a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

At al-Maliki's press conference in Baghdad, the Iraqi leader said a frequently delayed national reconciliation conference would convene this month. He also said he planned to reshuffle his six-month-old Cabinet, to increase its "effectiveness and strength," but offered no further details.

Al-Maliki's hedged endorsement of a regional peace conference came one day before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, is to release recommendations on changing U.S. strategy in Iraq.

The group is expected to suggest that Iraq's neighbors, including longtime U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria, be invited to help in the search for an end to the violence. Al-Maliki did not say whether his envoys would visit those countries.

Al-Maliki was careful not to commit himself unequivocally to a regional conference, perhaps due to opposition to the proposal among his allies.

But the prime minister may feel he cannot reject such a call outright. Instead, his conditions appeared aimed at limiting the scope of the conference, raising the possibility it may not take place soon.

Arab countries like Egypt generally favor such a conference, in part because they increasingly fear the rise of Shiite power in Iraq and the possible growing influence of predominantly Shiite Iran.

But Iraq's Shiites, who dominate the government, fear Sunni-dominated countries will pressure Baghdad to make concessions to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, which launched the insurgency against the U.S.-led coalition three years ago.

At any regional peace conference, both Iran and Syria would most likely try to increase their influence in Iraq.

The U.S. maintains about 140,000 troops in Iraq and is considering changing its strategic course in the country.

Robert Gates, the White House choice to be the next defense secretary, conceded during his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq. If the country is not stabilized in the next year or two, he warned, it could lead to a "regional conflagration."

He later said he believes the U.S. is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters that efforts to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqi military were moving forward. He predicted the entire country would be under the control of Iraqi police and military by the fall of next year.

"We would expect to see the entire country having reached provincial Iraqi control by early fall of next year," Caldwell said. "We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring, early summer."

The planned transfer of authority, he said, was part of an accelerated timetable discussed by President Bush and al-Maliki last week in Jordan.

Meanwhile, violence persisted unabated.

Suspected Sunni extremists killed 15 Shiite government workers in an attack on their minibus in Baghdad, the government said. Gunmen halted the vehicle and executed several passengers, who were on their way to work at the Shiite Endowment, a government ministry that acts as caretaker for Shiite mosques.

Fifteen other people were killed near a gasoline station when two car bombs exploded in the capital, police said. And at least 15 died in shootings, bombings and a mortar attack in and around Baghdad. Four bodies were pulled from the Tigris River south of the capital.

Police discovered the tortured bodies of 60 people who had been bound, blindfolded, then shot and left in Baghdad over the past 24 hours, Lt. Mohammed Khayoun said.

An American soldier was killed Monday when attackers fired on a U.S. patrol in northeastern Baghdad, the U.S. command said. Also Monday, a soldier died of wounds suffered in a blast in Diyala province and another soldier died in a traffic accident.

The deaths raised to at least 2,905 the number of members of the U.S. military who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Looking To Themselves For Solutions (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — While Washington waits attentively for the release today of a report calling for new approaches to the Iraq war, leaders in Baghdad have pressed ahead with their own initiatives, some of which differ sharply from Bush administration thinking.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki reaffirmed Tuesday his intention to work with Iran and Syria to stem support for Shiite Muslim militias and Sunni Arab insurgents, an idea likely to be part of today's recommendations from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.).

President Bush has been reluctant to approach either Iran or Syria for assistance.

Other Iraqi proposals dovetail with Bush administration priorities and the U.S. panel's expected recommendations. Maliki's Shiite-led government has pressed for the accelerated training of Iraqi armed forces to quicken the transfer of security responsibilities. And the prime minister has promised to put more effective leaders in his Cabinet, reconcile with Sunnis and dismantle militia death squads blamed for nightly killings.

Few Iraqi politicians have put much stock in the deliberations of the Iraq Study Group or other reviews taking place in Washington.

Most appear preoccupied with gaining the upper hand for a particular sect or ethnicity in the byzantine negotiations that will shape Maliki's promised Cabinet reshuffle. Others say they will reject any Washington proposals on principle.

"We are now under occupation; whatever the occupation produces is considered illegitimate," said Fatah Sheik, an ally of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose followers have repeatedly fought U.S. forces and account for one of the two largest Shiite factions in parliament.

There is also scant evidence that Iraq's fractured government will set aside its internal differences long enough to implement any of its proposed initiatives.

Maliki's decision Tuesday to send envoys to Iraq's neighbors to pave the way for a regional conference has the potential to further polarize the debate.

While his government courts Iran and Syria, representatives of the disaffected Sunni minority that dominated Iraq under former leader Saddam Hussein have made overtures to Sunni governments in Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt.

Kurdish leaders, for their part, worry that such moves will lead to more foreign interference by hostile neighbors. They prefer to look within Iraq for solutions.

Maliki has made reconciliation with Sunnis leading Iraq's deadly insurgency a central tenet of his administration, promising more meetings aimed at drawing opponents into the political process.

But the prime minister has not specified with whom he plans to negotiate. Not anyone who has killed Iraqis, his government said, and not anyone who has killed Americans.

"Well, if it is an armed resistance, they have to kill somebody," said Wamidh Nadhmi, a Baghdad political analyst.

Many promises have been made, including a softening of the de-Baathification policy that forced thousands of Hussein-era functionaries out of jobs and the disarming of Shiite militias that have targeted Sunnis. But there has been little movement on these initiatives.

The few Sunni politicians who agreed to participate in Maliki's unity government say they are under increasing pressure to pull out.

Maliki, frustrated by accusations that he isn't doing enough to stop the bloodshed, has pressed hard in recent weeks for a quick U.S. transfer of security control to Iraqi forces.

"Our hands are in cuffs," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a politician with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Sadr movement's main Shiite rival.

"We can't do anything unless we have the permission" of U.S.-led forces.

Given a free hand, Maliki said, he could rein in the violence in six months.

Maliki's proposal is similar to those in Washington that call for rolling back U.S. combat units and ramping up training by assigning more American advisors to Iraqi units. But with only three out of 10 Iraqi army divisions under direct Iraqi control, there is a long way to go.

Other factions disagree about the capabilities of Iraqi security forces and their allegiance to the government. Shiite militiamen and Sunni insurgents have infiltrated Iraq's army and police, using them as cover to hunt and kill their rivals.

"The government is very weak, and therefore it is not feasible that it should have full control of security," said Sunni lawmaker Adnan Dulaimi, an opponent of the U.S. occupation who nonetheless recently called American troops for help when his house was attacked. "That the Interior Ministry and the Defense Ministry are divided along sectarian lines [one run by a Shiite, the other a Sunni] is the best evidence that the government is not ready."

Deep differences of opinion extend to Maliki's governing coalition. Iraq's two largest Shiite factions, each backed by a private army implicated in the nationwide violence, disagree on a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals.

Sadr's representatives want U.S. forces out immediately. The cleric's movement protested last week's meeting between Maliki and Bush by suspending its participation in the government.

"Four years after the Americans occupied Iraq there is no excuse to stay here," said Nassar Rubaie, the leader of Sadr's legislative representatives.

"If the Americans leave Iraq today, Iraq will be secure tomorrow."

But most other Shiites acknowledge that Iraq's fledgling forces still need U.S. support and agree with American Democrats on a phased troop withdrawal.

"We need the United States to be with the Iraqi government as a partner, not a commander," Taqi said.

Shiites are also divided on proposals to split Iraq into semiautonomous regions based on sect and ethnicity.

Abdelaziz Hakim, whose Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq has a strong hold on local government in southern Iraq, is pushing for a vote on greater regional authority.

Sadr loyalists oppose weakening the central government.

Such divergent stances on solutions to the war, coupled with an embryonic Iraqi government that has failed to provide basic services or hold parliamentary meetings on a regular basis, threaten to derail any initiatives, whether they come from Washington or Baghdad.

Sunni politician Iyad Samarrai said the government suffered from two major deficiencies: the inability to reach consensus and the inability to carry out policies.

"Many Cabinet ministers are inexperienced and incapable of fulfilling their responsibilities," Samarrai said.

Maliki's plan to replace ineffective Cabinet members with technocrats has broad support — in principle — among the politicians ensconced in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone. But negotiations have featured the same jostling for influence that paralyzed previous attempts at reform. And there doesn't appear to be a sense of urgency for results.

"You have this government hidden in the Green Zone protected by Americans and isolated from people, and the streets are left to the terrorists," said Kurdish legislator Mahmoud Othman. "The citizens don't feel they have a government there to protect them."

A Role For Syria (WP)

By Kenneth H. Bacon

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

James Baker has never met Alia Al-Naradi, but they both have an interest in seeing the United States engage Syria on Iraq. For Baker, engagement is about stabilizing Iraq to allow the United States to exit gracefully. For Alia, it's about survival.

Alia is an Iraqi refugee who fled to Syria, a country that has absorbed more than 750,000 Iraqis since the beginning of the war. Syria's resources are now stretched thin, and without international help, it may not be able to accept vulnerable Iraqis much longer. Working with Syria through the United Nations to help Iraqi refugees could provide a humanitarian first step for greater engagement.

My organization, Refugees International, met Alia in Damascus shortly after she and her family fled to Syria in June. Shiite-dominated police had imprisoned her Sunni husband; roving militias fought in her ethnically mixed Baghdad neighborhood; gangs had been holding her nephew hostage for a week. Others waiting with her at the border crossing at Al Tanf said they fled after being kidnapped, tortured or raped, or having seen family members killed.

Syria is the last country in the Middle East to leave its borders open to Iraqi refugees. The United Nations estimates that 1.8 million Iraqis have sought refuge in the region, and Syria and Jordan host the largest concentration.

It can't maintain its open-door policy without international support. Refugees already strain social services. Yet, the international response to the Iraqi refugee crisis has been dismal. Despite numbers that rival the displacement in Darfur, there has been scant media attention and even less political concern. The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees is doing little.

An increase in resources for UNHCR could make a huge difference. As winter approaches, the need is growing for portable heaters, warm clothing and help in paying electric bills and warm clothing. Mental health services for traumatized Iraqis are equally needed. And legal and financial help to maintain their visa status would prevent deportations back to a precarious life in Iraq.

Working through the United Nations or directly, the United States has an opportunity to engage with Damascus to mitigate the suffering of Iraqi refugees and the growing burden on Syria. This would advance both Alia's interests and Washington's.

The Price Of Iran's Help (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

DUBAI -- On the eve of the Baker-Hamilton commission's report, a top Iranian official set a tough condition for his country's help in stabilizing Iraq, saying that Tehran isn't interested in such cooperation unless the Bush administration sets a timetable for withdrawing its troops.

Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, said in an interview that a U.S. plan for removing "occupation forces" from Iraq would be considered "a sign of a change in strategy." In that case, he said, "Iran would definitely extend the hand of assistance and would use its influence to help solve the problem."

The Iranian official made his comments after a speech yesterday to a conference here called the Arab Strategy Forum. His remarks were the clearest statement I've heard of how Iran views its role in the region following what he described as the failure of U.S. intervention in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. His tone was triumphalist: In his view, America is bogged down in Iraq and "in dire need of change," while a newly confident Iran is positioning itself as a dominant power for the region.

"When we face a strategic stalemate, we can break it only by changing the strategy itself," Larijani said in his speech. He explained that America's choice was to stick with a failing strategy of unilateralism, tinker with it to "retard the process" of defeat, or replace it altogether with a new strategy of "interdependence" that recognized Iran's primacy as a regional power. By embracing a new strategy, he said, the United States "would bring psychological calm to the region and help America to behave in a more rational way."

When I asked Larijani later at a news conference what Iran would regard as evidence that the Bush administration was indeed changing its strategy, he said, "The clearest sign would be the exit or evacuation of U.S. forces," adding: "Should there be a timetable presented, that would serve as a positive sign."

On the nuclear issue, Larijani said that a U.N. Security Council sanctions resolution reportedly drafted this week by Russia and France would not stop Iran's uranium-enrichment efforts. "I announce: This is not effective," he said.

After these public comments, Larijani talked one-on-one about the changes he thinks have been set in motion by the Republican Party's defeat in last month's congressional elections. He wouldn't talk in detail about the likely recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and ex-representative Lee Hamilton. But he indicated that if the Bush administration embraced a call for gradual withdrawal, Iran would agree to join discussions on Iraq and Afghanistan. Though he called repeatedly for a U.S. withdrawal plan, Larijani didn't explain how the resulting vacuum would be filled in a way that avoided all-out civil war.

Harvard professor Graham Allison, who had a private talk with Larijani following mine, said: "In discussing Iraq after U.S. withdrawal he didn't seem to have a credible idea of what comes next."

As for the idea of a regional peace conference involving Iraq's neighbors, Larijani told me he favored a smaller group of countries that are committed to the "new paradigm" in Iraq flowing from its democratic elections and constitution -- both of which enfranchised Iraq's Shiite majority. "We are against a tribal democracy," he said.

Larijani said President Bush's statement in an interview with me in September, in which Bush recognized Iran's status as an important nation in the region, was "the first sign of having any respect for the long history and cultural background of Iran." But Larijani said the administration needed to accompany such rhetoric with a halt to its "adventurous moves" against Tehran. "The Iranian people might be great and gracious, but not naive," he said.

Larijani isn't proposing a grand bargain but a ruthlessly pragmatic one shaped by Tehran's view of current realities: Iran is up, America is down, and any post-Iraq settlement should reflect those facts. That's the steep price of Tehran's help.

In a column last week, I praised Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel for his prescient early warnings about the risks of U.S. involvement in Iraq. Some readers complained that for all his prescience, Hagel still voted to support the war, and that I was ignoring the many Democrats who were similarly wary of Iraq -- and who voted against war funding. These readers are right. Hagel took political risks expressing his concerns back in 2003, but so did Democrats who voted against the Iraq mission despite a vitriolic barrage from the administration.

Gen: Iraq To Command Own Forces By Spring (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

Iraq's government will have command of its own armed forces by the middle of next year, a US general has said, revealing details of a deal between the US president and the Iraqi prime minister.

US military spokesman Major General William Caldwell said Tuesday Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki and President George W. Bush had agreed on an "accelerated timetable" for Iraq to take charge of its own security.

The announcement came on the eve of a much-anticipated report from a panel of US experts which is expected to recommend that US forces in Iraq do exactly that, in order to disengage American troops from Iraq's bloody conflict.

"We would expect to see the entire country having reached Iraqi provincial control by the fall of next year," Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad.

"We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring early summer," he added.

"This is all part of the accelerated timetable that was discussed by the prime minister and the president of the United States when they were in Jordan," referring to a meeting in Amman last Thursday.

"I think what you'll find from here is that 2007 is going to be the year of transition. We are going to transition security responsibility to the government of Iraq and their security forces," he said.

Currently only two of Iraq's 18 provinces are under direct Iraqi security control and only two of the country's 10 army divisions answer directly to Maliki rather than to US General George Casey's headquarters.

Caldwell said, however, that increasing numbers of America's 150,000-strong force would be assigned to "transition teams" directly inside Iraqi units to speed their training and coordinate operations with US support units.

These moves are among ideas expected to be recommended by former US secretary of state James Baker's Iraq Study Group on Wednesday, but Caldwell said the revised plan had come from the military itself.

"What's happening back in Washington... we'll take whatever guidance we're given but we're already refining and making adjustments here based on General Casey's guidance," he said.

"The mission of our forces here is to set the conditions to allow the Iraqi security forces to be successful in providing security for Iraq so that Iraqis can determine the future of Iraq," he added.

What Would Happen If The U.S. Left Iraq? (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

Bush predicts a surge in terrorism and others see regional civil war as the greatest risk.

WASHINGTON — With Americans leaning consistently in favor of disengagement from Iraq, President Bush has warned that a precipitate withdrawal would create a terrorism superstate in the Middle East that is rich with oil cash and determined to topple moderate governments around it.

But to many U.S. lawmakers, regional experts and Middle East leaders, the chief risk is not a more menacing version of Taliban-dominated Afghanistan, but a Lebanese-style civil war that could result in the deaths of thousands more Iraqis and expand the conflict by drawing in neighboring states.

The sharply differing views color the growing debate over the consequences of withdrawal as incoming Democratic congressional leaders demand a troop drawdown and Bush opens the door to new approaches. A majority of Americans favor at least a partial withdrawal, but the administration also is considering a temporary troop increase as part of an effort to step up training of Iraqi forces.

A study panel chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) will offer recommendations today for gradual troop withdrawals. Its final report is expected to reject a quick withdrawal, but key members have signaled that the U.S. commitment eventually should come to an end.

Bush has warned repeatedly of what he sees as the dangers of a swift exit.

"If we do not defeat the terrorists and extremists in Iraq, they will gain access to vast oil reserves and use Iraq as a base to overthrow moderate governments across the broader Middle East," he said Oct. 25 at a White House news conference.

Terrorists "will launch new attacks on America from this safe haven," Bush said, and "will pursue their goal of a radical Islamic empire that stretches from Spain to Indonesia."

But many others believe the increased risk of terrorism would be confined to limited portions of Iraq.

Some experts argue that many Iraqis, including some Sunni Arabs, as well as Shiites and Kurds, already are unhappy with foreign terrorists and would try to drive them out.

John McLaughlin, former acting CIA director, said there was less risk of an Al Qaeda-like terrorist group taking control of the entire country than of a "civil war in which you have the disintegration of the country and a widening set of tensions and potential conflicts throughout the Middle East."

In such circumstances, "Al Qaeda could gain a foothold in some piece of territory," said McLaughlin, now at the Philip Merrill Center for Strategic Studies at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who favors an increase in U.S. troops, agreed that the greatest risk is not an Al Qaeda takeover but a "wider regional war around ethnic and religious differences."

But even if Iraq wasn't taken over by terrorists, he said, a U.S. withdrawal would hearten Islamic militants and strengthen them in their fight against moderate states in the region.

Neighboring countries may initially choose a side and support it with money and weapons. Sunni-led states, perhaps Syria and Saudi Arabia, could come to the aid of Sunni groups, while Iran might help the Shiite south, said Stephen Biddle, a military affairs specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations.

But if it appears that their allies are about to lose, the states might feel pressure to increase their commitment, and might escalate the conflict by sending in their own troops, he said.

"I see a lot of warfare going on here before anyone can form a stable state out of Iraq," Biddle said. "We're more likely to get a regional version of Lebanon, and chaos, than the quick formation of a new order under a party we don't like."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), one of the Democrats' point men on Iraq, sees progressive fragmentation along sectarian lines in Iraq. But he argues that a reduction in U.S. forces would not worsen the trend, "because those dynamics are going on regardless of our presence."

Even in a drawdown, Reed said, the U.S. could train and support Iraqis, and could continue to go after Islamic militants in such places as Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province.

Syrian President Bashar Assad, among other Middle Eastern leaders, has said that the growing sectarian pressures in Iraq are likely to draw in other countries.

"Almost all countries have breaking points, and when the ethnic-religious break occurs in one country, it will not fail to occur elsewhere too," Assad recently told the German magazine Der Spiegel. "Large wars, small wars — no one will be able to get a grip on the consequences."

Like Bush, some U.S. military commanders fear an outburst of terrorism after a withdrawal.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, predicted in Senate testimony this fall that the Sunni Arab areas of central and western Iraq would not be viable as an independent state and would turn into a lawless haven for groups such as Al Qaeda.

But other analysts believe Sunnis would have little tolerance.

"We know they're already rather sick of the foreign terrorists, and could boot them out," said Wayne White, a former State Department intelligence official. "In the worst case, there would be only pockets of terrorists in the Sunni areas."

A U.S. withdrawal also would affect the growing regional influence of Iran, but there is little agreement on what a pullout would mean for Tehran.

Some, such as Graham, believe that "Iran would be the biggest winner" of a U.S. exit because it would gain strong influence over Iraq's Shiite south and an increased ability to dominate others in its region.

But others believe that though the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq has greatly increased Iran's regional influence, a withdrawal would be a setback, forcing it to become a caretaker of disorderly southern Iraq and threatening to embroil Tehran in a costly regional civil war.

"The American presence has greatly facilitated an expansion of Iranian influence, and they would probably prefer to have us stay and continue to bear the burdens," said James Dobbins, a veteran diplomat who was a senior envoy for the Bush administration and is now director of Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy Center.

Indeed, some analysts believe that a withdrawal could benefit the United States by breaking up the alliance between Iran and Syria. That could happen, they say, should Syria side with the Sunni west as Iran comes to the aid of the Shiite south.

A civil war could reduce Iraq's oil output and increase world prices, but most experts doubt that Iraqi reserves would be used as a weapon against the U.S., even if Iraq comes under the influence of Iran.

"They're going to need the money," said Peter Khalil, an analyst at Eurasia Group, a risk-advisory consulting firm, and a former advisor to the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. "They're not going to want to shoot themselves in the foot."

Why We Persevere (WP)

By William Caldwell IV

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- I don't see a civil war in Iraq. I don't see a constituency for civil war. The vast majority of the people want hope for their families, not to massacre their neighbors or divide their country. A poll conducted in June by the International Republican Institute, a nonpartisan group that promotes democracy, found 89 percent of Iraqis supporting a unity government representing all sects and ethnic communities. No wonder no "rebel army" steps forward to claim credit for vicious car bombs and cowardly executions of civilians.

I see debates among Iraqis -- often angry and sometimes divisive -- but arguments characteristic of political discourse, not political breakdown. The Council of Representatives meets here in Baghdad as the sole legitimate sovereign representative of the people, 12 million of whom braved bombs and threats last December to vote. No party has seceded or claimed independent territory.

I see a representative government exercising control over the sole legitimate armed authority in Iraq, the Iraqi Security Force. After decades in which the armed services were tools of oppression, Iraq is taking time to build an army and national police force loyal to all. There have been setbacks, but also great successes. In Fallujah, a city almost lost two years ago, I have seen the cooperation between the local army commander, a Shiite, and the police chief, a Sunni.

I don't see terrorist and criminal elements mounting campaigns for territory. Al-Qaeda in Iraq doesn't use roadside bombs, suicidal mass murderers and rocket barrages to gain and hold ground. Extremist Shiite death squads don't shoot people in the back of the head to further their control of the government. I do see random executions seeking to instill fear and insecurity. I don't see a struggle between armies and aligned political parties competing to rule.

I studied civil wars at West Point and at the Army Command and Staff College. I respect the credentials and opinions of those who want to hang that label here. But I respectfully -- and strongly -- disagree. I see the Iraqi people suffering from overlapping terrorist campaigns by extremist groups combined with the mass criminality that too often accompanies the sudden toppling of a dictatorship. This poses a different military challenge than does a civil war.

As the Iraqi people labor to build a country based on human rights and respect for all citizens, they are moving from the law of the gun to the rule of law. Violence will increase before life gets better. Those who know that freedom and democracy offer more hope than anarchy will not give up.

Regardless of what academics and pundits decide to label this conflict, hundreds of thousands of brave Iraqi soldiers, police officers and civil servants will continue to go to work building a free, prosperous and united Iraq. And every day more than 137,000 U.S. servicemen and servicewomen will lace up their boots, strap on their body armor and drive ahead with our mission to support these courageous Iraqis.

Knowing When To Let Go (WP)

By Mark Moyar

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

In moving to swiftly transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqi government, the Bush administration appears to be heeding lessons learned during America's closest historical precedent, the Vietnam War. In Vietnam, the United States found that indigenous troops were inherently better suited to local security tasks than Americans. Because they spoke the language, had relatives and friends in their operational areas and belonged to the same ethnic groups, they were better able to get information from civilians. They knew where the enemy was likely to hide, and could identify him by noticing subtle distinctions that escaped American troops.

During the Vietnamization period, from 1969 to 1972, the reduction of U.S. involvement in security operations galvanized the South Vietnamese forces to become more proficient. Moreover, the Saigon government's handling of sectarian unrest showed that the Vietnamese knew better than the Americans how to solve their own political problems. Recent comments from the Bush administration indicate that America will spend less time telling the Iraqis how to solve their political problems.

Restoring order will require numerous decisions based on perceptions of the beliefs, loyalties and alliances of particular Iraqis. No American is likely to perceive these things as accurately as an astute Iraqi. If Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is to be an effective national leader, we must let him use his own judgment.

During Vietnamization, the United States installed more advisers with South Vietnamese forces, just as we are now planning to do with Iraqi forces. American advisers helped in South Vietnam, but we have exaggerated the importance of their role. By far the most important factor in South Vietnamese units was the quality of their own leaders, and the same has generally been true in other countries with authoritarian traditions like Iraq's. As in Vietnam, U.S. advisers should seek to persuade Iraqi authorities to replace bad commanders.

But in any war, the ultimate objective is political, not military, and thus military competence must, in the end, be subordinated to attainment of the desired political goal. South Vietnam's premier had to engage in a delicate balancing act to keep enough competent officers in power while also keeping enough loyalists to prevent fractious military officers from starting a rebellion. The national leader in Iraq must likewise figure out how to employ some good commanders while also selecting some simply for the purpose of co-opting various factions.

Critics of Vietnamization point to the ultimate defeat of South Vietnam. But in fact the South Vietnamese largely pacified their country by 1971, and defeated a massive conventional North Vietnamese invasion in 1972 without the help of U.S. ground forces. They ultimately lost because the United States withdrew support while the North Vietnamese enjoyed enough superpower support to mount an even larger offensive in 1975.

Iraq's security forces are not going to experience anything resembling the 1975 offensive; they need only end the low-intensity fighting among Iraqis. But this task will require great political skill on the part of Iraq's prime minister. We will find out very soon whether he possesses it.

Fallujah's City Council Battles To Hold Its Ground (CSM)

By Scott Peterson, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

Despite threats from insurgents, Iraqi leaders meet weekly to address the concerns of citizens.

FALLUJAH, IRAQ

His voice cracking with emotion and anger, the mayor of Fallujah lashes out at his city council: Insurgent violence is growing, he tells them, and they're not trying to stem the tide.

"You haven't done anything," says Jassim Bedawi. "When Sheikh Kamal and Sheikh Hamza got killed, what had you citizens done to prevent their deaths?"

Mayor Bedawi is a rare phenomenon: an Iraqi still willing to participate in a democratic institution once seen as central to the rebuilding of Iraq. No other city council operates in the insurgent-riddled Anbar Province. But the embattled Bedawi - whose family, like those of other members, is under threat of kidnapping or worse - continues to forge ahead in one of the most stressful jobs the city has to offer. No debates over parking or playground equipment occupy his agenda. Issues of life and death occupy him and a number of city councilors who meet every Tuesday - as well as the question of whether they will survive a US pullback from the city. The Marine presence is reviled by many here, even though many recognize its importance to maintain some level of protection and even reconstruction.

"The people of Fallujah are not standing with me," the mayor complains, saying that without such support, asking for help from the central government could "get my head cut off, or a member of my family kidnapped."

"Citizens can't just come here and make requests," says Bedawi. "They must also give support."

Two years after US marines invaded Fallujah to force out insurgents who had made the city off limits to US forces, militants are filtering back into the city, despite only six entry points, which are heavily guarded. Since August, they have waged a campaign of intimidation that has left two key councilmen and the deputy chief of police chief murdered, and a trail of threats against those who persist.

The previous mayor fled to Syria earlier this year, after a dispute with the Ministry of Defense in Baghdad over his plans to raise a local Sunni militia.

On this day in late November, the meeting begins with three men who complain about shootings by US Marines - one of them fatal - of their sons and a nephew. They demand prosecution of the "snipers" involved, and their removal.

The council also discusses compensation by the military for occupation of certain properties; they had previously dismissed 300 false claims by residents. They talk of the need for US forces to "get close to the people" and how the US election is likely to change their lives. They ponder who will guard the phone exchange after repairs by US forces.

"I'm in awe.... Against all odds, they continue to meet," says Col. Lawrence Nicholson, the Marine regimental combat team commander who attends every meeting. "I don't know how resilient we [Americans] would be, if [insurgents] came to our door and said: 'We will kill your family.' "

"Witness No. 1," a man called Khalid with a bandaged wrist and his arm in a sling, tells how his teenage son Hamidi was shot by a Marine "sniper" on Oct. 30 from Observation Post Fenton, a tall house with three lookout positions on the main east-west artery. The son died a week later; Khalid was wounded, and a neighbor boy who came to assist him was also shot.

The family home is near OP Fenton. Marines there, officers say, believed that Hamidi was armed with a grenade.

"No matter how much compensation, it will not be worth a dime when I go to my son's funeral," Khalid told the council and the officers present. "I want the sniper to be prosecuted, according to the law."

A third witness speaks of a shooting of his nephew from the "sniper's building" on Nov. 19. He asks that the position be moved, "because the sniper does not differentiate between terrorists and civilians."

Colonel Nicholson - a stickler on abuse, say marines under his command - stands, promising a full investigation and "my word that we will clean up this situation."

"What we have heard is ... a tragic event for all of us who call Fallujah home," says Nicholson, reminding them that he has investigated "every allegation" in his 10 months in Iraq.

"In many cases, we have pulled marines who do not act properly out of the city," Nicholson says. "I have sent marines back to the US, because they did not deserve to be able to serve here. They had betrayed my trust; I lost confidence in them."

"I must point out that this sniper position is where it is to save all lives," he says, noting that three Marines had been shot at by Iraqi snipers in the previous 48 hours.

"While I will not tolerate a Marine shooting an innocent, I think we all have to understand ... the number of IEDs [roadside bombs] that are planted in this city every day ... kill police, Iraqi Army and marines, and wound them," says Nicholson. "I could spend every meeting parading 30 victims in here."

The shooting illustrates the difficulty of policing a Sunni city where insurgent attacks have spiked, and the population - according to uncertain military estimates - has jumped by some 80,000 to about 350,000 from before the invasion of late 2004, which destroyed much of the city.

Marine officers note that, in the 45 days prior to the shooting incident, marines had reported a half-dozen incidents of teenagers or children throwing grenades at US forces. "This is the tough thing that is Fallujah," says Lt. Col. Harold Van Opdorp, a commander from Stafford, Va., of the 1/24 Marines battaltion, with units in the city. An initial investigation concluded that the shooter believed the teen was throwing a grenade, though it was not clear if such a weapon was located.

The marines have seen a "significant increase in the level of violence" directed at them in Fallujah in the last four months, says Colonel Van Opdorp.

That dynamic adds a degree of combustibility on the streets as the Marine presence shrinks. There are now fewer than 300 marines who work in Fallujah, and half of those are not based inside the city limits. Most are likely to be pulled back in the next few months.

The mayor notes that the area around OP Fenton is relatively safe, and that there should be communication between the sniper and residents. "If a sniper actually sees someone place an IED, yes, please shoot them," says Bedawi. "Look at this sniper incident, which has set a bad example for all the citizens of Fallujah of the marines."

Clouding all the proceedings are the pall of numerous threats, and the awareness that, outside this fortified meeting place, these men and one woman are top targets for insurgents. The mayor relates threats aimed at his wife, sent by cellphone, and warnings against his family. At one point, he lowers his head into his arms in despair. Later, while discussing the theft of city and business property, he laments how little good citizenship seems to be taught by the 76 mosques here.

But Fallujah is buffeted as much as any city in Iraq by forces beyond local control. The US State Department official for Fallujah, Kael Weston, stands up to describe the consequences of the shift of congressional power far away in Washington.

The mood in America about Iraq is that "people are anxious," Mr. Weston tells the council. "It pains them as much as it pains you, to see the kidnapping in Baghdad, and see the killing that's going on. But Americans are not the most patient people in the world [and] are looking for changes.

"So until I leave and the marines leave, we will make small steps [of progress], and that is probably the most lasting contribution we can make," says Weston.

"We've made many mistakes, and I've not pretended otherwise. And unlike most Americans, I've lived through 3-1/2 years of those mistakes," adds Weston. "I think it would also be unfair to indict the American government, because we did not have a perfect crystal ball."

Still, he says, the future "will be determined more by you and less by us. And that's not necessarily because we wanted it that way, but that's the reality we face."

"This is escaping from the reality," protests "Engineer Khalid," a councilman.

"If Iraq fails, America fails - I've said that before," replies Weston. "And we don't like to fail."

The meeting shifts to talk of school opening days, and the US colonel asks who will protect the telephone-exchange boxes.

"Americans will guard it," suggests the mayor, helpfully.

"We're supposed to be going home!" replies an exasperated Nicholson. "Americans guarding this is a step backward, not a step forward."

The next issue: The recent killing of one British and three Iraqi security contractors, while trying to deliver crucial medical equipment to a local clinic.

"The simple, ordinary people thought that the Ministry of Interior [which is Shiite controlled, and widely blamed for operating death squads against Sunnis in Baghdad] sent three trucks of medicine, most of it expired and poisoned," explains Engineer Khalid. "We support you, [but] this was something taken advantage of by the other side, to aggravate the people."

The question for Fallujans is whether such an atrocity will be more likely, or less, after Americans withdraw.

Bedawi voices concern for the day when Fallujah is handed back fully to Iraqis. When asked how capable the council will be then, he pulls a reporter aside.

"We don't want the Americans to leave until the Iraqi Army and Iraqi Police are rebuilt and well armed, and they kill a lot of people from Al Qaeda, and dismantle militias, and kill extremists," he says. "After that, the Americans can leave."

"I think we are capable enough, to do our work without the help of any side," says secretary Abbas Ali Hussein with a well-practiced optimism after the meeting. "No one in our city council is intimidated."

"Rebuilding now is going on very well; people are appreciating what is going on," says Mr. Hussein, adding that vigilante groups are being formed to go after militants. "There is a wakening in the city toward us, and ideological disgust of Al Qaeda.

"People have begun to realize their interests, [and that militants] are pushed by foreign hands, just to kill the will of the people toward welfare and prosperity," he continues. "Everybody who works for the sake of his people and his country - he will be secured first by God."

At Least 5 Marines Are Expected To Be Charged In Haditha Deaths (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — At least five marines are expected to be charged, possibly as early as Wednesday, with the killing of 24 Iraqis, many of them unarmed women and children, in the village of Haditha in November 2005, according to a Marine official and a lawyer involved in the case.

The charges are expected to range from negligent homicide to murder, said a senior Pentagon official familiar with the military's nearly nine-month investigation into the episode. Several marines from the Third Platoon of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment, are accused of killing the villagers after a roadside explosion killed one of their comrades.

Charges could also be brought against an additional one or two marines, the Marine official said, including one officer who was in the vicinity of the killings but did not participate in them.

Though it was nearly certain that marines would be charged with crimes for the killings, exactly when the charges would be made official was unclear, military officials and defense lawyers involved in the case said. But they said charges could closely follow a closed-door briefing by Lt. Gen. Richard F. Natonski, the Marine Corps deputy commandant for plans, policies and operations, to the House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday morning.

That briefing will relate the findings of a military inquiry into how the Marine Corps managed its investigation of the slayings, which began with an inquiry in March, four months after the killings occurred, the Pentagon official said. Aides to committee members said that Marine officials promised a confidential briefing before any charges were announced.

According to the Marine official and the defense lawyer representing one of the marines under investigation, criminal charges will be filed against Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn., the squad's leader; Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla.; Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 21, of Carbondale, Penn.; Cpl. Sanick Dela Cruz, 24, of Chicago; and Cpl. Hector Salinas, 22, of Houston.

The 5 marines are said to have been the ones who killed the 24 Iraqis, including 5 men in a taxi that approached the marines' convoy after the explosion that killed a 20-year-old lance corporal, and 19 other civilians in several houses nearby. About 10 of the dead were women and children who appeared to have been killed by rifle fire at close range, military officials said.

The marines have said they believed that they were coming under small-arms fire from a house on the south side of the road.

Jack Zimmermann, a lawyer for Lance Corporal Tatum, said his client had responded appropriately to a lethal attack in a dangerous region of Iraq. "There was no crime committed," Mr. Zimmermann said.

Mark Zaid, a lawyer representing Sergeant Wuterich, said his client acted in accordance with military rules of engagement.

"We emphatically deny that Staff Sergeant Wuterich participated in any unlawful killings that day in Haditha," Mr. Zaid said. "The collateral civilian deaths were absolutely tragic, but occurred as a result of legally justified actions that routinely occur during time of war."

Lawyers for the other three enlisted marines declined to comment.

The senior Pentagon official said that no other marines would face charges in the case. "The only people who will be charged with an offense will be those individuals who did the shootings," the official said last week.

But the Marine officer, interviewed on Tuesday, said that he expected charges to be brought against one or two additional marines, including one officer.

"I don't see just five of them being charged," the official said. "I see six or seven. One of them, I see, is an officer."

That officer, the Marine official said, was First Lt. William T. Kallop, 25, the only officer at the scene, who arrived sometime after the initial explosion that led to the marines' sweep of the nearby homes.

A lawyer for Lieutenant Kallop declined to comment Tuesday. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Marine Corps Nears Haditha Charges (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, December 6, 2006

Military prosecutors are close to charging some of the Marines involved in the deaths of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last year, the Marine Corps said Tuesday.

It is the first time the Corps has said it will file charges in the deaths, which included unarmed women and children and followed the killing of a Marine by a roadside bomb in the town.

Defense lawyers for some members of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment have said their clients were following rules of engagement when they returned fire after the bomb went off Nov. 19, 2005.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis has examined the investigations into the killings and has made initial decisions about what action to take, Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Tuesday in a news release.

Gibson declined to say how many Marines would be charged or what crimes prosecutors would allege.

The Marines initially reported that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed by a makeshift roadside bomb and in crossfire between Marines and insurgent attackers. After media reports surfaced in March that the killings were deliberate, the top Marine commander in Iraq ordered a crimnial investigation.

A parallel investigation examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up details of the killings. Results of the probes have not been made public.

Gibson said the Marine Corps would brief members of both the Senate and House Armed Services Committees this week on the findings of the investigations.

Washington-based attorney Mark Zaid, who represents squad leader Sgt. Frank Wuterich, said he had not heard if his client was going to be charged.

"We'll be prepared," Zaid said in a telephone interview. "If they file anything we will refute them. Our position remains that the collateral deaths of civilians was a tragedy but all of them were legally justified actions in a time of war."

In a separate case involving Camp Pendleton Marines, an eight-man squad was accused of kidnapping and murdering an Iraqi man in the town of Hamdania. That case is working its way through the military courts.

As War Ravages Baghdad, City's Ambulance Workers Must Pick Up The Pieces (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Each time emergency workers return to the Mansour district ambulance station after a run, they jot notes in a dog-eared logbook that doubles as a grim diary of life here in the capital.

Sept. 10, for example: bombing with two dead.

Or Sept. 29: woman shot in the abdomen.

Oct. 10: man with shrapnel wounds.

Ambulance workers have among the clearest views of Baghdad's descent into chaos. As the city has disintegrated around them, they have been left to pick up the pieces. They are often overwhelmed, and have increasingly become targets themselves.

"These three years have been equal to 16 years as a paramedic," said Ali Jasim, 38, before he set off on a convoy carrying medicine and other supplies to Balad, a town north of the capital that was the site of horrific sectarian bloodletting.

Before the collapse of Saddam Hussein's government in 2003, so-called hot calls, for bombings or shootings, were virtually nonexistent for Baghdad's emergency workers. Now most of Baghdad's ambulance calls are hot. A relatively calm 24-hour shift might mean having to wash the blood from their clothes only once, the workers say.

In this war-ravaged city of five million people, only about 90 ambulances and crews are typically available on any given day for emergency calls, said Dr. Hashim Jabbar Muhammad, chief of the Health Ministry's emergency directorate. He said international standards recommended several times that number for a city this size.

The city's emergency dispatch system, the Iraqi equivalent of 911, amounts to a dingy room with 10 phone lines; on a recent visit, three of them were broken. Calls come in at a rate of about one every 10 minutes, although residents often complain that the lines are busy.

Each call requires a cumbersome process of calling back to make sure the call is legitimate.

The ambulance corps here and elsewhere in Iraq feel each spike in violence. When sectarian assassinations surged after the attack on a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, in February, the Baghdad ambulance drivers who pick up dead bodies were swamped.

The capital's maddening traffic, and the fact that most residents ignore sirens, compound the challenges. Ambulance crews are also treated with suspicion by American troops because militants have been known to use ambulances to transport weapons or bombs. The Americans frequently pull over ambulances in the middle of runs to search them.

Emergency workers earn salaries that are often barely enough to live on, as little as $80 a month for new paramedics. Drivers are also held responsible for any damage they incur on their vehicles.

"I wish I could quit," said Muhammad Nerous, 26, who has been a paramedic for six years and works at a station in the Bab Sharji neighborhood. "Every day when I come to work, I pray there will be no explosions because I am fed up with these scenes."

As they rush to bombings now, a secondary blast is often aimed at them. Eleven emergency workers were killed in 2006. Previously, six others had been killed since early 2004, when the department started keeping track.

More than 10 percent of Baghdad's ambulance drivers have resigned in the last three months alone as violence has escalated, said Dr. Muhammad of the Health Ministry.

On a typical call last month, a crew from the center in Mansour, a troubled western Baghdad neighborhood, transported a woman who had just gone into labor to the hospital. But after dropping her off, a firefight broke out nearby, and the crew was stuck in the cross-fire.

Upon their return, the workers scrawled a new notation in the logbook: "We could have been killed for this assignment. But God's protection was available."

It was apparently unavailable several months ago when gunmen killed an ambulance driver from Mansour en route to the dangerous southern neighborhood of Dora. As the ambulance was stopped in traffic, two men appeared and sprayed the vehicle with bullets. The driver, Akram Muhammad Sahih, 34, a married father of two, was killed.

"I pretended I was dead," said Ali Jabbar Hatin, 34, who was sitting next to Mr. Sahih in the ambulance. He escaped injury but the other paramedic in the vehicle was wounded.

Arkan Ali Hussein, 40, a veteran paramedic who works out of the Mansour center, has an unusual system for keeping in touch with his worried wife throughout his 24-hour shift. She calls his cellphone and hangs up, avoiding a charge. When he calls back and then hangs up, she knows he is alive, he said. The pair exchange missed calls at least a dozen times a day.

But he is reluctant to share with her the horror he sees. Two months ago, a man wearing a suicide belt detonated himself at an army recruiting center in western Baghdad. Mr. Hussein was among the first to arrive.

"There were pieces of flesh everywhere," he said. "People were yelling and screaming."

The first man he treated was badly burned, riddled with shrapnel. He shoved a tube into the man's mouth to establish an airway, then rushed him to the hospital.

When he returned, he spotted a severed leg lying on the ground but could not find the body it belonged to, so he left it, moving on to another victim. The gruesome injuries that he sees nowadays, he said, are much worse than anything he witnessed as a medic in the military during the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s.

"Back then, there was a bullet in the body or a blast from a mine." he said, "Now we're finding flesh everywhere, heads, legs and hands."

Most of the paramedics have only minimal training. As a result, Dr. Muhammad said, their main strategy, rather than treating patients in the field, is to "scoop and run."

Often, however, there is little they can do. Bilal Mehdi, 26; his brother, Hilmi, 23; and their father, Mehdi Hussain Lazim, 54, are part of a small contingent of emergency workers who only pick up the dead.

Earlier this year, they helped deliver 800 bodies to the morgue in one month from a single sewage treatment station in the mixed eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Rustamiya. Bilal Mehdi said he took 300 bodies himself. Militia members had been dumping bodies into the sewers nearby, and they would wind up at the station. Mr. Mehdi had to clamber down by rope to retrieve the putrid remains.

More recently, he said, he delivered a dozen bodies stacked in his ambulance in one trip from Mahmudiya, south of the capital; some of them decapitated, some without legs. He drove back with his head out the window, because the smell was so overpowering.

As the body count in Baghdad continues to mount, Mr. Mehdi says he wishes he could leave his job. But without any other job prospects, he is stuck for now. He knows it is only a matter of time until his next call. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Iraqi Firefighters Bear The Heat Of Terrorists' Tactics (WT)

By James Palmer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- One of Iraq's most perilous jobs has become even more dangerous.

The terrorists who daily spread mayhem in the capital increasingly have adopted the tactic of following a suicide bombing with one or two secondary blasts, timed to detonate a few minutes later when a crowd has formed.

And that is bad news for the city's 3,500 firefighters, whose job demands that they rush to the scene of every explosion to douse the flames and assist the injured.

"This is part of our job now," said Nazar Khani Mousa, 32, who was working a bomb scene in central Baghdad last summer when two more explosions knocked him unconscious. His back, right hand and forearm were burned badly, while shrapnel pierced his forehead. He was unable to walk for three months.

Today, he's back at work at the Karrada firehouse in the Al-Resafah district on the east bank of the Tigris River, risking his life for the equivalent of less than $90 a week.

This year alone, at least 30 Baghdad firemen have died in the line of duty and another 55 have been wounded, according to the Interior Ministry, which oversees Iraq's fire departments.

Others have been kidnapped by criminal groups or militiamen; still others find themselves in the crossfire of insurgent groups, U.S. and Iraqi security forces, and warring militias.

Most say they are motivated to carry on by a sense of duty and a need to support their families at a time when other jobs are hard to find.

"The people still count on us to do our work. If we don't put out the fires, who will?" asked Mahdi Muhsin, a 31-year-old veteran firefighter who has been on the job since he was a teenager.

Mr. Mousa, for his part, explained that he is the sole provider for his wife and his three daughters, who range in age from 1 month to 7 years. "This is only job I've ever worked," he said.

If Baghdad's firefighters are undeterred by the risks they face, that does not mean they are casual about security.

At the Karrada firehouse, guards peer from sandbagged machine-gun nests high above the row of red trucks in the garage below. Others patrol the front gate while, inside, most carry holstered sidearms.

"We're always prepared for an attack," said Laith Al-Sabbah, a 45-year-old colonel who has 21 years on the job. "The militias control the streets now."

Col. Al-Sabbah and the other firefighters say their biggest problem on calls is trying to figure out who is who. Many of the militias have acquired police or Interior Ministry uniforms, so the firefighters seldom know whether uniformed "officials" are there to help them or hurt them.

In August, men in police uniforms kidnapped and killed three firefighters from the Al-Shaab station in north Baghdad. And on Nov. 6, assailants in police uniforms snatched eight firefighters from the Sheik Omar station in north Baghdad during a government-imposed daylight curfew. So far, three men have been found dead; the other five are still missing.

Just getting to the scene of a fire or explosion is also a challenge.

Mahdi Muhsin, 31, a firetruck driver, said it normally takes at least 20 minutes to get to an emergency scene because of traffic congestion, closed roads and security cordons. That compares to an average response time of eight minutes for American fire departments, according to the U.S. Fire Administration.

"Sometimes when there is an attack we can't reach our destination because the military won't let us pass," said Mr. Muhsin, a 15-year veteran of the department.

The steady monthly salaries -- $350 for rookies and $600 for seasoned officers -- are keeping the department staffed, but many long for another way of life.

Col. Al-Sabbah, who oversees all 20 firehouses in the Al-Resafah district, told a reporter he had sent his wife and two sons to Syria and said he was thinking of moving there, too.

Then his phone rang. A colleague reported that Lt. Col. Ali Mustafa Hable, the director of fire training in Baghdad, had been missing for more than 24 hours.

Col. Al-Sabbah hung up the phone and looked at his visitor. He didn't have to say much. The call had clearly pushed him one step closer to joining his family.

Body Counts Only Serve To Fill Agendas (USAT)

By Jon C. Bowersox

DOJ_NMG_0102753

The United States may not be able to stop the bloodshed in Iraq, but it can halt the war over body counts. The latest salvo was fired recently by The Lancet, a leading British medical journal. The editors took a shot at the Bush administration's claims that democracy and reconstruction are succeeding in Iraq by publishing a research study claiming that the U.S.-led invasion has caused more than 600,000 "excess" civilian deaths since 2003.

Never mind that editors failed to disclose that The Lancet had taken an anti-war stand on Iraq even before 2003, or that the study used dubious methods to come up with a number many times higher than any reported before. The Lancet's number drew widespread disagreement even with the British anti-war group Iraq Body Count, which expressed "skepticism." The Iraq Body Count estimates that more than 55,000 civilians could have been killed during the war.

Ever since the Vietnam War, civilian and enemy body counts have ranged from educated guesses to pure fiction — tragic statistics twisted to serve the agendas of whoever is spinning the numbers.

As I grew up during the Vietnam War listening to the daily tally of body counts on the evening news, I saw how they served no value other than to catalyze national opposition to the war. Thus, I was heartened when Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said at the start of the Iraq war that "we don't do (civilian) body counts."

But when I arrived in Iraq as the senior consultant for reconstructing the health sector in 2005, I was surprised to see that our intelligence briefings by the U.S. Army included civilian body counts. After the Samarra mosque bombing in February, our military became obsessed with obtaining daily body counts from the Iraqi government as a way of attempting to disprove reports that sectarian violence was out of control.

Why are we so obsessed with body counts? Regardless of the true numbers, the one thing we can say with any moral certainty about excess civilian deaths is that the numbers are too high. Then we should focus on how to help Iraqis get their health system up to the level of being able to reduce the body count by saving lives.

One visit to the Baghdad morgue is all it takes to see that Iraq has a major collateral damage problem. You see it by just walking amidst the hundreds of decomposing corpses scattered about a building that rarely had more than 30 cases at a time in the past. You also see it as families watch a TV screen trying to identify missing relatives from a never-ending loop of postmortem photographs. In fact, you can taste the permeating stench for days.

All it takes is one visit to a Baghdad hospital, where Iraqis injured in the day's bombings lie in pools of blood waiting to be treated by doctors who are working without the resources needed for even basic casualty care. Many potential survivors die because the health system lacks the medical staff, medicines and equipment needed to save them.

The U.S. government has already spent 90% of its $800 million investment in health-sector reconstruction on building projects that haven't been completed — and wouldn't help the Iraqis even if they are. Not only did we not anticipate the level of excess collateral damage, we did not budget enough money to handle the flood of blood.

The international donor community has delivered less than 25% of what was pledged in 2003. In fact, the World Bank has been unable to renovate 12 badly needed Iraqi emergency centers because of the security situation.

During my time in Iraq, I learned that there are thousands of Iraqi doctors who have chosen to risk their lives to care for their people. They need essential medicines, supplies and a safe working environment. What they don't need is the mockery of the daily body count thrown in their faces. What they need — and we owe them — is a daily survivor count.

Analysts: Bin Laden Alive But Hamstrung (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies think al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri are alive and still plotting attacks, even though both have eluded a massive manhunt for more than five years since the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Bin Laden's few appearances and statements in recent months, and two recent bombing attacks in Pakistan aimed at killing al-Zawahri prompted recent intelligence reports that both may be dead.

But so far there has been no success in locating and catching either extremist leader through his movements or communications, or from intelligence agents on the ground. Both remain powerful symbols for Islamist extremists around the world and the target of scores to hundreds of covert special-operations commandos, regular troops and CIA paramilitary officers.

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates said yesterday he plans to review the tactics being used by forces taking part in the five-year hunt for bin Laden, although he noted that bin Laden has become more a symbol to terrorists and less an active planner and organizer of attacks.

"While it's important to continue the search for Osama bin Laden, I think that his ability to directly organize and plan the kind of attacks against us that hurt us so badly in September of 2001 is very limited now," Mr. Gates said. "And I think that it's important to keep him on the run."

The challenge in chasing al Qaeda leaders is "figuring out where they're going to be, not where they've been, and getting the information in a way that is timely enough to act on it," Mr. Gates said.

"With that kind of intelligence lacking," he said, "the way we'll catch bin Laden eventually, in my view, is that just as in the case of Saddam Hussein, one of his own people will turn him in."

"I think just as he is not organizing things any longer, but remains a powerful symbol, I think being able to capture or kill him would have a powerful symbolic impact also," Mr. Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Last week, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte was asked why bin Laden has eluded the manhunt. He said he would not provide "a long exegesis" explaining the failure so far.

"Obviously, we're not going to give up on our efforts to track him down," Mr. Negroponte said after a speech at Harvard University.

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told WTOP radio last week that both bin Laden and al-Zawahri are "still alive" and "and working to hurt the people and values of the United States."

Intelligence officials said bin Laden and al-Zawahri are hiding in separate locations somewhere in the extremely rugged and mountainous border region separating Pakistan and Afghanistan. Scores to several hundred regular and special-operations troops and CIA officers are working in several task forces to locate both bin Laden and his deputy, al-Zawahri, along the 1,200-mile border.

The State Department, for its part, is supporting programs in Afghanistan and Pakistan to develop the ungoverned border region as part of a "drain-the-swamp" anti-terrorism campaign.

John Gastright, deputy assistant secretary of state for South Asia, said the United States is supporting a Pakistani plan to spend $750 million over five years to develop the border region so it won't support terrorists.

Several billion dollars in U.S. and international funds also were spent in Afghanistan as well, including the border region. "The reality is that over time [al Qaeda] won't find a home there" once the area is developed, he said.

Dennis Pluchinsky, a former State Department counterterrorism analyst, said bin Laden's low profile is likely the result of poor health or because he is hiding in an ultra-secret location that is too risky to conduct videotaping.

"The last possibility leads to the intriguing question of whether it is more secure to make many movements, or to stay in one place for a lengthy period of time," he said. "The more you move, the more opportunities for someone to see you move. The longer you stay in one place, the greater the possibility that the enemy may find you, especially in sector searches."

Gen. Hayden told the Senate Armed Services Committee in congressional testimony on Nov. 15 that killing or capturing bin Laden and al-Zawahri will not end the al Qaeda threat, but "probably would contribute to the unraveling of the central al Qaeda organization."

Al Qaeda's "physical safe haven in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border area," Gen. Hayden said, gives the terrorists "the physical -- and psychological -- space needed to meet, train, expand its networks and prepare new attacks."

From Ruins Of Afghan Buddhas, A History Grows (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

BAMIYAN, Afghanistan — The empty niches that once held Bamiyan's colossal Buddhas now gape in the rock face — a silent cry at the terrible destruction wrought on this fabled valley and its 1,500-year-old treasures, once the largest standing Buddha statues in the world.

It was in March 2001, when the Taliban and their sponsors in Al Qaeda were at the zenith of their power in Afghanistan, that militiamen, acting on an edict to take down the "gods of the infidels," laid explosives at the base and the shoulders of the two Buddhas and blew them to pieces. To the outraged outside world, the act encapsulated the horrors of the Islamic fundamentalist government. Even Genghis Khan, who laid waste to this valley's towns and population in the 13th century, had left the Buddhas standing.

Five years after the Taliban were ousted from power, Bamiyan's Buddhist relics are once again the focus of debate: Is it possible to restore the great Buddhas? And, if so, can the extraordinary investment that would be required be justified in a country crippled by poverty and a continued Taliban insurgency in the south and that is, after all, overwhelmingly Muslim?

This valley about 140 miles northwest of Kabul, where in the sixth century tens of thousands of pilgrims flocked to worship at its temples and monasteries and meditate in its rock caves, is attracting new international attention.

In 2003, the United Nations designated the Bamiyan ruins a World Heritage site, but also listed them as endangered, because of their fragile condition, vulnerability to looters and pressures from a post-Taliban boom in construction and tourism. Intensive efforts have been under way to stabilize what remains of the cliff sculptures and murals.

Meanwhile, archaeologists have been taking advantage of the greatly increased access that became possible once the statues were gone to make new discoveries — and to pursue ancient tales of a third giant Buddha, possibly buried between the two that were destroyed.

"The history of Bamiyan is beginning to be revealed, in a concrete sense, for the first time through both works of conservation and excavations of archaeological remains," said Kasaku Maeda, a Japanese historian who has studied Bamiyan for more than 40 years.

Unesco has been overseeing a program of emergency repairs to the niches over the last few years, drawing teams of archaeologists and conservationists from all over the world. "The site is in danger," said Masanori Nagaoka, a cultural program specialist at Unesco's Kabul office.

Gedeone Tonoli, a tunnel engineer from Italy, has been overseeing the most urgent task: securing the cracking cliff face. One morning two Italian mountain climbers swung on ropes at the top of the niche that held the eastern Buddha, which, at an astounding 125 feet tall, was the smaller of the two. Wire netting covered the back wall of the niche, which still occasionally rattles with falling rocks and stones. A great scar marks the inner left wall where the explosion tore away the side of the niche, threatening the whole cliff.

The right side of the niche, however, has been stable for two years, anchored with steel rods and tons of concrete pumped into the fissures. Tiny glass slides are taped to the rock, and sensors linked to a computer keep track of every tremble in the cliff face. Before, Mr. Tonoli said, "you could see the sky here and birds were flying in."

At the base of what, at 180 feet, had been the larger Buddha, workers were still shoveling away at rubble left from the explosions. German restorers from the International Council on Monuments and Sites have spent two years carefully sorting through the debris from both Buddhas, lifting out the largest sections by crane — some weigh 70, even 90 tons — and placing them under cover, because the soft stone disintegrates in rain or snow. The smaller fragments and mounds of dust are carefully piled up at the side.

Reports that the Taliban had taken away 40 truckloads of the stone from the statues to sell were not true, said Edmund Melzl, a restorer. "From the volume we think we have everything," he said. Yet only 60 percent of that volume is stone, he added. The rest crumbled to dust in the explosions.

A continuing paradox is that the destruction of the Buddhas has in a way aided archaeologists in their investigations. For example, carbon dating of fragments of the plaster surface of the Buddhas was able to pinpoint the construction of the smaller one to 507, and the larger one to 554. Previous estimates had varied over 200 years.

The Buddhas were only roughly carved in the rock, which was then covered in a mud plaster mixed with straw and horsehair molded to depict the folds of their robes and then painted in bright colors. Workers have recovered nearly 3,000 pieces of the surface plaster, some with traces of paint, as well as the wooden pegs and rope that were laid across the bodies to hold the plaster to the statue. The dryness of Afghanistan's climate and the depth of the niches helped protect the statues and preserve the wood and rope.

The larger Buddha was painted carmine red and the smaller one was multicolored, Mr. Melzl said.

The most exciting find, he added, was a reliquary containing three clay beads, a leaf, clay seals and parts of a Buddhist text written on bark. The reliquary is thought to have been placed on the chest of the larger Buddha and plastered over at the time of construction.

The fragments have been carefully stored while the main task continues: to gather all the rubble so that the Afghan government and experts can decide what to do with it. There have been calls to rebuild the Buddhas, mostly from Afghans who feel that restored statues would provide a greater tourist attraction, and a righting of wrongs. Unesco has warned that for Bamiyan to retain its status as a World Heritage site there must be no new building, only preservation. Yet the alternative of displaying 200 tons of recovered material in a museum does not seem feasible, said Michael Petzet, president of the International Council on Monuments and Sites.

The one restoration approach considered acceptable by Unesco and other experts is anastylosis, often used for Greek and Roman temples, in which the original pieces are reassembled and held together with a minimum of new material. Michael Urbat, a geologist from the University of Cologne, has analyzed pieces of the larger Buddha and from the rock strata has been able to work out what part of the vast statue they came from.

But reassembling pieces that can weigh up to 90 tons would be extremely difficult; Afghanistan does not even have a crane strong enough to hoist them, Mr. Melzl said. The reconstruction project, which the governor of Bamiyan Province has estimated would cost $50 million, would probably also become a political issue in this impoverished Muslim country, where more than 10 percent of the population remains in need of food aid.

Nevertheless, the provincial governor, Habiba Sarabi, favors rebuilding the Buddhas using anastylosis, and said she would propose that the central government make a formal request to Unesco. Professor Maeda said he supports the idea of reassembling one of the Buddhas and leaving the other destroyed as a testament to the crime.

The government also approved the proposal of the Japanese artist Hiro Yamagata to mount a $64 million sound-and-laser show starting in 2009 that would project Buddha images at Bamiyan, powered by hundreds of windmills that would also supply electricity to surrounding residents.

Meanwhile, simply preserving what remains is daunting. Once the niches, grottos and caves were covered with murals, but 80 percent were obliterated by the Taliban, Professor Maeda said. Art thieves also did damage, using ropes to climb into caves 100 feet up on the cliff face and hacking away priceless medallions depicting seated Buddhas. One of them made its way to Tokyo, where an art dealer, suspecting its illicit provenance, showed it to Professor Maeda, who has managed to retrieve more than 40 stolen artifacts.

"One day I hope we will return them to Afghanistan," he said.

He continues to scour the caves, and finds small joys amid the destruction. One cave that he first discovered during his first trip here, in 1964, so blackened by soot from camp fires that the Taliban and looters passed it by, has revealed fine paintings of tiny animals — a lion and a wild boar, a monkey, an ox and a griffin — rare in Buddhist art, but characteristic of Bamiyan, which combines Indian, Iranian and Gandharan influences.

While the focus now is on conservation, experts know there is more to discover. At least two teams of archaeologists are engaged in a discreet race to discover a third colossal Buddha that may have once lain between the two standing Buddhas.

The Chinese monk Xuan Zang visited Bamiyan in 632 and described not only the two big standing Buddhas, but also a temple some distance from the royal palace that housed a reclining Buddha about 1,000 feet long. Most experts believe it lay above ground and was long ago destroyed.

But two archaeologists, Zemaryalai Tarzi of Afghanistan and Kazuya Yamauchi of Japan, are busy digging in the hope of finding its foundations. Mr. Tarzi, who excavated a Buddhist monastery this year, may have also found the wall of the royal citadel that could lead the way to the third Buddha. He plans to return next year to continue digging.

Nominee For U.S. Attorney Is In Limbo (MINNST)

By Randy Furst, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 6, 2006

The Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on Rachel Paulose's nomination for U.S. attorney in Minnesota.

Nine months after Rachel Paulose was named acting U.S. attorney for Minnesota, and four months after she was formally nominated for the job by President Bush, her appointment is slipping further into doubt.

The U.S. Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on the nomination. That would mean that Bush, if he wishes, must resubmit her name to the next Senate, with a new Democratic majority.

"I am disappointed the Senate will adjourn this year without taking up Rachel Paulose's nomination," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a statement Monday to the Star Tribune. "Ms. Paulose has shown herself to be an extremely competent and capable professional." He said he expects her to be renominated, "and I hope we will have the opportunity to confirm her nomination in a timely manner."

If approved to permanently succeed Tom Heffelfinger, Paulose, 33, would become the state's first female U.S. attorney and the youngest current U.S. attorney.

Her nomination stalled when the GOP-led Senate Judiciary Committee failed to take it up. In an apparent oversight, Paulose and her supporters did not solicit the support of both home-state senators. Without that, the committee typically does not act on a nominee.

Coleman supported her nomination, but Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., took no position, saying it's his practice to meet with any nominee before the choice moves to the Judiciary Committee. However, Dayton said, Paulose never sought a meeting.

"I assumed that their silence meant lack of interest in moving the nomination forward" this term, Dayton said two weeks ago.

Meeting sought this week

Told of Dayton's comments Tuesday, the Justice Department scrambled to clear up the matter, saying it was unaware that Dayton wanted a meeting. "Now that we are aware, we have reached out to the senator's office to set up a meeting while she is here in Washington this week," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman.

Roehrkasse added that even if Dayton is no longer senator when the matter comes before the judiciary committee, Paulose was still paying Dayton the courtesy of meeting with him.

Dayton spokeswoman Chani Wiggins said the Justice Department's contact with his office Tuesday was "the first time we heard from them" about Paulose. Wiggins said Dayton's office will try to schedule a meeting for today.

All fall, Paulose continued to have the backing of the Bush administration.

"Rachel is a rare combination of exceptional intelligence, common sense and high moral character," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said in a statement to the Star Tribune last month.

Choice was a surprise

Paulose's choice as interim U.S. attorney came as something of a surprise last winter. When Tom Heffelfinger announced in February his resignation as U.S. attorney, Joan Hume was his first assistant. Traditionally, Hume would have become interim U.S. attorney until the Senate approved a successor. But the White House bypassed her and named Paulose to the interim post.

At the time, Paulose was senior counsel to McNulty in Washington, D.C. She had been an assistant U.S. attorney in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002.

Besides Paulose, Coleman offered the White House at least one other candidate for the permanent post: Clayton Robinson, assistant director of the prosecution division for the Ramsey County Attorney's Office.

Paulose keeps low profile

While the U.S. attorney is considered to be among the state's most prominent federal appointees, Paulose has kept a low profile. In her nine months, she has declined interviews with the Star Tribune and other media. Jeanne Cooney, a spokeswoman in the U.S. attorney's office, said Paulose was unavailable to the media on "any subject relative to this office because she hasn't been confirmed." She said Paulose is following Justice Department policy.

There is a slight chance Paulose would be given a recess appointment later this month, after Congress goes home. Such an appointment would be good through the end of 2008, a month before Bush's term ends.

If Bush resubmits her nomination next year, she'll face a Democratic-led Senate. Then her fate may well rest with Minnesota's newly elected senator, DFLer Amy Klobuchar, the current Hennepin County attorney. Klobuchar has declined to comment on Paulose.

She graduated from Yale Law School in 1997 and has been an attorney for eight years. She served in the civil rights division of the Justice Department for a year, three-plus years as an assistant U.S. attorney in Minneapolis and stints with law firms Williams & Connolly and Dorsey & Whitney, before rejoining the Justice Department. She worked there for two months as a senior counsel to McNulty, the deputy attorney general.

Judge offers support

Another supporter of Paulose is James B. Loken, chief judge of the U.S. Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, which includes Minnesota. Paulose clerked for him in the late 1990s.

"I have enthusiastically recommended her to every employer to hire her ... including to Senator Coleman, before he urged that she be nominated," Loken said.

While with McNulty, she worked on issues of health care, immigration and child pornography, she wrote in a memo for the Senate.

U.S. attorney nominees invariably come from the party in the White House. In 1992, Paulose was a Republican Party vice chair in a state house district covering parts of Eagan, Apple Valley and Burnsville. In 2004, she was a delegate to the state Republican convention and a party lawyer in the state for Bush.

Before her nomination, Paulose was a political unknown, her only press clippings coming as a student member of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents in the early 1990s.

Todd Jones, U.S. attorney before Heffelfinger, hired her in 1998 and calls her a friend, saying she's capable of doing the job: "I think her biggest challenge is going to be developing the credibility at such a young age and breaking the perception that because of her young age she lacks the judgment grounded in experience."

Courthouse A Home Away From Home (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

For a Father, Son and Daughter Who Are Lawyers, Chance to Share in Family Is Just Down the Hall

Each day, chances are good that Bill, Amy and Jon Jeffress will be applying their legal talents just a few doors down the hall from each other in the same stately office building near the U.S. Capitol.

But the father, daughter and son are not racking up billable hours at a white-shoe family firm.

They are reporting for work at the E. Barrett Prettyman Courthouse, Washington's federal court.

On the sixth floor, father William H. Jeffress Jr., 61, one of Washington's most prominent defense attorneys, has been busy with pretrial hearings in a case that has rocked the White House. He represents I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, who is accused of lying to investigators probing the leak of a CIA operative's name.

On the second floor, daughter Amy, 41, has been checking on narcotics cases she oversees for the U.S. Attorney's Office -- including a trial involving a ring that is accused of peddling cocaine and heroin.

And in a magistrate courtroom down the hall, Jonathan, 35, has been representing poor people as a public defender. Last month, he defended a woman accused of creating phony checks and, more recently, a convicted felon charged with carrying a 9mm handgun as he drove through the city.

The family's workdays -- and once in a while, their lunch breaks -- overlap in the court's marble hallways.

"I don't think you can go into the courthouse now and not run into at least one and usually two or three of them," said A.J. Kramer, the federal public defender in Washington and Jon's boss.

"It's really unusual for a family of lawyers to be in the same city, much less the same court," Kramer said. "You've really covered all the bases when you have one on prosecution, one on defense and another doing all kinds of private practice."

It makes for tender moments in a place that can be anything but.

One recent day, Amy, the federal prosecutor, spotted Jon, the public defender, while he was talking in a conference room with a client. The sister in Amy naturally walked over to kiss her brother on the cheek.

"Was that awkward for you?" she later asked him.

Jon smiled and shook his head.

"I like seeing a lot of my dad and sister now," he said, then joked about his junior status in the family's legal lineup. "Plus, some of my clients appreciate that I know some people in high places."

In many ways, the U.S. District Court is a kind of family home.

Their personal stories are intertwined with the court's history. Each learned the power of the law here and can trace career trajectories to work they did in the building. Some of their most profound moments of victory and disappointment unfolded in the oak-paneled courtrooms.

All three are former law clerks who returned to practice here. Bill Jeffress, a partner in the firm of Baker Botts, clerked for Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, who presided over many landmark cases, from Watergate to Iran-contra. In 1971, Jeffress was working in Gesell's chambers when the judge famously ruled that The Washington Post could print the Pentagon Papers, a historical assessment of the Vietnam War that embarrassed the U.S. government.

When Amy was growing up, Gesell was her dad's mentor and "like my second grandfather," she recalled. Two decades later, when she graduated from Yale Law School -- just like her father -- Amy, too, went to clerk for Gesell.

After Gesell's death in 1993, Amy finished her year of clerking with Judge Thomas F. Hogan, now chief judge of the court. Jon followed in Amy's footsteps, clerking for Hogan seven years later.

Jon spent several years as an associate for the Williams & Connolly law firm but decided after consulting with Hogan and Kramer that he would work for the Office of the Federal Public Defender. He said it was a natural fit because as a clerk, "I always found myself rooting for the defense."

Bill, who now typically charges more than $600 an hour, has a reputation as a go-to lawyer for white-collar defendants. He represented President Richard M. Nixon in a case blocking public access to Watergate tape recordings and has won acquittals for such clients as former Tyson Foods executive Archibald R. Schaffer III and former Louisiana governor Edwin W. Edwards (D).

Although their job choices are different, there definitely is a certain Jeffress way about them.

The three share the same Democratic Party leanings. Bill and his wife have long been active in the party. Amy worked in the Justice Department during the Clinton administration with her future husband. And Jon was an advance worker for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

They are all just a little taller than 5 feet -- not by much. They share a self-deprecating manner that the kids attribute to their dad. Amy's more likely to talk about her two sons than the fact that this fall she won the Attorney General's John Marshall Award for excellence in trial work and was on a list of candidates suggested to the White House for D.C. Superior Court judgeships.

In a short break together in the court cafeteria, Bill patted his kids on the back for work that makes the city better. He said he has no pretensions about his job.

"As a defense lawyer, you've got to be kidding yourself if you think you're making the world a better place," the father said.

Amy retorted: "Oh Dad, what you do makes the world better."

"Well," Bill said, "it's very important to at least one person."

The family is close, although not everyone is a lawyer. Mother Judy was a longtime social worker for Adoption Service Information Agency, but Amy joked that she's "pretty much a full-time grandmother and dog walker now." Brother Jeff went to business school so he "could make some real money," Jon deadpanned. But the youngest brother also has artistic skills. Jon remembered when they made a big splash in a Louisiana courtroom where their father was in a trial.

"My brother did this amazing sketch of the entire courtroom scene," Jon recalled. "The only problem was that it showed the judge sleeping during trial, with all of these ZZZZZs coming up and all. But my dad showed it to the judge anyhow -- and the judge thought it was hilarious."

They don't talk about their cases except in general ways, and they make a concerted effort not to be the lawyers opposite each other.

One could say there' s a fourth lawyer in the group: Amy's husband, Casey Cooper. He met Bill before he met Amy. He was an impressive associate at Bill's law firm, which was then Miller Cassidy Larroca & Lewin. Then-Deputy Attorney General Jamie S. Gorelick, a former Miller Cassidy lawyer and friend of Bill's, hired Casey and Amy to work at the Justice Department.

The younger two lawyers got to know each other while working in offices across the hall at Main Justice. Now Casey works with Bill at Baker Botts, sometimes sharing cases.

"Dad never interfered with my love life," Amy insisted. Then she added: "I think Dad would have loved to have me or Jon, or Jeff for that matter, work with him. So it's really nice for him to have Casey there."

The children have appreciated their father's counsel through life. Amy most remembers him saying a lawyer has to know the facts of a case "inside and out." Jon said his father helped him by explaining that the law was about "reasoning your way to the correct rule."

But Jon couldn't resist a parting joke: "Dad prepared for the bar in, like, two days while in the middle of working on the Pentagon Papers case for Judge Gesell, so I tried not to follow his example on that one."

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

D.C. Prosecution: A Ménage À Trois (HILL)

By Arthur Delaney

The Hill, December 6, 2006

In two of this year's most pungent national crime stories — the Duke University rape scandal and the JonBenet Ramsey confession scandal — the next biggest stars, after the DNA, are the DAs. This question often comes up: Will the people vote the district attorney out of office as a result of his or her antics in the case?

To somebody who grew up in Washington, D.C., this perfectly normal question is perfectly foreign. We don't get to elect a district attorney. We don't even have a district attorney's office, another of the many quaint differences between the U.S. and its capital city, where only second-class citizens live.

In July, D.C.'s nonvoting congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), introduced legislation that would create a D.C. district attorney's office.

"No other citizens in the United States are treated so unfairly on this issue of such major importance. My bill would make the DA accountable to the people who elect him or her as elsewhere in the country," Norton is quoted in a July 13 statement released by her office.

Norton's District of Columbia District Attorney Establishment Act of 2006 is going nowhere in the Government Reform Committee. Norton's office had the following comment on the bill's bleak prospects:

"Unfortunately, there was no chance of getting the bill to the floor through the Republican Congress this year. In addition, this DA bill requires an affirmative decision from the mayor and the City Council that they are prepared to take on the additional $50 million annual cost. The third impediment would be opposition by the Justice Department and the administration."

So the local U.S. attorney's office, the largest such office in the country, will continue to be responsible for prosecuting both federal crimes and local crimes committed by adults in the District.

But wait! There's a third horse in this race: The D.C. attorney general's office. Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty and his nominee for attorney general, Linda Singer, have expressed interest in the attorney general's office taking some of our federal prosecutors' local criminal caseload.

All they've got so far, though, is an embarrassing bitch-slap from a federal judge: "How could there even be a thought that they could take that on? The D.C. attorney general's office is not adequately or properly handling the cases it has now," said U.S.

District Judge Royce Lamberth, according to a Nov. 18 Washington Post story. Lamberth was miffed over the office's apparent mishandling of a case against the D.C. police.

Former D.C. U.S. Attorney Roscoe Howard is also a bit skeptical of D.C.'s ability to take on the U.S. attorney office's work: "I know everybody wants home rule … but I'm not sure that fiscally they're ready for it. I don't think they understand how expensive it is," he says. "More power to 'em, I guess."

Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, in his capacity as D.C.'s unelected district attorney, has the totally unique ability to try local thugs either in federal or local court. For our hometown criminals, this is a matter of life or death — even though you won't find the "ultimate penalty" in the D.C. Code and voters rejected a congressionally imposed referendum on execution in 1992, federal prosecutors still can seek it against D.C. criminals if their offenses meet the right criteria.

A federal judge recently ruled that the murder and racketeering charges against Larry Gooch qualify him for a capital trial, set to begin in January. It's a fat chance that a D.C. jury will send any man to die, but if it happens — well, score one for the Feds, I suppose.

Democracy, thy name is public-access television

Every Tuesday at 9 p.m., watch the wildest show on television: "Hear the Real Right Side" on DCTV, starring D.C.'s own James Caviness, a man who proclaims himself "the lone voice of common sense in the District of Columbia" and his show "the most politically incorrect commentary show in the universe."

You'll see a bespectacled Caviness standing at a podium, blasting the "despicable disgrace" of affirmative action and "phony liberals" like Eleanor Holmes Norton. Patriotic music is playing in the background, and Caviness is wearing an American-flag tie. It's just the kind of stuff you would never, ever expect from a black 60-year-old cab driver who lives east of the river.

Caviness is joined by a cast of regular callers, who sometimes sound a little drunk and who often jibe him for his far-right views: "I saw you rakin' leaves on the White House lawn!"

One man who called in on Nov. 28 just seemed baffled: "I ain't never seen a man like white people like you do! I got 10 people in here and we listenin' to this. I'm done!" he exclaimed and then hung up, just like he'd done during the previous show. Caviness was impervious to the ad-homonym, trudging ahead with his tirade against the phony liberal establishment.

How did this man get this way? The obvious answer, at first, is insanity. But Caviness explains his politics with an anecdote from his sophomore year of high school in Florida. He needed glasses so badly that he had moved to the front of the classroom just to be able to read the board. But his parents wouldn't buy him a pair; they thought he only wanted them because he was going with a girl who wore glasses.

"I became convinced I had to do what I had to do to keep from going blind," he says.

So he told his principal that he planned to take three weeks off to earn enough money picking oranges that he could buy spectacles for himself. Not wanting a student to miss so much school, his principal told his parents buy them for him. They did.

Afterwards, Caviness sat his parents down and asked them not to interrupt him (he had spent three or four days composing a little speech).

"I explained to them that what they had done was somewhat inexcusable," he says, "but they had taught me the greatest lesson they could ever teach."

He learned that he could not rely on anybody but himself to do things for him, and that became the basis for his small-government politics. "It was a very eye-opening experience," he says.

He's run for mayor several times. In the most recent election, he started running but decided he'd rather do his show than be a politician. But he still voted for himself.

Caviness has never been a real part of the D.C. Republican party, but he says he knows just how his political career would end if he were. It would be something like what happened in1997 to J.C. Watts, a black Republican ex-congressman from Oklahoma who triggered a round of GOP apologies after he decried "race-hustling poverty pimps" in an apparent jab at Jesse Jackson and Marion Barry.

Caviness says he would do the same thing, but when apology time came he would have a different strategy: "'I don't consider you a race poverty pimp,'" he would say. "'You are a DAMN race poverty pimp!' And then I would tell 'em all to go to hell."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former French Telecom Exec Charged With Costa Rican Bribery (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

MIAMI -- A former top executive for the Latin American business of the French telecommunications giant Alcatel-Lucent faces U.S. corruption charges for allegedly funneling millions of dollars in bribes to Costa Rican officials to win lucrative contracts.

Christian Sapsizian, a 60-year-old French citizen who was a senior vice president for Latin America for Alcatel-Lucent, was free Tuesday on $525,000 bail after making his initial appearance Monday in federal court. Sapsizian is scheduled for arraignment Dec. 18 on a charge of making corrupt payments to a foreign official.

According to an FBI affidavit, Sapsizian agreed in 2000 to make payments to an unnamed senior official with Costa Rica's state-owned telecommunications authority, the Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad, or ICE.

In return, the official would "vote in favor of awarding Alcatel a contract" and provide other valuable assistance, according to the FBI.

Paris-based Alcatel S.A. completed its $11.6 billion acquisition of Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent Technologies Inc. last month, officially assuming the new Alcatel-Lucent name. The allegations involving Sapsizian, who is now retired, were under the former Alcatel S.A. corporate name.

Regine Coqueran, an Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman in Paris, provided a company statement Tuesday saying that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is also investigating payments by the company in foreign countries. The company said it would "cooperate fully in any inquiry or investigation into these matters."

According to U.S. court documents, a subsidiary that handled Costa Rican business, Alcatel CIT, was awarded two contracts worth over $250 million in 2001 and 2002. Before that, according to the FBI, Alcatel CIT had frequently lost out to competitor Sweden's LM Ericsson AB.

The FBI traced $2.4 million payments from Alcatel to the senior ICE official in Costa Rica and $2.56 million to the official's wife. These alleged bribes were routed through a Costa Rican consulting firm hired to assist Alcatel in winning the contracts, using wire transfers from accounts at banks in New York, the Bahamas and Miami.

Sapsizian's attorney, Roy Kahn, said Sapsizian will plead not guilty to the charges and added that companies frequently hire such consulting firms for business ventures in Latin America. The Costa Rican consulting firm was paid some $14 million by Alcatel, according to the FBI.

"It appears that this is an institutionalized means of doing business by international companies in Latin America," Kahn said.

In addition, a cooperating witness told investigators that the ICE official and a Costa Rican government official, also unnamed, "agreed to share whatever bribe payments were made by Sapsizian to the ICE official," according to the FBI affidavit.

The FBI affidavit quotes Sapsizian as telling investigators after his arrest on Nov. 20 at Miami International Airport that "he could not explain" what Alcatel received in return for the money paid to the Costa Rican consulting firm.

The affidavit also says that Sapsizian arranged for a group of ICE officials to stay at a Paris hotel for four or five nights in October 2003 and told an Alcatel employee to pay their bills in company cash. In the later FBI interview, Sapsizian is quoted as telling agents that he wanted to pay cash so he would not "leave a paper trail" and that it was "wrong" to pay these officials' expenses.

Wall Street Wins Ruling Blocking IPO Class Action (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

In a victory for Wall Street securities firms, a federal appeals court said a lawsuit alleging fraud in the pricing of initial public offerings couldn't move forward in its current form as a class action.

DOJ_NMG_0102763

The case alleges that more than 50 Wall Street firms committed fraud by artificially inflating stock prices in IPOs that the firms underwrote in the late 1990s and 2000.

In a ruling, the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said that the trial judge shouldn't have allowed the plaintiffs to pursue the case as a class action, in part because their individual claims are not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. The decision could mean that the thousands of plaintiffs in the litigation will have to take on the banks individually, which is a much more difficult challenge for plaintiffs. "It's a great win," says Vince DiBlasi of Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the lead lawyers for the banks.

"There is no question the court made it hard for us," says Melvyn Weiss, chairman of the executive committee in the litigation, who plans to appeal the ruling. But "this is not necessarily a happy day for the [Wall Street] banks, either," says Mr. Weiss, of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. The Wall Street firms may now be "swamped" with individual suits by some of the class members, who number in the thousands, "if not millions," he said.

Plaintiffs lawyers often believe there are economies of scale to be gained from getting cases to run as class actions.

Lawyers on both sides said it may be possible for the plaintiffs to somehow recast the case so that it could pass muster as a class action, but that that would be difficult to achieve.

In 2003, the plaintiffs announced a settlement with insurers for technology companies that issued more than 300 IPOs. The settlement includes a guaranteed payment of $1 billion that is to be offset in part by any settlement payments from banks. U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin, the trial judge, has yet to approve the settlement.

In April, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to pay $425 million in a settlement. That settlement is also awaiting court approval. It is unclear how yesterday's ruling affects those settlement pacts.

Court Rejects Class Action Against Banks (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Wall Street banks, accused of manipulating the prices of initial public offerings of technology companies during the market boom of the late 1990s and cheating small investors out of hundreds of millions of dollars, will not have to face a huge securities class-action lawsuit, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday.

The decision was seen on Wall Street as a huge victory. The investment banks faced making payments of billions of dollars to settle the accusations — if they chose not to risk a trial — involving potentially millions of investors, lawyers involved in the case said.

The ruling also raises the prospects that earlier settlements in the case, in particular a $425 million agreement with J. P. Morgan Chase and a $1 billion guaranteed proposed deal with the issuers of the new shares that was still pending approval by the judge in the case, could be nullified.

Nearly all firms on Wall Street were touched by the lawsuit. Described by many as the largest consolidated securities class-action case ever, the I.P.O. lawsuit involved more than 300 individual investors, 309 issuers and 55 underwriters, including Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Credit Suisse First Boston.

Yesterday, a three-judge panel of the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan said the federal judge overseeing the lawsuit had erred in granting class-action status to six “focus cases” out of 310 consolidated class actions that claimed fraud on the part of many of the nation’s largest securities underwriters.

That means investors will probably have to pursue their claims individually, in some cases perhaps through arbitration, lawyers involved in the case said.

“It’s a big win with far-reaching implications for the I.P.O. cases and for class actions,” said Gandolfo V. DiBlasi, a lawyer with Sullivan & Cromwell who represented Goldman Sachs and acted as lead liaison for the defendants in the case.

The ruling was a devastating blow to the embattled securities class-action powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, which is a co-leader for the plaintiffs. The firm has been operating under a cloud for months after it was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles in May. The firm and two of its named partners are accused of making $11.3 million in secret payments to entice people to serve as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The firm's co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, however, tried to strike a defiant tone about the ruling.

"It's not over," Mr. Weiss said. "We have the right to seek a review by the entire panel of the Second Circuit, for instance." He also said the ruling affected only the six "focus cases" and that others could satisfy the standards for class-action status.

Still, he added that he was surprised by the ruling.

"I think the decision doesn't reflect a real understanding of how people get defrauded in our society," Mr. Weiss said. "It's just sad that we don't have courts that will recognize the need for judicial approval mechanisms to hold these people accountable."

Notable not only for its sheer size and scope, the public offering case has also been one of the longest running in the class-action landscape and one that has been marked by frequent behind-the-scenes battles among the plaintiffs' lawyers over control.

The lawsuit accused the Wall Street banks of netting huge profits during the technology boom of the late 1990s by artificially inflating the share prices through various means of newly public companies after they went public.

The suit contended that the banks had awarded shares of hot initial offerings to favored clients in return for lucrative investment banking business. It also contended that the banks had made deals with investors so that they would buy shares in the aftermarket to drive up prices artificially and created misleading research to lure investors into buying.

Throughout 2001, thousands of investors filed class-action lawsuits against numerous underwriters and hundreds of issuers. Those lawsuits were later transferred and consolidated by Judge Shira A. Scheindlin in Federal District Court in Manhattan.

What remains unclear is what impact the appeals court ruling may have on two separate settlements that were reached earlier in the case.

In a proposed settlement that is both complicated and extremely unusual, the more than 300 companies, mostly Internet companies, that went public during the boom and are named in the lawsuit, guaranteed the plaintiffs at least $1 billion in recovery from all of the defendants in the case. Approval of that settlement is still pending before Judge Scheindlin.

In April, J. P. Morgan Chase agreed to settle its part of the lawsuit for $425 million. A spokeswoman for J. P. Morgan Chase declined to comment yesterday on the ruling.

But a lawyer involved in the case said it was likely that if the lawsuit did not achieve class-action status, the settlement could be revoked.

Yesterday's ruling was decided by Judges Jon O. Newman, Sonia Sotomayor and Peter W. Hall. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Comverse Ex-CEO May Have Fudged Option Exercise Dates, Not Just Grants (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Kobi Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., fled to Namibia rather than face criminal-fraud charges alleging he fattened his paycheck by backdating his options grants to low points in the company's stock price, making them more valuable.

But Mr. Alexander might have other problems with options, too.

Mr. Alexander reported a 1998 option exercise near a notable low in the company's share price. If the timing of that exercise was backdated, Mr. Alexander could have received a substantial, improper break on his personal income-tax bill.

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage3

The issue has been referred to the special committee of Comverse directors who are examining the company's grant-backdating problem, according to a person familiar with the matter. The timing of the 1998 exercise was noted in a 13-page Nov. 27 report by Gradient Analytics Inc., a Scottsdale, Ariz., research firm that specializes in the analysis of executive compensation, which Gradient believes can affect share prices. The report was distributed to clients including hedge funds and mutual-fund money managers.

Gradient didn't conclude that Mr. Alexander's exercise was backdated, and his favorable timing might have been just a matter of luck. Robert Morvillo, the lawyer who is representing Mr. Alexander, who is fighting extradition from Namibia, declined to comment.

Exercise backdating isn't new. A former executive of Symbol Technologies Inc. pleaded guilty to tax fraud in 2004 in connection with the practice, and Mercury Interactive Corp. has said former executives also engaged in it.

Options typically allow their recipients to buy shares in the future at the price on the day the option is granted, called the "strike price." The exercise date is the day the recipient decides to buy the shares.

The form of backdating that has landed Mr. Alexander and more than 60 other top corporate officials in trouble involves pretending that the options were granted on an earlier date, when share prices were lower. Moving the grant date to a time when the stock was trading at a lower price increases the recipient's potential gain.

By contrast, backdating an exercise date gives the recipient a tax break, thanks to the particular way the Internal Revenue Service treats employee options. Such stock options are generally taxed when the employee exercises them.

The IRS considers the spread between the option's strike price and the shares' market value on the exercise date to be subject to tax as ordinary income. Because most executives exercise their options and sell the shares simultaneously, all of the gain is often taxed this way.

But when the shares aren't sold at the same time as the option is exercised, the difference between the market value of the shares on the date of exercise and any price when the shares are subsequently sold is taxed at the lower capital-gains rate. At the time of the 1998 exercises by Mr. Alexander, the top capital-gains tax rate was 20%, while the top rate on ordinary income was 39.6%.

Mr. Alexander said on a form he filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 9, 1998, that he had exercised the split-adjusted equivalent of 675,000 options two months earlier, on Oct. 9, when Comverse's shares closed at a split-adjusted price of $10 each, just pennies above its lowest closing price of the quarter. He didn't report a sale for that same day.

In the two months between Mr. Alexander's reported exercise date and the date he told the SEC about the exercise, Comverse's share price had risen to $22.92.

Assuming the exercise actually occurred as late as the day of the filing, Gradient wrote that "the possible backdating of this exercise may have reduced the amount subject to ordinary income taxes for CEO Alexander by up to $8.72 million, or almost 60%."

It isn't clear what Mr. Alexander did with the shares he received when he exercised the options. He sold a large batch of Comverse stock in 1999, months after the exercise, at about $68 a share. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market trading yesterday, Comverse shares rose 29 cents, or 1.5%, to $19.88.

The stock closed at $24.29 on March 17, the day before a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal spotlighted an unusual pattern of option grants to Mr. Alexander.

Comverse, a New York telecommunications-software maker, uses an independent broker to administer stock-option exercises, a practice that should make manipulation of the exercise date more difficult. But the company doesn't know whether the broker was used for the 1998 transaction highlighted by Gradient. At that time, the broker wasn't being used by the company on a full-time basis, a person familiar with the matter said.

A Comverse spokesman said a special committee was reviewing "all matters related to this company's stock-option practices." The Gradient analysis doesn't demonstrate that Comverse had a pattern of low exercise dates. The report also doesn't mention possible legitimate reasons for the dates, including chance and the desire of executives to exercise options at low price points and hold the shares.

SEC Attorney Adds To Concerns About Probe Of Hedge Fund Pequot (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A second Securities and Exchange Commission official told Congress he had warned agency officials that "something smells rotten" about the SEC's handling of an insider-trading probe of hedge fund Pequot Capital Management.

The testimony from Eric Ribelin, who works in the office of market surveillance, provides a leg of support for the claims of former SEC enforcement attorney Gary Aguirre.

Mr. Aguirre says he was fired in September 2005 after his supervisors reversed course and stopped him from issuing subpoenas to current Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, whom Mr. Aguirre suspected of tipping off Pequot. SEC officials said they fired Mr. Aguirre because his behavior became erratic and he couldn't get along with his colleagues.

"I have serious misgivings about many decisions made in this investigation," Mr. Ribelin wrote in September 2005 to Robert Hanson, an SEC branch chief who had supervised Mr. Aguirre. "I don't know what all has driven the decisions. Something smells rotten, though."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) called the hearing to air allegations that the Pequot probe was derailed by political influence. The SEC staff closed its investigation of Pequot and Mr. Mack last week without recommending enforcement action. Morgan Stanley has said Mr. Mack, who testified to the SEC this past August, cooperated in the probe.

SEC enforcement director Linda Thomsen, former SEC associate enforcement director Paul Berger, SEC assistant director Mark Kreitman and Mr. Hanson joined forces to testify under oath yesterday that their probe of Pequot wasn't derailed for political reasons. The SEC enforcement attorneys said they hadn't had enough information to make it worthwhile to subpoena Mr. Mack.

The Judiciary Committee, together with the Senate Finance Committee, will release a report early next year that summarizes the evidence they have gathered through a congressional investigation. The SEC staff always has the option of reopening the Pequot probe. However, that is deemed unlikely because it would suggest that the SEC's enforcement investigations are steered by Congress, undercutting its status as an independent agency.

In an interview after the hearing, Mr. Specter said that "I think that there was totally insufficient justification for the firing of [Mr.] Aguirre." He said that they "manufactured a reevaluation as the basis for firing him." Mr. Specter said he planned to study the transcript to determine "where we go next."

"At best, this is a demonstration of very lax and inadequate enforcement by the SEC, and at worst, they have not pursued the evidence which was talked about relating to [Mr.] Mack" and Pequot chief Arthur Samberg, Mr. Specter said.

S.E.C. Calls Pequot Study Thorough (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — Senior officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission vigorously defended the commission's investigation of a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management, telling the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday that its inquiry was professional, thorough and untainted by outside political influence.

DOJ_NMG_0102767

In their first detailed public comments about the investigation of Pequot, four current or former S.E.C. supervisors took aim at their former colleague and chief accuser, Gary J. Aguirre, saying his allegations that the agency had pulled its punches were unfounded and came from a fired employee whose temperament and judgment had caused problems in the office.

"He treated his colleagues with disrespect bordering on contempt," said Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the S.E.C. "His investigation of Pequot was poorly thought out, disorganized, and sloppily documented."

The testimony by S.E.C. officials, including the agency's inspector general, was met with considerable skepticism by Senator Arlen Specter, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Finance Committee. Both panels are investigating the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of the Pequot inquiry.

"At a minimum, it is very, very troubling what the S.E.C. has done here," Senator Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said, citing conflicting accounts of Mr. Aguirre's conduct and what he said was a long delay in taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive. "We are not finished with this, ladies and gentlemen."

Mr. Aguirre had previously told Congress that the Pequot investigation, which he led, was derailed in the summer of 2005 after his supervisors blocked him from taking testimony from Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's re-election campaign.

Senator Grassley saved his most biting comments for the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, pointing out that the inspector general had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre before concluding that his charges were unfounded.

"Just calling up people accused of wrongdoing and asking them if they did it is not my idea of an investigation," Senator Grassley said.

Senator Specter said the inspector general's investigation was at best lax and at worst had the "overtone of a cover-up."

Mr. Stachnik said his staff did not need to interview Mr. Aguirre because it had ample evidence from other sources to reach its conclusion. Mr. Stachnik eventually reopened his investigation, but in doing so he has raised new questions.

Senator Grassley accused Mr. Stachnik of trying to intimidate future whistleblowers by subpoenaing Mr. Aguirre's communications with Senate investigators.

Asked why he had done so, Mr. Stachnik said he could not answer the question because the Justice Department advised him not to discuss the matter. That prompted Senator Grassley to say in a rising voice, "You may be playing footsy with an executive branch of government that wants to curb congressional inquiry, even beyond this one."

The S.E.C. had been investigating a number of profitable trades by the hedge fund in advance of mergers or other market-moving news. The commission eventually interviewed Mr. Mack and closed its investigation last week without filing an enforcement action. Both Mr. Mack and Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg, have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

Mr. Aguirre's tenure at the S.E.C. was a troubled one, said his former supervisors, who in addition to Mr. Kreitman were Robert B. Hanson, a branch chief; Linda Thomsen, the agency's director of enforcement; and Paul R. Berger, a former associate director of enforcement. They said they could now respond publicly to Mr. Aguirre's charges because the Pequot case was no longer active.

Mr. Kreitman said Mr. Aguirre had become increasingly erratic, throwing tantrums and "storming down the halls in a furious crouch."

Ms. Thomsen called Mr. Aguirre's supervisors "smart, dedicated and honorable" officials who were not afraid to follow evidence wherever it might lead, even if it implicated "captains of industry."

Mr. Hanson said Mr. Aguirre reached conclusions not supported by evidence, and cited Mr. Aguirre's examination of Mr. Samberg of Pequot. "It was reported to me that Mr. Aguirre behaved unprofessionally and was extremely disorganized during the testimony," Mr. Hanson said.

Senator Grassley challenged that assertion. Noting that Mr. Hanson had not been at the examination, the senator said a completely different conclusion about Mr. Aguirre's conduct had been reached by L. Hilton Foster, one of the S.E.C.'s most-respected experts on insider trading.

Senator Grassley said Mr. Foster, who had attended the examination, told Senate investigators that Mr. Aguirre's questioning had elicited "dynamite stuff," and that he intended to use the hearing transcript to train new attorneys.

Mr. Hanson said he had not spoken with Mr. Foster before reaching his conclusion.

Senator Specter said the S.E.C.'s harsh criticism of Mr. Aguirre did not square with the favorable job evaluations from his supervisors. In response, Mr. Kreitman said S.E.C. officials came to believe that they had been "overly generous" and decided to add a second, more critical evaluation.

That evaluation was not shared with Mr. Aguirre and was put in his file after he left the agency.

"It looks like that negative evaluation was created only after Aguirre started complaining," Senator Grassley said.

In a statement after the hearing, the senator added, "Neither the S.E.C. nor the inspector general can get around the fact that there is little or no documentary evidence to support the supervisors' claims about Mr. Aguirre."

The senior S.E.C. officials who testified Tuesday said politics played no role in the Pequot investigation. "I certainly knew that Mr. Mack was a very high profile individual, but I had no idea until I read in The New York Times recently about Mr. Mack's political connections," Mr. Hanson said.

S.E.C. officials said they had turned down Mr. Aguirre's request to interview Mr. Mack at the time because he had not made a strong enough case for doing so, and they pointed out that at no time was there any evidence that Mr. Mack had access to information that could have constituted insider trading.

Eric Ribelin, an S.E.C. official who had worked on the Pequot case, testified that he had been "stunned and outraged" by Mr. Aguirre's firing.

"Something smells rotten," he wrote in an e-mail message to one of his supervisors. "I'm nonplussed by issues big and small about the course of events going back to January."

Asked what he meant, Mr. Ribelin said Mr. Aguirre did not receive the support he needed within the S.E.C. to aggressively pursue his investigation.

Greenberg Firm, AIG Agree To Settle Some Legal Cases (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

American International Group Inc. and C.V. Starr & Co., a firm led by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, are settling multiple legal cases.

Mr. Greenberg left AIG last year amid an accounting probe. He has denied any wrongdoing in a resulting civil case.

After Mr. Greenberg's departure, AIG terminated its relationship with insurance agencies controlled by C.V. Starr, which was headed by Mr. Greenberg when he ran AIG and sold commercial policies to large clients. Among other things, the firms have argued about who could use the "Starr" and "American International" trademarks. Under the settlement, AIG won't use the Starr or related names in doing insurance business, and C.V. Starr won't use certain AIG-related names.

The settlement doesn't resolve a dispute over billions of dollars in AIG shares held by investment vehicle Starr International Co. Mr. Greenberg is chairman of Starr International.

The terms of the settlement are confidential, the companies said. A spokesman for AIG said it includes "no monetary payment that is material to AIG's financial disclosures." Of his work at C.V. Starr, Mr. Greenberg said yesterday the company has opened offices in recent months in London and Hong Kong and has invested hundreds of millions of dollars since he left AIG.

C.V. Starr and Starr International are represented by David Boies, of Boies, Schiller & Flexner LLP. AIG's lead attorney in the case is Michael Carlinsky, of Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges LLP.

Suspect In Siemens Case Claims Executives Had A Role In Bribes (WSJ)

By David Crawford In Berlin And Mike Esterl In Frankfurt

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Siemens AG's troubles with a fraud investigation look set to grow, after a suspect gave German investigators details of a bribes-for-business scheme and alleged senior officials at the conglomerate were involved.

Munich prosecutors say they are investigating allegations that officials at Siemens' telecommunications division diverted at least €200 million ($266.6 million) to a slush fund held at banks in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein for use to pay bribes. Authorities searched offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November.

On Friday, prosecutors ordered the release of Reinhard Sickzek, 56 years old, a former sales official in the Siemens telecoms division, after he provided details of a system of bribes paid to potential customers in Africa, Russia and the Middle East, according to Mr. Sickzek's lawyer, Wolfgang Kreuzer. Mr. Sickzek also named at least one board member in the Siemens telecoms division as the supervisor of the scheme, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Mr. Sickzek's statement to Munich prosecutors, which encompasses hundreds of pages, raises questions about Siemens's determination to prevent corruption. Mr. Sickzek told police that a member of the Siemens Compliance Department advised him on how to prevent detection of the bribery operation.

Siemens says it is cooperating in the investigation as a witness.

Siemens, Europe's largest engineering company by sales, has attributed the alleged fraud to "individual acts" but also has said it is reviewing its compliance procedures and recently hired an ombudsman.

A spokesman at the Munich-based company declined to comment yesterday on Mr. Sickzek's statement, citing the continuing investigation.

Few details from Mr. Sickzek's statement, reported on Saturday in the Süddeutsche Zeitung and confirmed yesterday, are available.

A prosecutor said Mr. Sickzek was released because he provided important assistance and laid to rest any concerns he would attempt to damage the investigation.

A spokesman for the Munich prosecutors office declined to comment. Mr. Sickzek wasn't available for comment, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

In his statement, Mr. Sickzek told prosecutors he had expected his arrest since November 2004 when he was contacted by Liechtenstein prosecutors about the movement of funds at a bank in Vaduz. Prior to his arrest, he began collecting files, memos, bank receipts and legal documents that would assist the investigation, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

Among the documents were a series of falsified contracts and invoices used to divert €70 million to €100 million per year through a network of accounts and shell companies in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein, according to Mr. Sickzek's statement, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Mr. Sickzek provided details of how the system of slush funds was organized at Siemens and who was in the know, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

Mr. Sickzek is likely to be a key witness against his accomplices should the case go to trial, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Robert Wallner, senior prosecutor in Valduz, Liechtenstein, says his office opened an investigation of a suspected attempt to defraud Siemens in November 2004 after a bank reported €7.6 million withdrawn from one Siemens account in cash and then deposited in cash in a second account several days later.

Mr. Wallner said he continued his investigation even after a Siemens lawyer requested he close it because Siemens hadn't been defrauded. "We are still investigating to see whether the claim is true," Mr. Wallner said.

Countrywide Settles With Spitzer (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Countrywide Financial Corp., one of the nation's largest home-mortgage lenders, has settled an inquiry by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, into alleged discriminatory pricing practices and agreed to establish a $3 million consumer-education fund and implement other reforms.

The settlement comes as other banks involved in the inquiry continue to resist Mr. Spitzer's efforts to obtain information about their lending practices.

Mr. Spitzer launched the inquiry into lending by seven large banks -- including Citigroup Inc., HSBC Holdings PLC, and Wells Fargo & Co. -- in April 2005. Mr. Spitzer was elected governor of New York in November and takes office next month.

The inquiry began after a review of federal Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data showed that black and Latino customers were more likely than whites to receive high-priced loans in New York in 2004.

Mr. Spitzer sent the banks letters seeking loan-pricing data, such as credit scores, used to set interest rates and fees.

The banks sued Mr. Spitzer, contending that as federally-chartered institutions they are shielded from state scrutiny. A federal district court sided with the banks, whose position was backed by the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which joined the suit. The case is on appeal before the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan.

Announcing the Countrywide settlement, Mr. Spitzer criticized the OCC for siding with the banks.

"We wish that OCC would expend as much effort examining the pricing practices of the national banks it regulates as it has devoted to protecting these banks from our fair lending inquiries," he said in a statement.

Under the settlement, Countrywide agreed to compensate minority borrowers improperly steered toward higher-cost loans. The total amount of compensation hasn't been determined yet.

Countrywide Financial, based in Calabasas, Calif., also agreed to improve training for loan officers and provide detailed reporting to the attorney general's office to ensure compliance. It also agreed to pay the state $200,000 to cover investigation costs.

"Countrywide and Attorney General Spitzer share a common goal: to assure that all individuals who apply for a mortgage loan receive equal treatment, and that any pricing differences should be based on credit, property and other risk factors," said a statement from Rick Wentz, senior managing director and chief ethics officer for Countrywide.

Countrywide Reaches Deal After Bias Probe (WP)

By Kathleen Day, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Countrywide Financial Corp., the nation's largest mortgage lender, will compensate as many as 4,500 black and Hispanic borrowers under an agreement announced yesterday with New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer.

The agreement ends the attorney general's probe of Countrywide for possible violations of fair-lending laws that Spitzer said were suggested by patterns in mortgage data collected each year by the federal government. Spitzer's office examined mortgages made in 2004.

Countrywide, which denied any wrongdoing, has agreed to review the loans in question to make sure the customers were charged the same rate as white borrowers with similar financial histories. The company made 20,000 mortgages in New York in 2004, including the 4,500 to black and Hispanic borrowers.

Neither the company nor Spitzer knows how much will be repaid until Countrywide's review is complete, but company spokesman Rick Simon said it wouldn't involve many loans or much money. "We do not think there will be a lot of payments. We do not expect this to have great impact," he said. He declined to be more specific.

The Calabasas, Calif., company said it consented to the agreement to avoid the cost and inconvenience of a longer investigation by Spitzer's office and possible litigation. The agreement also requires Countrywide to pay $200,000 to cover the cost of Spitzer's probe, beef up monitoring of its lending practices and invest $3 million in consumer education.

Allen Fishbein, housing and credit expert for Consumer Federation of America, praised the agreement for requiring Countrywide to monitor not only the loans it originates but also those it buys from mortgage brokers. He said it could be a model for other state and federal regulators, who are combing through the same federal loan data for evidence of discrimination.

Major mortgage lenders, including Wells Fargo, J.P. Morgan Chase, Citigroup and HSBC Holdings, went to court to block Spitzer from probing their lending practices. The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency has supported the banks, a stance Spitzer is challenging.

Congress May Soon Make 'Pretexting' A Federal Crime (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Spurred by the Hewlett Packard Co. scandal, Congress is moving toward passing legislation this week that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval.

The measure targets so-called "pretexting" tactics, where investigators use various schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy earlier this year in a now-infamous investigation into who leaked information to reporters.

About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there's currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P executive Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws.

The federal legislation under consideration, which passed the House in April and may clear the Senate before Congress adjourns for the year, would make pretexting for phone records a federal crime, and spell out new federal criminal penalties for both those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records.

Individuals and organizations that purchase confidential records -- knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent -- could be subject to fines of up to $500,000 and imprisonment for up to five years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes, or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen.

The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies.

Until recently, telephone pretexting has existed in a murky legal realm, and federal regulators and state attorneys general have often been forced to bring cases under general consumer protection or antifraud statutes.

Noting the lack of federal protections against the practice, House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wisc.) said yesterday: "We recognized this loophole long ago, but Hewlett Packard made it a front burner issue. And if we fail to pass this now, it just gives people an opportunity to do what Hewlett Packard did again and try to get away with it."

The legislation moving through Congress doesn't go as far as some consumer advocates want. It doesn't compel phone companies to beef up security procedures, and it doesn't give the Federal Trade Commission the power to levy civil fines. While the Justice Department would have the power to enforce criminal penalties, the FTC's hands would remain tied.

In a recent telephone-pretexting enforcement sweep, for example, the FTC targeted companies that advertised their ability to obtain confidential phone records, alleging "unfair and deceptive" violations of marketing laws.

But the FTC doesn't have the clear authority to go after the shadier investigative firms that actually acquired the phone logs for those companies, and still would not under the proposed law.

Consumer advocates characterized the bill moving through Congress as a good start, but said they will continue pushing for broader measures. "It's a good first step," said Rob Douglas, an information-security consultant who runs the privacytoday.com Web site. "If we're going to get anything done in these closing moments of Congress, this is the only bill that has a chance."

Because of the bill's narrow provisions, most of the industries affected said they support the measure. "We need stiff penalties to deter criminals from pursuing this trade," said Joe Farren, spokesman for CITA-The Wireless Association, a trade group for cellular carriers. Mr. Farren said phone pretexting is already illegal under general fraud statutes, and noted that every major phone carrier has filed lawsuits against pretexters.

Many private investigators distinguish pretexting for phone and other confidential records from other, more general forms of pretexting -- such as pretending to be someone's brother-in-law to find out if they live at a certain address when investigating a child-abduction case. They say they support the penalties for those seeking confidential information -- and say few companies do that anymore. The recent attention paid to telephone pretexting has driven many Web sites advertising the service offline. "I don't know anyone that goes near it anymore," said Joseph Biondo, a private investigator in Forest Hills, NY.

Pretexting to obtain financial records is already illegal under previous federal legislation.

The House approved the proposed phone legislation long before the H-P scandal, but the bill then languished for months amid jockeying between the Senate Commerce and Judiciary committees. Both panels supported action, but the Commerce bill went beyond the Judiciary bill by creating a set of civil penalties and giving a greater enforcement role for the Federal Trade Commission and Federal Communications Commission. But consumer advocates were concerned that the Commerce bill would pre-empt tougher state laws.

In September, Mr. Sensenbrenner appealed to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) to break the logjam. This week, the leadership began pursuing a strategy of simply calling up the House bill and sending it to President Bush for his signature.

Given the late hour -- Congress is due to adjourn this week -- it could yet be blocked by an individual senator seeking leverage on some other legislation. Late yesterday, Republican aides said Arizona Sen. John McCain was threatening to block the measure unless an unrelated bill establishing a federal boxing commission was added. Mr. McCain's office did not respond to requests for comment.

Democrats said that none of their members objected and both Republican Sens. Ted Stevens and Arlen Specter, the departing chairmen of the Commerce and Judiciary Committees, have endorsed the decision to proceed along these lines.

In appealing for action, Mr. Sensenbrenner was joined by Rep. Howard Berman (D., Cal.) and Rep. Lama Smith (R., Tex.), senior members of the House Judiciary panel. In a letter to Mr. Frist in September, the three lawmakers noted the HP disclosures and that outside counsel to the company had reportedly suggested that the use of pretexting services is not clearly illegal.

"The time has come to clearly and unambiguously make such activity illegal," Chairman Sensenbrenner and his colleagues wrote.

SEC Plans Database To Stem Illegal Hedge-Fund Trading (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Jesse Westbrook And David Scheer

Bloomberg, December 6, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission plans to have a database in place by next year that will help it crack down on hedge-fund insider trading, a senior agency official said.

``The SEC presently does not have an electronic system to aggregate referrals based on the identities of the specific traders involved," SEC Enforcement Director Linda Thomsen said before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. ``We anticipate implementing a new case tracking system by mid-2007."

Illegal trading by hedge funds ``remains a substantial concern" to the SEC as the $1.3 trillion industry's influence over financial markets grows, Thomsen said. Hedge funds, which are loosely regulated private pools of capital, manage about 5 percent of U.S. assets and account for about 30 percent of U.S. equity trading volume.

Today's hearing is the third convened by Senator Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee's chairman, in six months to examine oversight of insider trading. The Pennsylvania Republican circulated draft legislation aimed at halting illegal buying and selling of stocks that would require hedge funds accepting money from pension funds to submit to random inspections by the SEC.

His measure would also force hedge funds, which allow managers to participate substantially in the gains of money invested, to set up ethics codes and compliance programs and allow the Justice Department to give private citizens rewards for helping in prosecutions of insider trading cases.

``Light regulation, secrecy, unregulated recordkeeping and limited compliance programs of hedge funds increase the difficulty of detecting and proving insider trading," according to Specter's legislation, which hasn't been introduced.

NYSE Effort

The New York Stock Exchange and the NASD, which refer data about suspicious buying and selling to the SEC, are coordinating efforts to share information about hedge funds, Robert Marchman, head of market surveillance for the NYSE, said in an interview.

The agencies plan to build out a database with information detailing relationships between hedge funds and other ``financial business-related entities" in an effort to uncover illegal trading, he said.

Lawsuits involving hedge funds made up 11 percent of the SEC's insider trading cases in fiscal 2006, according to agency figures. The SEC expects to file more cases against the industry alleging illegal trading in 2007, Thomsen has said.

The SEC sued Wynnefield Capital Inc. Managing Partner Nelson Obus in April, alleging three hedge funds he runs made $1.34 million after getting a tip about the merger of Allied Capital Corp. and SunSource Inc.

In May, hedge fund Deephaven Capital Management LLC agreed to pay $5.7 million to settle allegations that it profited from trades made before 19 private investments in public equity offerings that were about to be announced.

`Increasing Pressure'

``The increasing role played by hedge funds and the expectation of consistent, market-beating returns could lead to increasing pressure on fund managers to deliver by any means, such as riskier investments, or worse, illegal trading on inside information," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley said at the hearing.

Specter held today's hearing, in part, to continue probing allegations by former SEC attorney Gary Aguirre that his investigation of insider trading at hedge fund Pequot Capital Management Inc. was stymied for political reasons. Thomsen denied Aguirre's claims, telling Specter and Grassley that the ``enforcement division does not pull its punches."

Specter's legislation would restore elements of SEC rules struck down by a federal appeals court in June that required hedge-fund advisers to register with the agency. While Specter said today that he plans to introduce the measure, he doesn't expect Congress will take it up before the end of the year.

Amaranth Collapse

Lawmakers became concerned that the lack of hedge-fund oversight could put retiree money at risk after pension funds were stung by the collapse of Amaranth Advisers LLC. The Greenwich, Connecticut-based hedge fund lost $6.5 billion in September on bad natural gas trades.

Regulators should double the amount of net worth required to invest in hedge funds to $2 million to protect unsophisticated investors, Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal told the judiciary panel today. Currently, individuals can also invest in hedge funds if they had income of $200,000 for each of the past two years, a requirement that should be raised to $500,000, he suggested.

``A small investor in my view would be anyone who can't afford to lose the amount invested," Blumenthal said. ``Raising the net worth or income levels for participation in hedge funds is one of the single most important steps that this committee or the SEC could take to raise the bar."

The SEC will consider proposing at a Dec. 13 public meeting that the amount of wealth needed to invest in hedge funds be increased. The agency hasn't specified how it might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors.

Deadlock Broken On Revising Audit Rule (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Proposal to Rein In Accounting Costs

Regulators have reached an agreement in principle on how to revamp a contentious accounting rule that cost businesses millions of dollars more than anticipated, removing a pair of major stumbling blocks attacked by consumer advocates.

The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, plans to meet Dec. 19 to present its revised version of the regulation, officials said yesterday. The rule, which mandates that auditors review corporate financial controls, is the most disputed part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress in 2002 after frauds at Enron and WorldCom.

Businesses had objected to the cost of complying with the law's stricter audit provision. The accounting board's chairman, Mark Olson, said the new proposed guidance, which attempts to focus auditors on areas of highest risk, would more closely align the costs of the measure with its benefits.

Accounting board officials had clashed with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission over the issue in recent weeks. But a visit to the board's office Friday by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox helped put the process back on track.

Cox had floated the idea of requiring small companies to develop financial controls, which help prevent fraud and mistakes, but forcing auditors to test the controls only on a narrow and limited basis, in a memo that was leaked two weeks ago. But investor groups howled that the proposal would gut the law.

That idea now appears to be off the table, in part because of a report issued last week by a panel supported by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, funded by business interests, advocated a broad overhaul of U.S. regulation and urged new protections against shareholder lawsuits. But the panel rejected the notion that small companies could evade regular testing of their internal controls.

Accounting board and SEC officials also appear to have resolved another obstacle. Under a proposal in Cox's leaked memo, thousands of companies already complying with the rule might have won an exemption because of the way the proposal defined a small business. But the new draft calls for auditors to take into account both the size of a company and the complexity of its business and accounting practices. That way, a small business that handles complex financial instruments known as derivatives, for instance, would get more stringent review.

The SEC is set to issue new guidance for corporate managers at a public meeting next week, and the accounting board is to lay out its proposed changes a week later. Officials at both agencies cautioned that certain technical details remain to be resolved and the agreement may yet founder.

Given the importance of the issue to investors and the continued urging by key lawmakers from both political parties to lighten the burden on businesses, the incentive is for regulators to settle the matter quickly.

Investor advocates said they are following the debate with interest, but they preferred to reserve comment until they could review the specific proposals. The rule is complex, and it may be difficult to grasp its implications without a close reading of the language, they added.

The revisions will be "critical in transforming [the rule] from one of the most troublesome parts of Sarbanes-Oxley to one of the most meaningful parts of the act," SEC Commissioner Paul S. Atkins, a Republican, said at a public meeting Monday.

Likewise, Commissioner Roel C. Campos, a Democrat, said that the end product "will balance very well investor protection while also creating a better environment for efficient audits of internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Renzi Reports Death Threats, Gunshots At Office (AZREP)

By Billy House, Republic Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Rick Renzi says the FBI is investigating several "death threats" directed at him, as well as incidents of gunshots and other vandalism to his Flagstaff office.

"I'm very concerned about a series of calls we've gotten - one we're taking very seriously," said the Arizona Republican, in an interview today.

A Justice Department official in Phoenix would neither confirm nor deny a pending investigation into the incidents described by Renzi.

Renzi, who was elected to his third term on Nov. 7, said incidents of vandalism dates from several months ago, and include instances of golf balls and firecrackers thrown at his congressional offices.

But concerns over the vandalism heightened last week, after gunshots were fired at the congressional office on North San Francisco Street, either late on Nov. 28 or early Nov. 29.

Along with the vandalism, there's been a series of threatening telephone calls to the office, including death threats to the congressman, said Renzi.

One call, in particular, is prompting the most concern. Renzi declined to provide the details of that message.

The FBI is conducting interviews regarding the calls and the shooting, Renzi said.

"These incidents are having a cumulative effect on our people (staffers)," said Renzi. "We are seriously looking at the possibly having to move into a more-secure building."

Aleppo Man Indicted In Murder-for-hire Case (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 6, 2006

What began as an extramarital affair for an Aleppo man is now a federal criminal case that could cost him his life.

Grand jurors in Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday indicted Eugene Talik Jr. on a murder-for-hire charge in the death of his lover, Kelly Jo Elliott.

Mr. Talik, 38, also was charged with conspiracy and interstate domestic violence. The grand jury alleges that he hired an acquaintance to kill Ms. Elliott, 28, so word of their affair would never reach his wife.

Prosecutors say Mr. Talik himself strangled Ms. Elliott after the man he hired decided he could not go through with the killing.

The second man has not been identified by federal prosecutors or the grand jury. He is cooperating with the U.S. attorney's staff in Wheeling as it prepares its case against Mr. Talik.

Mr. Talik could face a sentence of life in prison or death if he is convicted. For prosecutors to pursue a capital case against him, they would need approval from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Mr. Gonzales earlier this year authorized the death penalty in a case similar to the one against Mr. Talik. It involves Donna Moonda, of Hermitage in Mercer County, who is charged with hiring a man to murder her husband, a wealthy physician.

Investigators say Mr. Talik killed Ms. Elliott the night of May 25. The indictment alleges that Mr. Talik told her they would be taking a camping trip over the Memorial Day weekend. After they had packed, they drove in separate vehicles to the truck stop at the Dallas Pike exit of Interstate 70, where the other man was waiting.

The second man told prosecutors he hit Ms. Elliott with a pipe, but the blow did not kill her. At that point, he said, he decided he could not take her life.

Prosecutors allege that Mr. Talik then attacked and strangled Ms. Elliott, a mother of two small boys. The indictment alleges that he killed her in the moving van he drove for a living.

An arrest warrant for Mr. Talik said he and his accomplice then drove Ms. Elliott's body across the West Virginia line and into Pennsylvania. The killers set her body afire and buried her remains in a shallow grave in Elk County, prosecutors said.

Mr. Talik is in jail without bail in West Virginia. Prosecutors will not say where the second suspect is being held.

Boot Lawyer Off Case, Feds Urge (SLT UT)

Salt Lake Tribune, December 5, 2006

Davis scandal

Prosecutors are seeking to disqualify the lawyer for a Layton couple accused of stealing federal grant money from Davis School District, claiming he gave legal advice to witnesses in the criminal investigation.

The defense attorney, Paul Gotay, denies that his actions have caused a legal conflict that would require him to step down and is fighting to continue his representation of Susan G. Ross and John D. Ross.

"My head was put in the vise, and they tried to squeeze it," Gotay said Monday after a hearing in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, where the disqualification motion was discussed. "It's a good thing I have a hard head."

Magistrate Brooke Wells has set a hearing for Monday to hear arguments on the disqualification motion and Gotay's request for transcripts of grand jury testimony by the witnesses.

In the disqualification motion, filed late Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that as early as May 2005, Gotay appeared with the Rosses at the office of the FBI, the agency investigating the alleged fraud that drained the district of millions in Title I money meant to help disadvantaged students.

Then, when agents attempted to interview two witnesses they believed had knowledge of the scheme - Keith Evans and Terry Applegate - both men said Gotay was their attorney, the motion said.

In addition, Gotay himself, by engaging in "multiple financial transactions with the defendants," has personal knowledge relevant to the case and is likely to be a witness in the prosecution, according to the motion.

Gotay has said the attempt to disqualify him stems from the fact that the Rosses paid him a fixed fee for his representation after they came under investigation in the spring of 2005. The couple's assets were frozen when they were indicted Nov. 21 by a federal grand jury.

On Monday, Gotay repeated his assertion that he will represent the Rosses no matter what. Because they have paid him, the government has also frozen his assets, he said.

"The government deems it necessary to have me removed because I was willing to represent them free of charge as needed," he said. "When all legal avenues fail . . . personal attack is the name of the game."

Gotay also said he will file a motion asking that Wells be removed from the case because she appears to have decided already to disqualify him. The magistrate said during the hearing she has no opinion yet on the matter and declined to recuse herself.

The Rosses have pleaded not guilty to 47 counts of theft, fraud, copyright infringement and money laundering against them. Stella V. Smith - Susan Ross' former secretary at the district - also has pleaded not guilty after being charged in a separate indictment with 37 counts of mail fraud for allegedly taking more than $300,000 in payment on fake invoices.

Prosecutors did not seek to keep any of the three behind bars in the months leading up to their trials, scheduled in February. But all three were required to surrender their passports and keep in contact with the court's pretrial services officers.

Wells ruled at Monday's hearing to leave the same release conditions in place.

The indictment accuses the couple of selling photocopies of books to schools that receive federal Title I funding at vastly inflated prices through an intermediary company, which kept a small percentage of the profit and paid the rest to a company allegedly owned by Susan and John Ross. Money allegedly taken from 2000 to 2005 amounts to $4.3 million, but officials say the scam may have begun as early as 1985.

The intermediary company is Research and Development (R&D), which is run by Evans and Applegate, according to court records. The records say the two men, who are not charged in the case, are prosecution witnesses.

Smith is accused of creating phony invoices for books that were never ordered and never delivered. She allegedly collected $338,000 from 1999 to 2005.

The Davis district first detected something was amiss with its Title I programs in spring 2005 after implementing a new review system. Authorities were contacted immediately, said Timothy FuhrÃ¸man, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office, which investigated the matter along with the U.S. Department of Education Office of Inspector General, the IRS and Farmington police.

Susan Ross, who was employed by the district beginning in the 1970s, was director of federal programs before she retired in spring 2005. John Ross is the former Title I specialist for the Utah Office of Education and worked as a grant specialist for the Davis district from March 2000 to February 2005.

The maximum penalty for mail fraud and money laundering is 20 years in prison; for theft, 10 years; and for copyright violations, five years.

The U.S. Department of Education is working on its own Office of Inspector General and the Justice Department to determine whether officials at the district or state level might also be held liable, spokesman Jim Bradshaw said.

Generally in such cases, prosecutors request restitution, which the judge determines at sentencing. The Ross charges include a "notice of intent to seek criminal forfeiture" for the nearly $4.3 million and all ill-gotten assets.

Rather than waiting for the trial's conclusion, possible "administrative steps" are being discussed now, Bradshaw said, although he declined to elaborate on whether those actions might target state or district overseers.

Davis district spokesman Chris Williams said "it would be really tough" for the district to come up with the money to repay what allegedly was stolen. The district currently has less than $3.5 million in reserves, he said.

Among schemes to defraud the department, the Davis charges aren't unique. In its latest semiannual report to Congress, three of five cases reported by the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Inspector General echoed aspects of the Davis fiasco.

In West Virginia, a former financial manager embezzled more than $1.3 million in state Title I funds. The official was sentenced to more than five years in prison and ordered to pay $1.5 million in restitution.

Investigations in Georgia and Minnesota also uncovered scams to funnel federal money to front companies. The conspirators were sentenced to serve up to eight years in prison and pay back most of the money.

Stolen Car A Hoax; Mom's Boyfriend Charged In Boy's Death (AP)

By Jay Reeves

DOJ_NMG_0102777

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - A north Alabama woman who claimed that someone stole a car with her 5-year-old son asleep in the back seat was charged Tuesday afternoon with hindering prosecution, and her boyfriend was charged with capital murder in the boy's death.

An Amber Alert was issued Monday morning when Shalinda Glass reported that her son had been abducted outside an Albertville convenience store. A massive search was conducted by police and members of the FBI and the Alabama Bureau of Investigation.

It turns out Glass was lying.

Etowah County Sheriff James Hayes said the body of the boy, Geontae Glass, was discovered in the pre-dawn hours inside the missing Nissan Altima, which had been parked in a closed garage at a house in rural Etowah County.

He said Glass, 25, of Rainbow City, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles, who is believed to own the house where the body was found, were arrested early Tuesday morning at Towles' apartment in Rainbow City. They were both being held in the Etowah County jail Tuesday night.

Hayes said Glass told police that her son, who was in kindergarten, died from a beating after he brought home a bad progress report from school Friday.

Authorities were trying to determine jurisdiction, but believed the child was killed in Etowah County, where the mother lives, and that the alleged cover-up was committed in neighboring Marshall County, where the car theft was reported.

Marshall County District Attorney Steve Marshall said investigators believe the dead child was in the car when his mother went to the store and went inside with her 7-year-old daughter.

Towles was believed to be the "main player" in the death of the boy, Hayes said in an interview. Authorities aren't sure exactly what happened, he said, but Towles has a criminal record and appeared to be "an abusive boyfriend of the mother."

Glass reported Monday morning that her car was stolen with her son asleep in the back seat in the parking lot of a convenience store in Albertville in neighboring Marshall County. Witnesses reported seeing a man get out of a pickup truck and get into the vehicle before driving away as someone else drove off in the pickup truck.

Authorities took the pickup truck driver into custody Tuesday for questioning. Police decided not to charge him because they believe he didn't know what was happening, Marshall said.

Hayes said the pickup truck has been found and the driver was taken into custody for questioning. No charges were filed, but he said the investigation was ongoing.

"We do expect others to be arrested," he said.

Towles has several residences, Hayes said, and investigators searching his home in Albertville discovered evidence that led them to the house in Etowah County. Besides the body, officers found more than $30,000 in cash, a small amount of cocaine, marijuana residue and weapons including an AK-47, Hayes said.

"We believe this is what he thought was his safe house, where nobody knew where he was," Hayes said.

Hayes said both the time and cause of the boy's death were yet to be determined.

Alabama state troopers and Albertville police had issued an Amber Alert for the boy, who was said to be last seen in his mother's light blue 1994 Altima. Hayes said the suspects could have tried to dispose of the car - with the body inside - if not for the public being put on alert for the vehicle.

"The Amber Alert was absolutely critical in this case," he said.

Gina Keeton, a clerk at the Albertville store, said she saw Glass crying hysterically in the parking lot after she left the store.

"When I asked her what was wrong, she said someone had taken her child and her car," Keeton said.

Beside being accused in the boy's slaying, Towles will be charged with drug offenses and being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm, the sheriff said.

Abduction Tale May Be Latest Hoax (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, December 6, 2006

An Alabama mother's report that her slain 5-year-old son had been asleep in a car when it was stolen was a hoax, and she and her boyfriend have been charged in the boy's death, police said Tuesday.

The body of the kindergartner, Geontae Glass, was found early Tuesday in the trunk of the car, which was parked outside a house owned by the mother's boyfriend, said Capt. Michael Jones of the Etowah County Sheriff's office. "They came up with a plan to disguise the homicide," Jones said of Shalinda Glass, 25, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles.

Towles has been charged with capital murder and Glass with hindering prosecution.

The story could be the latest in a string of hoaxes, from "runaway bride" Jennifer Wilbanks of Georgia, who faked her own kidnapping, to Sarah Everson, a Missouri woman who collected donations by pretending to be pregnant with sextuplets. Some appear aimed at financial gain or avoiding prosecution — or marriage. Others are odder: John Mark Karr claimed to have killed JonBenét Ramsey until evidence showed otherwise.

"Some of these people aren't exactly brain surgeons," says Jay Siegel, director of the Forensic and Investigative Sciences Program at Indiana University. "There are a lot of reasons why people do these things," he says, including mental disorders such as Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy, in which parents make up symptoms, hurt or even kill their children, making it look like an accident.

"A lot of this is done for attention," Siegel says. "It's a form of exhibitionism without taking your clothes off." He says the desire for fame may be exacerbated by reality TV shows.

Michael Aamodt, who teaches forensic psychology at Radford University in Virginia, says some people panic when they get in trouble and make up elaborate stories.

"People, in general, are not very good liars," he says. "They don't really think about the getting-caught part."

In Alabama, Jones says, police concluded that Glass' story was false after interviewing her and others. He said Glass has no prior criminal record but Towles, who runs a barbecue restaurant, has a record of drug offenses.

Glass, who also has a 7-year-old daughter, told police Monday that the boy was sleeping in the back seat of a car that she left running when she went into a convenience store in Albertville, about 80 miles northeast of Birmingham.

Witnesses reported seeing a man get out of a pickup and into the car while someone else drove the truck.

State's Attorney's Office Under Review (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Ivey Requested Justice Department Probe

A team of current and former state prosecutors from across the country is meeting this week with Prince George's County prosecutors, police, judges and defense attorneys to assess how well the state's attorney's office is performing and what it can do to improve.

The broad independent review is being conducted at the request of State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who will begin his second term in January. Ivey, who was reelected without opposition in the November general election, said no event or case prompted the review.

In an interview, Ivey said he wanted to conduct such a review from the time he first assumed the office in December 2002 but was unable to because of budgetary constraints.

He said the review is being conducted at no cost to the state's attorney's office.

The team of four current and former prosecutors that will be reviewing the office was put together by the Bureau of Justice Assistance, which is part of the Justice Department.

The review team will be supported by two staff members from the bureau, said Joseph Trotter, an official with the bureau.

Ivey said he told his staff, which includes about 70 prosecutors, about the review a month ago, shortly after he was reelected. Ivey said he urged his prosecutors and other staff to be honest with the assessors, who began conducting interviews Monday and are scheduled to complete them today.

"I told our people the only way this will work is if they're candid," Ivey said. The reviewers will interview prosecutors, supervisors and trial lawyers away from the Upper Marlboro office, he said.

Ivey said he wants the reviewers to determine whether policies need to be changed and to point out any problems with personnel. If prosecutors or staff members believe there is something Ivey can be doing better, he wants to know about it, Ivey said.

Ivey said he would like the reviewers to provide a list of recommendations, "a sheet I can work from."

Trotter said a written report would be available within a few weeks, perhaps by January.

During his tenure, Ivey has been credited with beefing up prosecutions of thefts and other economic crimes. Assistant State's Attorney Isabel Mercedes Cumming, head of the "fraud squad, " was named the national fraud examiner of the year by a financial crime analysts group last year.

Prince George's prosecutors also have been successful in obtaining convictions against at least four members of the violent MS-13 gang in recent years for offenses such as murder and attempted murder.

On the other hand, several prosecutions of homicides and other violent crimes have gone awry in recent months.

Last month, two Prince George's judges in separate cases dismissed murder charges against defendants because of what they considered flaws in the prosecution.

Since May, prosecutors have dropped murder charges against at least two other defendants because of problems with state witnesses or evidence.

La. Authorities: Seemingly Harmless Suspect In Serial Killings Disarmed Victims With Charm (SDUT/AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 6, 2006

HOUMA, La. – Short, overweight and suffering from a heart condition, Ronald J. Dominique hardly seemed a threat, much less a serial killer.

A near-broke nobody who lived with his sister before moving into a homeless shelter, he went willingly, leaning heavily on a cane, when officers came to get him last week.

Even with a meek persona, investigators said, Dominique bound and strangled or smothered 23 men and teenage boys in south Louisiana in what the FBI considered its most urgent serial killing case.

Dominique apparently was able to charm his victims into accompanying him, said Les Bonano, director of investigations for the state attorney general's office.

“He'd meet them on the street, walking or riding their bikes, and just start talking to them. He'd offer them a ride or talk them into sex and they'd go with him,” Bonano said Tuesday.

Dominique, 42, was arrested Friday at a homeless shelter in Houma and charged with two murders. On Monday, authorities filed nine more counts against him and said more charges were possible.

Dominique was being held without bond at the Terrebonne Parish jail pending a Jan. 17 arraignment. A message seeking comment was left with the parish public defender's office, which was assigned Tuesday to represent him.

Joseph Waitz, the Terrebonne district attorney, said he will seek the death penalty.

Once investigators began interrogating him, Dominique eagerly claimed credit for the killings, Terrebonne Sheriff Jerry Larpenter said.

“We'd been talking to him just a short period of time and he just started giving it up,” Larpenter said. “I don't know what prompted it. Maybe he just wanted to clear his conscience.”

Dominique is believed to have raped his victims before killing them, Larpenter said.

“He's nothing on the street, a nobody. But here he had power. Once he got those ropes on them, they were his,” he said.

Until the week of his arrest, Dominique was living with his sister in Bayou Blue, a rural area near Houma, a Cajun community of 32,000 surrounded by bayous and sugar cane fields, where many work in commercial fishing or the oil industry. His camper was parked behind a trailer covered by a broad, wood roof.

Dominique hit the shelter almost penniless. Phillip “Pappy” Breaux, who lives at the shelter, said Dominique told him he had enough money to pay for a room for five or six nights at $10 a night.

“If he hadn't been arrested he could have been here 20 years and nobody would have paid any attention to him,” Breaux said. “He complained about his health some, but that was about it.”

Investigators said Dominique was charged at least seven times and jailed twice over the years, mostly for minor offenses such as traffic violations, simple battery and disturbing the peace by offensive language.

But one case apparently planted the seed for his later crimes, according to Larpenter.

On Aug. 25, 1996, Dominique was arrested on a charge of forcible rape. He was booked into jail, but the case did not go to trial because the victim could not be found.

Larpenter said Dominique told investigators that brief brush with incarceration left him determined not to go back to jail.

“He said he killed them because he didn't want to get caught,” Larpenter said. “But I would think he discovered somewhere on the way to killing 23 that it was not just because of that. I think he discovered he liked it.”

FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said FBI profilers felt this was the most significant current serial killer case in the country in terms of the number of victims and its time span – the killings took place from 1997 to 2005.

“A serial killer like this hides in plain sight,” Bernazzani said. “They do not disturb people. That's why they are so effective.”'

All the victims were homeless males, ranging from 16 to 46, all were strangled or asphyxiated and all the bodies were bound. Their bodies were dumped in remote spots in seven parishes.

The break in the case came when an ex-con told his parole agent about getting away from a man who wanted to tie him up for sex, Larpenter said.

Dominique voluntarily gave investigators a DNA sample, which connected him two Jefferson Parish murders, Sheriff Harry Lee said.

“He went along with it, let us take a swab,” Lee said. “He was no trouble at all.”

Katrina Struck District, Scandal Struck Dem (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago.

Now weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer.

Rep. William Jefferson, a Democrat, has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime. In an open primary election last month, he placed first with 30% of the vote. None of the 13 candidates got a majority, so he faces Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter in a runoff election Saturday.

Jefferson has been outraised financially and was stripped of his most powerful committee assignment by Democratic leaders, but few here count him out.

Some want to keep him in office just to keep an eye on him.

"He can hide better being a private citizen than a public official," says Glenn Trotter, 52, over lunch at Li'l Dizzy's Cafe. "New Orleans already has a stigma about it. The die has been cast in terms of what people think of us."

Saturday's vote will write the epilogue on the past two years' scandals in Congress. Since November 2005, Republican Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and Mark Foley have resigned because of wrongdoing or ethical questions. Others facing allegations lost re-election. If Carter wins, Jefferson will be the only Democrat to lose his seat this year for any reason.

Democratic Party officials are doing what they can to make that happen. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who will become the first female speaker of the House of Representatives next month, stripped Jefferson of his seat on the Ways and Means Committee. State party officials endorsed Carter in the runoff.

Jefferson is the target of a Justice Department investigation into a Kentucky businessman's dealings with Nigeria. The businessman and a former aide to Jefferson have pleaded guilty to bribery.

An FBI affidavit alleges that Jefferson took $100,000 from an investor who was working with the FBI to bribe a Nigerian official. The FBI found $90,000 of it later in a freezer in Jefferson's home on Capitol Hill.

The eight-term congressman has not talked about the case except to declare his innocence, and he turns down most requests for interviews. His spokeswoman, Melanie Roussell, points out that Jefferson "has not been charged with anything."

"He asks voters to consider him on his record," she says, claiming that Jefferson "has brought home billions" of dollars in federal aid since Katrina struck. "Now is not the time to send someone new, who doesn't know anyone and who can't negotiate our needs."

Carter says now is not the time to return Jefferson, under a cloud and without his seat on Ways and Means.

The 2nd District includes the hardest-hit areas of the Gulf Coast, such as the Lower Ninth Ward, where low-income homeowners lost everything. They need full representation, she says.

"We don't have a strong voice from this district, and we are the most devastated district," she tells people at a gathering in the Algiers neighborhood on the Mississippi River's west bank. "Our national image is at stake."

Carter, who like Jefferson is black, has strong backing among whites. Mary Lore, 81, says she was "appalled" by Jefferson's "flagrant" behavior and doesn't want to re-elect him while he faces possible indictment. "We don't need another question mark," she says.

Even Republicans, badly outnumbered in a district drawn to favor black Democrats, are enticed by Carter. "I've always voted against Jefferson. We disagree on everything," says Bill Bryan, 48, director of a local sports club.

Yet Carter has her own obstacles. After Katrina, she appeared in a Spike Lee documentary criticizing officials of neighboring Jefferson Parish for keeping Orleans Parish residents out. Her remarks haunt her as she campaigns in Jefferson Parish, which is about 30% of the district. She also is opposed by some who disagreed with education legislation she advocated.

Amy Lafont, 31, a parent active in school issues, says she'll vote for " 'Dollar Bill' Jefferson. He is a known quantity."

THE $90,000 QUESTION (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 6, 2006

Whom Will Voters Believe -- Jefferson Or The Feds?

Judith Woods and Dwight Garrett know all about the $90,000 FBI agents say they found in Rep. William Jefferson's freezer, but they are of different minds on how the federal probe of the New Orleans Democrat should influence voters in Saturday's runoff.

Garrett, 52, an insurance broker and adjuster and self-described community activist, admits he was "shocked" when he heard about the $90,000. But he said he's decided to stick with Jefferson because the government's case "apparently isn't very strong or they would have indicted him by now."

Jefferson, he said, wouldn't be the first African-American politician wrongly tainted with false charges.

"He's been our congressman for 16 years, and I think he's entitled to a presumption of innocence," said Garrett, who said the Justice Department has been overly aggressive by making Jefferson's congressional office the first ever raided by the FBI.

Woods, also 52 and a social worker, said she has voted for Jefferson in the past but can't conceive of what Jefferson has in mind when he promises an honorable explanation for the allegations against him. The Justice Department in an affidavit said FBI agents found $90,000 in marked $100 bills in the freezer of his Washington, D.C., home. Prosecutors secured guilty pleas from two former Jefferson associates, who testified that the congressman demanded payments for family-run businesses in return for his help in securing contracts in West Africa.

"My conclusion is that he's guilty of something," said Woods, who wonders how effective a congressman Jefferson can be while fighting the accusations.

Jefferson has denied wrongdoing, saying in a recent campaign ad that he has never accepted a bribe from anyone.

Still, perhaps more than any other issue, including the federal government's continued role in hurricane recovery efforts, how voters see the federal probe, which began March 15, 2005, will determine whether Jefferson is elected to a ninth term or is ousted by state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans.

Sympathy for Jefferson

Gay Cunningham, an Uptown resident, said she has decided to support Carter with a "heavy heart" because Jefferson has helped her efforts to raise money for the Louisiana State Museum dating to when he was in the Legislature.

Accused Mobster Requests Larger Cell (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, December 6, 2006

CHICAGO - A reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family pleaded with a federal judge Tuesday for more space in jail while he awaits trial on charges of plotting 18 slayings going back three decades.

"I'm taking 15 medications and my back is killing me," Frank Calabrese Sr., 69, told U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel. He said overcrowding on his floor at the Metropolitan Correctional Center is so bad that he can't concentrate on court papers and study the charges against him.

A chronic back problem only makes matters worse, he said.

"All I want to do is be in a two-man room so I can study my case," said the portly, bearded defendant, clad in the bright orange jumpsuit of a federal prisoner.

To underscore Calabrese's woes, defense attorney Joseph Lopez asked permission from Zagel for his client to sit down during the hearing.

Calabrese is among 14 reputed mob figures charged in a racketeering indictment that alleges at least 18 slayings going as far back as 1970.

Zagel was holding a hearing on complaints by a number of the defendants charged in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets that their health and related problems are not being met in the MCC - a skyscraper federal jail a block from the Dirksen Federal Courthouse in downtown Chicago.

Other attorneys said their clients had urgent medical needs ranging from a new hearing aid to a fresh set of false teeth.

Zagel and federal prosecutors said that they would look into the matter.

Emotions Run High As Peete, Ford Keep Seats In Close Vote (MCA)

By Jacinthia Jones

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 6, 2006

December 6, 2006 At the end of the day, Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete remained in their seats on the Memphis City Council dais.

There was Ford, voting as if nothing had happened.

And Peete, who, after being absent most of the day, recused himself from voting only on planning and zoning issues.

Despite federal bribery charges against the two, the council failed to muster enough support Tuesday to ask them to resign or to censure them.

Ford and Peete were arrested last week on charges they took money in exchange for their influence on the council concerning development.

The resolution asking Ford and Peete to resign failed on a 6-6 vote during a morning executive session.

A separate motion to initiate censure proceedings on the pair failed by a 3-5 vote in the council's personnel, intergovernmental and annexation committee.

Peete did not attend committee meetings, but showed up for the full council meeting in the afternoon. Ford, however, attended meetings all day and voted against the censure motion and cast a "no" vote that doomed the resolution requesting he and Peete step down.

Council members did not publicly question the appropriateness of Ford's voting on the two measures.

During a break in the council meeting, reporters asked him why he was still voting. He replied: "I'm innocent, OK? I'm innocent."

Earlier he told The Commercial Appeal "This is about color."

"I'm a child of God, OK? I know what I have not done. Maybe this will open up the eyes of some people."

DOJ_NMG_0102783

He took issue with comments by Councilman Jack Sammons during the executive session.

In pushing the resolution asking for the resignations, Sammons said the events involving his colleagues had caused him "much consternation."

"It's unfathomable to me that this could happen in this atmosphere of Tennessee Waltz."

Sammons' resolution "humbly, prayerfully and respectfully" requested that Peete and Ford resign and focus their energies on their legal defenses.

Now that Peete and Ford have given no indication they intend to do that, the council's hands are tied.

Council atty. Allan Wade, citing an attorney general's opinion, said there is no state law or constitutional provision that allows the General Assembly to prohibit one of its members from voting on matters with only an indictment, but no conviction. That also is the case with the council, he said.

The district attorney could remove any public official for misconduct, but Wade said that's unlikely with a federal investigation ongoing.

Those arguments seemed to sway Councilman E.C. Jones, who had previously called for the two to resign.

"I personally think we should just wait until this case has been heard, dropped, dismissed, found guilty, convicted or whatever, and we should just move on with our business," Jones said.

But Councilman Myron Lowery, who supported the resolution, disagreed. He summed up the issue as one of public trust versus the individual rights of council members.

"Our colleagues should be convicted or acquitted in a court of law and not at the City Council," Lowery said. "But at the same time, this body has to take a stand to tell the public that we are displeased with the information that we have received."

An emotional Barbara Swearengen Holt said she was disappointed the council would "sit here today and have them on trial."

The councilwoman railed against the resolution, saying, "I don't see anything humble about it, I don't see anything prayerful about it, and I don't see anything respectful about it."

After the vote, Sammons said he was "saddened" by the whole situation.

"I suspect the system will rectify this sword that we have in our heart," Sammons said. He added, "To throw the race card is to be anticipated."

Councilman Scott McCormick, who made the motion to initiate censure proceedings, said his votes for the measures were public statements.

"I think it's important for the council as a body to help restore the trust of the public to show that we take these allegations seriously and we're taking whatever action we can," McCormick said.

Council chairwoman TaJuan Stout Mitchell, who had called in additional police for the session, said she refused to condemn individuals "before someone has had his day in court."

MySpace.com Moves To Keep Sex Offenders Off Of Its Site (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 5 — MySpace.com, the social networking site, said Tuesday that it was developing technologies that would help combat the use of its site by sexual predators by cross-referencing its more than 130 million users against state databases of registered sex offenders.

DOJ_NMG_0102784

The Web site, which is owned by the News Corporation, said that within 30 days it planned to deploy the technology, which will seek to identify known sex offenders not just by their names, but also by date of birth, height, weight and ZIP code.

If the automated system finds a potential match between a MySpace user and a registered sex offender, employees will try to verify the match or determine if it is a false positive. Users who are registered sex offenders, MySpace said, will be denied access to the site and, depending in the circumstances, be turned over to law enforcement.

The system, which MySpace executives said was the first of its kind, comes as the site has faced scrutiny and criticism by advocates of children's safety. Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said the technology was a potentially useful step in slowing the incidence of sexual solicitation of minors.

"It's not a panacea, but it makes a whole lot of sense," Mr. Allen said.

According to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a nonprofit group, one in seven regular Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 will be solicited online for sex. That figure has fallen from 2000, when it was one in five.

The perception, particularly among parents, has been that children are vulnerable on social networking sites like MySpace.com, which allow users to create profiles, share their interests and create a vast social network.

MySpace said that more than 80 percent of its users were 18 years or older.

In its announcement, MySpace said it had signed a deal to use technology created by the Sentinel Tech Holdings Corporation.

Forty-six states have public data bases that include 550,000 registered sex offenders. The technology will compare the names on the databases with the 135 million MySpace users.

Hemanshu Nigam, chief security officer for MySpace, said the company hoped the technology would work in real time, meaning that as people signed up — which they are doing at a rate of 320,000 a day — the system would automatically compare the names to the databases.

The system, by MySpace's admission, is not fool-proof. If registered sex offenders sign up but do not give their real names, physical attributes, locations or post their real picture, they could elude detection.

Similarly, there is a chance that people who are not sex offenders might be flagged by the system. Mr. Nigam said a team was in place to analyze potential matches and throw out false positives.

Kevin Bankston, a staff lawyer for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a free speech and consumer advocacy group, said the technology was a response to growing worries about the extent of the problem of sexual solicitation of minors on the Internet.

Mr. Bankston said the incidents of such solicitation were falling but that fear was causing companies to take steps that could ultimately impinge civil liberties.

"My concern is MySpace is acting based on a level of pressure and fear that may be unreasonable," he said.

News From The San Joaquin Valley (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

The University of California, Merced will begin a marketing campaign in February to lure off-campus students to its nine dormitories, university officials said.

There's room for more than 585 students, but only 371 live on campus this semester, said Leslie Santos, the University of Merced's director of student housing.

School officials had asked students to live off campus to make room for freshman, but enrollment was lower than predicted. To entice students to campus, administrators are giving students who don't have roommates the option to stay in double rooms for the single-occupancy rate, Santos said.

"From this point forward, it's our goal to offer continuing students the ability to live on campus," Santos said. "We pay gas, utilities, maintenance, grounds all of that stuff and the mortgage."

The university must fill its empty beds because dorm fees help pay the annual $1.7 million mortgage for student housing, Santos said.

CASTLE, Calif. (AP) - The federal penitentiary in Atwater will remain on lockdown as the FBI investigates the stabbing of a prison employee, a prison spokesman said.

The facility has been locked down since an inmate attacked an employee Nov. 28 with a homemade knife, U.S. Penitentiary Atwater Executive Assistant Jesse Gonzalez said.

The staff member was treated at a hospital for non-life threatening injuries and returned to work, Gonzalez said.

The 1,200 maximum security inmates will remain in their cells as investigators find out how the prisoner made the knife, said FBI Supervising Special Agent John Gliatta.

The inmate's name and information will not be released until he is charged in connection with the assault, prison officials said. The worker's identity and job title were not released because they are confidential.

WOODLAKE, Calif. (AP) - Two San Joaquin Valley phone-sex operators helped immigration agents nab a Canadian corrections officer on child pornography charges, authorities said.

Matthew Hughes, 26, of Toronto, was arrested by Toronto police and charged in Canada Friday with possession and distribution of child pornography and sexual interference with a person under 14, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement said.

The two female telephone sex operators tipped off police in Woodlake by reporting that Hughes, with whom they had been corresponding, had sent them a live Web camera broadcast in which he was assaulting a 7-year-old girl, ICE officials said.

Immigration authorities obtained subscriber information for the e-mail address and passed along photos of the corrections officer to Canadian police, officials said.

"Those who engage in the exploitation of children should no longer expect the anonymity of cyberspace or ordinary citizens to protect them," said Brian Poulsen, an ICE agent in Fresno.

Clever Spammers Stay 'One Step Ahead' Of Law (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Viagra, gibberish, money-transfer requests, more Viagra.

Three years after the federal Can-Spam Act went into effect, unsolicited commercial e-mails are assaulting inboxes at record rates as spamming technology grows more sophisticated.

"I think the majority of the industry would say that spam levels are at the highest they've ever been," said Scott Chasin, chief technology officer at MX Logic Inc., a Colorado-based Internet security firm.

In September, unsolicited commercial e-mail messages accounted for more than 77 percent of all e-mail filtered by the company. Of that amount, only a fraction -- 0.27 percent -- was in compliance with federal anti-spamming law.

"Spammers are creative and industrious," said Michael Davis, a lawyer with the Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which is responsible for enforcing the act. "Because of their dedication and their technological sophistication, they have found ways to stay oftentimes one step ahead of law enforcement."

Under the Can-Spam Act, marketers are allowed to send unsolicited commercial e-mails as long as they include a truthful subject line and routing information; an opt-out mechanism; a notice that labels the e-mail as an advertisement; and a valid postal address.

"Legitimate businesses overwhelmingly comply with it," said Stephanie Hendricks, spokeswoman for the Direct Marketing Association. "Obviously, folks are still seeing a lot of spam, but it's not coming from legitimate companies."

That's the problem, according to Mr. Chasin.

"The spammers that were sending spam before the law was passed were not obeying the laws then, and they're certainly not obeying the laws now," he said. "When the legislation was adopted, it gave the amateur spammers a decision: Do they want to get out, or do they want to become criminals?"

The challenge of enforcement does not stem from a lack of teeth. Can-Spam allows the FTC to seek civil penalties of up to $11,000 per violation, plus further fines for spammers who unlawfully "harvest" or extract e-mail addresses from Web sites or Web services. The law also gives the Justice Department authority to seek criminal punishment for violators who falsify header information or hijack a computer to send e-mail without a user's consent.

So far, the FTC has filed 26 lawsuits for violations of the act, Mr. Davis said. In those cases, federal courts have awarded civil penalties totaling more than $10 million.

Spam isn't just irking consumers; it's harming the reputations of legitimate businesses, said David Daniels, a vice president and research director with JupiterResearch of New York.

"Forty-three percent of consumers have told us that when they sign up for permission-based e-mail from their bank or retailer, they believe that doing that leads to more spam," Mr. Daniels said. "That is not the case. When you sign up for an e-mail offer at a reputable retailer or financial services institution, they're certainly not going to be sharing that information with another party."

Contrary to the assumption of many home computer users, spammers typically extract addresses using a "botnet," or program that takes over computers and uses their stored e-mail addresses to spread spam throughout the Web. Botnets can link thousands of computers without owners' knowledge.

Spammers have learned to avoid common e-mail filters, purposefully misspelling words like "Viagra" or embedding messages in graphics rather than plain text, Mr. Chasin said. They also cut and paste random, unrelated text to throw off filter keyword searches.

Mr. Davis said the FTC uses a variety of tracking techniques to trace e-mails forwarded by consumers and identified as spam. While it's hard enough to track the messages, he said, the problem is exacerbated when the spam's origin is traced overseas. In that case, federal courts can award penalties, but collecting the fines can prove a challenge unless the spammer has assets in the U.S. Enforcement of the laws often depends on the relationship between the U.S. and the country in which the spam originated.

The five biggest violators, according to British nonprofit Spamhaus, are the U.S., China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

While a comprehensive solution may be elusive, spam analysts cite the need for greater international cooperation to crack down on spammers.

In addition, there are steps that Internet service providers (ISPs) and consumers can take to ensure they are not propagating spam networks, Mr. Chasin said. Consumers should not open unknown attachments and should constantly update their Web security software to avoid having their computers hijacked, he said. ISPs should quarantine infected computers until they are fixed, he added.

Until then, "I'm afraid we're only going to see spam continue to rise," he said.

Other Shoe Has Dropped Government Lends Its Ears To Cellphones (AJC)

By Bob Barr

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 6, 2006

In the 1960s-era TV show "Get Smart," whenever the protagonist — secret agent Maxwell Smart — required an absolutely secure environment to discuss a top secret project with his boss, he would ask that the "Cone of Silence," a huge Plexiglas dome, be lowered to shield their conversation from prying ears.

The Cone of Silence was obviously and amusingly ineffective, of course, but even had it served its purpose, in today's high-tech world, the KGB or whatever hostile agency Agent Smart might be trying to evade would be able to pick up whatever conversations they wished simply by using the very cellphone in Smart's shoe.

Modern cellphones are nothing more than miniature computers with small but sensitive microphones attached. Law enforcement agencies are discovering the significant benefit of drawing on that powerful combination of technology, by increasingly seeking court permission to use cellphones in the hands of suspects as surreptitious listening devices. Unfortunately for anyone who happens to be nearby, cellphones thus utilized as listening devices will pick up their conversations as well.

This latest example of electronic snooping should draw attention to the need for comprehensive national legislation to more clearly define the privacy rights of American citizens. Thus far, Congress has shown itself completely uninterested in addressing such fundamental civil liberty issues, much to the delight of the administration of George W. Bush, which continues to push the envelope of electronic snooping as far as possible.

In the most recent case, a federal judge in New York authorized the FBI to use cellphones belonging to alleged Genovese crime family members to listen to and record conversations in the vicinity of the phones. The government was not limited to conversations involving the tapped phone or the person using it. Unlike court orders applying to such surveillance in years past, the government is now seeking — and courts apparently are granting — orders allowing the feds to use cellphones belonging to or merely carried by suspects, to record conversations even if the phones are not being used or even turned on. A cellphone thus utilized will pick up whatever conversations take place anywhere in the vicinity.

If a suspect against whom the government has obtained such a "roving wiretap" order is seated in a restaurant with their cellphone in their pocket, and you and your girlfriend happen to be seated at a table nearby, your conversations — which you intend to be and which you have every expectation will be free from government eavesdropping — might be picked up and recorded.

I first became aware that the federal government wanted to outfit regular phones — so-called "land lines" — with devices that could be activated remotely by government investigators to allow agents to hear whatever was being spoken into or near the receiver, about 10 years ago, shortly after I was elected to Congress.

At the time, the Justice Department was trying to require telecommunications companies to incorporate technology in their phones to enable the government to engage in such surreptitious listening. The law the government was trying to use to do this was passed in the early 1990s and called the Communications Assistance to Law Enforcement Act.

We stopped the government from such heavy-handed and privacy-invasive directives at the time, but in the post-Sept. 11 world, with a Congress almost completely submissive to executive branch entreaties to increase its powers to invade citizens' privacy, such efforts appear now to be quaintly outdated.

In fact, the technology as described by reading between the lines of the court order in New York appears to be precisely what the government sought a decade ago for land lines. While the New York case is one that many might find compelling to justify such expansive government surveillance, law-abiding citizens should nevertheless demand that Congress act now to get a handle on the extent of the coerced technology that appears to have made this surveillance possible.

We should also force Congress to place limits on the extent such technology might be employed in circumstances where private and lawful conversations might be picked up. In the absence of such limits, it is only a matter of time, for example, before the government starts asking courts to allow it to surreptitiously take photographs with cellphones thus equipped. Perhaps it already has.

Can You Hear Me Now? (ABC)

By Vic Walter And Krista Kjellman Report:

ABC News' The Blotter, December 6, 2006

Cell phone users, beware. The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off.

A recent court ruling in a case against the Genovese crime family revealed that the FBI has the ability from a remote location to activate a cell phone and turn its microphone into a listening device that transmits to an FBI listening post, a method known as a "roving bug." Experts say the only way to defeat it is to remove the cell phone battery.

"The FBI can access cell phones and modify them remotely without ever having to physically handle them," James Atkinson, a counterintelligence security consultant, told ABC News. "Any recently manufactured cell phone has a built-in tracking device, which can allow eavesdroppers to pinpoint someone's location to within just a few feet," he added.

According to the recent court ruling by U.S. District Court Judge Lewis Kaplan, "The device functioned whether the phone was powered on or off, intercepting conversations within its range wherever it happened to be."

The court ruling denied motions by 10 defendants to suppress the conversations obtained by "roving bugs" on the phones of John Ardito, a high-ranking member of the family, and Peter Peluso, an attorney and close associate of Ardito, who later cooperated with the government. The "roving bugs" were approved by a judge after the more conventional bugs planted at specified locations were discovered by members of the crime family, who then started to conduct their business dealings in several additional locations, including more restaurants, cars, a doctor's office and public streets.

"The courts have given law enforcement a blank check for surveillance," Richard Rehbock, attorney for defendant John Ardito, told ABC News.

Judge Kaplan's ruling said otherwise. "While a mobile device makes interception easier and less costly to accomplish than a stationary one, this does not mean that it implicated new or different privacy concerns." He continued, "It simply dispenses with the need for repeated installations and surreptitious entries into buildings. It does not invade zones of privacy that the government could not reach by more conventional means."

But Rehbock disagrees. "Big Brother is upon us...1984 happened a long time ago," he said, referring to the George Orwell futuristic novel "1984," which described a society whose members were closely watched by those in power and was published in 1949.

The FBI maintains the methods used in its investigation of the Genovese family are within the law. "The FBI does not discuss sensitive surveillance techniques other than to emphasize that any electronic surveillance is done pursuant to a court order and ongoing judicial scrutiny," Agent Jim Margolin told ABC News.

"Cell phone users, beware. The FBI can listen to everything you say, even when the cell phone is turned off."

This is the worst kind of sensational journalism, implying that the FBI is listening into everybody's cell phone calls. Only in the last sentence do you let the reader know that the FBI "maintains" it strictly observes the law and only engages in surveillance after obtaining a warrant from a judge(requiring evidence of probable cause that a crime has been committed and this person committed it). Why not just say "Homeowners Beware-The FBI can come in your house and search all your belongings!!!!"

What a fantastic thing to know the government can do. Actually, I've heard about this before, from people I know who work for different federal agencies who've said when they do anything personal, they always leave their phone at home because someone could listen in (even with it off). I thought it was just talk, but here's the proof.

The potential for abuse or misuse of this is staggering. Which says nothing of what could happen if a band of geeks in a basement decipher exactly how this is done. The potential for real damage to people's lives could be incalculable.

Why would manufacturers even allow for this type of function? I'm sure there's industry taxbreaks involves somewhere and dire pleas of national security. In the process, nothing you say can really be private.

Los Alamos Ignoring Warnings? (CBS)

By Sharyl Attkisson, CBS News Capitol Hill correspondent

CBS News, December 6, 2006

The FBI has conducted two interviews and may schedule a third with the woman who walked out carrying classified documents from what's supposed to be one of the most secure facilities in the world, the Los Alamos National Laboratory, CBS News has learned. The incident has exposed continuing security weaknesses at Los Alamos, which has been the focus of security and management scandals for seven years.

Sources say 22-year-old Jessica Quintana was hired to archive data from weapons tests, and even had access to information on how to deactivate the locks that keep nuclear weapons from firing. Somehow, she managed to leave the laboratory with hundreds of pages of classified documents and several portable computer storage devices known as "thumb drives."

As CBS News was first to report, the materials were found by accident in October during a drug raid on Quintana's roommate at their trailer home. Now, a chief watchdog of the Laboratory, Rep. Ed Markey of the House Energy Committee, plans to fire off a scathing letter to the Energy Secretary demanding answers.

"These are secrets that could be valuable to al Qaeda," Markey tells CBS News. "Our enemies want to have access to the most dangerous technologies to hurt our country. [The Laboratory and the Department of Energy] keep promising they're going to put better security measure in place, but they never do."

In his letter addressed to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, Markey outlines years of high-profile security breaches at Los Alamos, followed by promises from the Energy Department and lab officials to tighten the ship. That includes weapons design information being obtained by the Chinese in the late 90s and missing computer hard drives or similar materials in 2000, 2002 and 2004. The security breach in 2004 led to a temporary complex-wide shutdown of the laboratory that cost taxpayers at least several hundred million dollars, according to the Department of Energy.

The Department of Energy's Inspector General, Gregory Friedman, recently weighed in with his own criticism over the latest security breach, calling the laboratory's security "seriously flawed."

"Monitoring by both Laboratory and Federal officials was inadequate," Friedman reported in his findings. He called the latest incident "especially troubling" since taxpayers have spent "tens of millions of dollars" upgrading security at the laboratory in recent years after other security breaches.

A spokesman for Los Alamos tells CBS News that after the October security incident, many new security measures were installed. These include disabling the ability to download classified materials to unauthorized electronic devices and banning computer memory devices in certain areas. However, an official with the Department of Energy tells CBS News he thought those measures had been taken long ago.

Rep. Markey echoes that, saying Congress was promised in prior hearings that such steps were being taken — but "apparently they weren't."

Tune in to the CBS Early Show Wednesday at 7 a.m. for an exclusive report on the investigation and just how easy it was for the Los Alamos employee to slip out with classified documents.

Milberg Weiss In The Hot Seat (ABAJ)

By Martha Neil

ABA Journal, December 6, 2006

Should law firms ever get indicted?

Secret cash payments. falsified court documents. Behind-the-scenes deals between favored clients and their counsel.

All the elements of a John Grisham potboiler are present in the case of United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.

The nation's leading plaintiffs securities class-action law firm is on the receiving end of the first criminal indictment filed against a major law firm in U.S. history. The New York City-based firm—which has been both celebrated and vilified for its ferocious attacks on alleged corporate wrongdoing—lost about 40 percent of its 128 lawyers in the five months after its indictment and may be fighting for its very existence.

Lost in the spectacle, according to critics of the government's case, is the question of whether prosecutors have gone too far. Even if Milberg Weiss is found guilty, indicting an entire law firm causes more harm than good, they contend.

The federal government's controversial tactic of getting corporations that are under investigation to surrender their attorney-client privilege in order to avoid prosecution is now being applied to law firms, with disastrous results for the legal profession and clients, the critics say.

And they are concerned that more law firms will be viewed as fair game for the same kind of aggressive criminal prosecutions the U.S. Department of Justice has pursued against a number of high-profile corporations in the post-Enron era.

A 20-count indictment filed on May 18 in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles charges the firm and two of its name partners, David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, with conspiring to obstruct justice and commit bribery, perjury and fraud. United States v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, No. CR 05-587(A)-DDP (C.D. Cal.).

Milberg Weiss, through the two partners, engaged in a multidecade, multimillion-dollar scheme to make illegal payments to hand-picked clients serving as lead plaintiffs in class actions handled by the firm, prosecutors allege. All the while, lawyers from the firm denied in court filings in the underlying cases that any undisclosed payments were made to plaintiffs, prosecutors say.

Counsel for Bershad and Schulman, who are on leaves of absence from Milberg Weiss, assert their clients' innocence, and the firm itself vehemently denies the charges.

Even if the allegations are proven, the government has failed to exercise appropriate prosecutorial discretion, according to Stephen Gillers, a professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. "The government obtains little or nothing by indicting the firm, when only a small number of attorneys allegedly were involved in the wrongdoing," he says.

If the Justice Department is concerned about deterrence, says Gillers, "the threat of criminal prosecution and the indictment of two prominent plaintiffs class-action lawyers is plenty chilling. I don't think you have to indict the firm to bring home the point that lawyers are at risk for this kind of conduct or alleged conduct."

Debra Wong Yang, the outgoing U.S. attorney for the Central District of California, whose office is prosecuting Milberg Weiss, says she's just following the facts, as prosecutors would in any case.

"I think the part of this case that was particularly egregious was that a fraud was being perpetrated on the court," Yang says. "You have to respect the rules and the confines of the system in which we work, and can't 'game' it."

Just before press time, Yang announced plans to leave her job and accept a partnership at Los Angeles-based Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. Her replacement had not yet been named, but Yang says her departure should make no difference to the Milberg Weiss prosecution, which has "always been driven by the facts."

UNPOPULAR PIONEER

Notoriety is nothing new to milberg weiss, which was established four decades ago. Under the leadership of founding partners Lawrence Milberg, who died in 1989, and Melvyn I. Weiss, who still is an active partner, the firm pioneered class action lawsuits on behalf of shareholders alleging violations of securities law by corporations.

By the 1980s, Milberg Weiss was widely recognized as the most influential plaintiffs securities firm in the United States. Since its formation, the firm estimates, it has been responsible for more than $45 billion in plaintiff recoveries. Many of the firm's cases also have established important precedents affirming the rights of shareholders and consumers to pursue class actions against corporations for securities fraud.

A track record like that hasn't always sat well with the business community. Critics such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce have complained that class actions are little more than a money machine minting attorney fees for lawyers while the plaintiffs themselves receive little more than token recoveries. Proponents of class actions, however, contend that they often are the only practical means of redress for shareholders and consumers victimized by corporate wrongdoing.

The Justice Department alleges that two of the firm's partners found a way to manipulate the class action process illegally.

Under recent federal legislation, the shareholder in a class action who holds the largest block of shares generally is designated lead plaintiff—in effect, the representative for the class. As a result, lead plaintiffs now often are institutional investors, such as pension funds.

For decades, however, the first plaintiff to file, or an individual agreed upon by class counsel, was commonly put in the position of lead plaintiff. Because the lead plaintiff helps make strategic decisions about the direction of the case, such as what settlement terms would be desirable, he or she may have a considerable role in deciding whether a quick settlement—and hence speedy payment of attorney fees—is appropriate.

The Justice Department contends that Milberg Weiss partners Bershad and Schulman paid friends of the firm secret fees to serve in the lead plaintiff role in numerous cases—and then misrepresented to courts that no such payments had been made.

Although at least some of these illegal kickbacks were disguised as attorney fees paid to "local counsel" representing the lead plaintiffs, the money actually was being paid to lawyers who did virtually no work on the case, according to federal prosecutors. Instead, the so-called local counsel served as conduits to funnel these secret kickbacks to the lead plaintiffs chosen by Bershad and Schulman, the indictment alleges.

The Justice Department contends that Bershad and Schulman, along with their firm and two Southern California men who served as a paid plaintiff and an intermediary lawyer funneling funds, were responsible for some $11 million in secret kickbacks. They allegedly were paid to be lead plaintiffs in more than 150 class action and shareholder derivative suits during a period of more than two decades. The payments—which the Justice Department says ended only in 2005—were required to be disclosed to the courts hearing the class actions, but were not, according to the indictment.

These alleged kickbacks, by providing Milberg Weiss with "a stable of individuals ready and willing to serve as paid plaintiffs," benefited the firm "by, in many cases, allowing the firm to be among the first to file a lawsuit on behalf of shareholders," Yang said in a written statement distributed at the time of the indictment in May.

But the payments created a conflict of interest between the named plaintiffs and the other plaintiffs in the class action, Yang said in her statement. The payments gave "the paid plaintiffs a financial interest that differed from that of the class," said Yang. "In particular, pursuant to their secret arrangement with Milberg Weiss, the named plaintiffs expected to receive a percentage of Milberg Weiss' legal fees, a payment not available to the other class members."

Key factors in deciding to prosecute, Yang told the ABA Journal, included Milberg Weiss' central role in orchestrating alleged misconduct and in filing what prosecutors contend were fraudulent pleadings. There was no motivation for the indictments beyond the four corners of the case itself, she says. "You've got hardworking prosecutors who have really just followed the facts."

The individual defendants as well as the firm itself have denied the Justice Department's charges, and indications are that they intend to slug it out with the government all the way to trial.

Bershad "absolutely denies the charges and expects to be vindicated at trial," says his attorney, Robert D. Luskin of Washington, D.C., who otherwise declines to discuss the case. Schulman's attorney, Herbert J. Stern of Roseland, N.J., also declines to comment on the case.

Meanwhile, Milberg Weiss is telling its side on a Web site devoted to the case.

"The Justice Department's case against Milberg Weiss is based on unprecedented legal theories, unsubstantiated allegations, and a dubious interpretation of how class action litigation is adjudicated," the firm states. "The Justice Department's misguided case is a major blow to consumer rights and not in keeping with its commitment to serve the public good."

Milberg Weiss also maintains the Justice Department has charged the entire firm even though the actions of only a few individuals are in question. Moreover, the firm says it has given "extensive cooperation" to the government's investigation. The firm "has willingly turned over hundreds of thousands of documents and made dozens of current employees available to the Justice Department for examination and questioning," states the Web site. "The firm has also volunteered to develop industry-leading best practices for use of referral fees."

ANOTHER FIRST

Milberg Weiss is the largest and most prominent U.S. law firm to be indicted on criminal charges, say experts who are watching the case.

"I can't remember, and no one I've talked to can remember, another instance in American history in which an entire law firm has been indicted," says New York University's Gillers. "It's hard to prove a negative—there may be one—but it's certainly not a firm of this size and reputation."

Milberg Weiss, however, is far from the first prominent law firm to face potential sanctions by the federal government. The difference is that, up until now, those cases have been handled as civil matters.

In recent years, for example, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has alleged in an ongoing case that Chicago-based Sidley & Austin violated employment discrimination laws when it let go a number of its older partners.

Prior to the Milberg Weiss prosecution, perhaps the most daunting federal action against a major U.S. law firm was an administrative enforcement action brought by the U.S. Office of Thrift Supervision against Kaye, Scholer, Fierman, Hays & Handler, based in New York City. The government sued the firm for $275 million in 1992 over its role as counsel in the late 1980s to a failed savings and loan institution with questionable business and accounting practices.

What really made other lawyers sit up and take notice, though, was when the government upped the ante by freezing the then-400-lawyer firm's assets. Unable to do business without access to its bank accounts, Kaye Scholer voluntarily agreed to pay a $41 million fine a short time later.

But Kaye Scholer stayed in business, and now numbers 500 lawyers.

Milberg Weiss likely will have to deal with potential civil liability arising out of the Justice Department's charges, but experts say it is the government's criminal charges that pose the greatest threat to the firm.

DOJ_NMG_0102792

Comparisons are being made to the federal government's 2002 indictment of Big Five accounting firm Arthur Andersen on obstruction of justice charges for allegedly destroying key documents relating to the financial condition of Enron Corp. Arthur Andersen quickly disbanded in the wake of the indictments, even though the U.S. Supreme Court in 2005 overturned the conviction because jury instructions were improper.

Under U.S. law, a business entity, such as a corporation or law firm, can be held vicariously liable for criminal misconduct by its employees even if management was unaware of the adverse activity, notes Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee Jr.

But Coffee says a key distinction between the two cases is that, unlike the Arthur Andersen case, the partners charged in the Milberg Weiss case are members of the firm's senior management.

"So I think this is the opposite end of the continuum from indicting a corporation because of one allegedly rogue employee," Coffee says. "If you're ever going to indict and convict a corporation or partnership, it would be in a case where the senior-most management is believed by the government to be involved."

UCLA law professor Stephen M. Bainbridge doesn't foresee the Arthur Andersen scenario playing out for Milberg Weiss. "There's absolutely no reason to think we'll have the kind of massive, immediate demise that you got with an Arthur Andersen," Bainbridge says. He notes that law firms, unlike accounting firms, are not prohibited by federal government regulators from representing clients while under indictment.

Nevertheless, says Bainbridge, "as long as this thing is hanging over Milberg's head, as a business matter, they are going to have problems getting appointed as lead counsel in these class actions."

Moreover, Bainbridge says, "this is the kind of thing that can put a lot of stress on intrafirm relationships. Partnership—particularly in a smaller firm like Milberg Weiss, which by today's standards is relatively small—that's a real trust relationship. You want these people to have your back. If you're spending a lot of time worrying about your partners—'Are they going to jump ship?' and whether they're going to be there when you need them—that's really not very healthy."

Professional firms, says Coffee, "are fragile." If Milberg Weiss is convicted, "I think it will have to disband."

NEW TWIST ON THOMPSON MEMO

But it isn't the future of Milberg Weiss that most concerns others in the legal profession.

There already is widespread consternation within the legal profession and corporate America about Justice Department policies that restrict the traditional defense rights of businesses charged with crimes and those who work for these businesses. As a result, lawyers who represent these businesses are restricted in their ability to defend them.

And now, with the indictment of Milberg Weiss, concern about overzealous federal prosecution of corporate America has been ratcheted up a few notches, as lawyers realize these controversial policies could be applied directly to their own profession.

Policies at issue include not only pressuring companies to cooperate with prosecutors by waiving attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine, but also pressuring companies to encourage corporate officers and senior employees to cooperate, says R. William Ide III of Atlanta. He is a past ABA president who chairs the ABA Task Force on Attorney-Client Privilege.

Such policies effectively eliminate many traditional defense rights such as the right to consult a lawyer, Miranda warnings, the Fifth Amendment right to remain silent, and even the right to a criminal defense, Ide says.

At the heart of these concerns is a memorandum issued in January 2003 by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry D. Thompson. Drafted in the wake of the wave of corporate scandals that followed the fall of Enron, the Thompson memo sets forth a list of nine factors that federal prosecutors should take into account in deciding whether to file criminal charges against business entities.

Particularly troubling to businesses and the lawyers who represent them is the Thompson memo's guideline stating that prosecutors should consider a corporation's "willingness to cooperate in the investigation of its agents, including, if necessary, the waiver of corporate attorney-client and work product protection."

Requests by federal prosecutors for privilege waivers from corporations facing potential criminal charges are increasingly common, says Lawrence J. Fox of Philadelphia, a past chair of the ABA Section of Litigation. He cites recent surveys on the issue indicating that federal prosecutors are seeking privilege waivers in up to 20 percent of cases involving corporations.

The ABA has played a leading role in opposing application of Thompson memo factors in a way that forces potential defendants to waive their protections under the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

In recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, ABA President Karen J. Mathis of Denver urged Congress "to send a strong message to the Department of Justice that the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine are fundamental principles of our legal system that must be protected." If corporations resist pressure to waive their privileges, they risk being labeled as uncooperative, said Mathis, which can trigger "a profound effect not just on charging and sentencing decisions, but on each company's public image, stock price and creditworthiness."

Just before the hearing, a bipartisan group of former senior officials at the Justice Department submitted a letter objecting to the "culture of waiver" being promoted by the Thompson memo. The letter calls for the Justice Department to "state affirmatively that waiver of attorney-client privilege and work product protections should not be a factor in determining whether an organization has cooperated with the government in an investigation."

(Among the signers is Carol E. Dinkins of Houston, who served as deputy U.S. attorney general in 1984-85. She now chairs the ABA Journal Board of Editors.)

The concern raised by the Milberg Weiss indictment is that, if it's a sign that more criminal actions against law firms may be in the offing, then more firms will be put in the position of compromising their own protections under the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine.

In her interview with the ABA Journal, then-U.S. Attorney Yang said her office in Los Angeles "complied with all the necessary steps under the manual" of standards for prosecutors, which incorporates the Thompson memo and a 1999 memo that relates to prosecutions of attorneys and law firms. "We have to get approval anytime we do something like that, which we did," she said.

Milberg Weiss' Web site relating to the case states that the Justice Department raised the possibility of privilege waivers before indicting the firm.

"The Justice Department informed Milberg Weiss that, if the firm wanted to avoid indictment, it had to agree to broad waivers of the firm's attorney-client privilege and work product protection," states the Web site. "According to the government, Milberg Weiss could not truly 'cooperate' with the investigation unless it waived these time-honored privileges."

AN OFFER SPURNED

It was an offer Milberg Weiss says it had to refuse. "As members of the bar, the attorneys who work at Milberg Weiss feel strongly that they cannot, in good conscience, contribute to the erosion of the attorney-client privilege by knuckling under to the government's blackmail," states the firm's Web site. "The firm therefore elected to reject the government's demands for broad privilege waivers and will fight the case in court."

A law firm may be in a better position to take that kind of stand than most corporations, Ide says.

"Particularly corporations, the scenario is, if they're indicted—look at Arthur Andersen; it's gone," Ide says. "Because the shareholders walk away and your stock starts going down, and then you get sued by the plaintiffs' lawyers. It's such a huge risk that you'll find very few scenarios that a company's willing, like Milberg did, to run the risk of indictment."

Milberg Weiss is far from out of the woods, but lawyers at the firm are confident it will come out of its ordeal intact.

There were 128 lawyers at Milberg Weiss when the Justice Department indictment was announced in May. (Including support staff, a total of 363 people worked at the firm.) By the end of September, the number of lawyers at the firm had dropped to 78.

"While a number of lawyers have left in recent months, virtually all of the senior lawyers have stayed, along with a significant number of younger attorneys," said Weiss in a written statement to the ABA Journal. "Their combined capabilities have [been] and are being enhanced by the addition of key new hires."

But departures are outpacing new hires. When Matthew Gluck, a 63-year-old partner at New York City's Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, came aboard in October, the New York Times headlined its story, "Against Tide, Lawyer Joins Milberg Weiss."

According to news reports, the firm filed 114 securities class-action lawsuits in 2004, 91 in 2005, and 17 through mid-May in 2006, but it has filed no new cases since being indicted. On its Web site, however, the firm says it has some 560 ongoing cases.

Nationwide, class action filings related to securities have dropped to a 10-year low, according to a report issued in July by the Securities Class Action Clearinghouse at Stanford Law School.

In the meantime, Milberg Weiss is continuing to aggressively seek out cases in new practice areas, says senior partner Ariana J. Tadler.

"The firm has always been extremely entrepreneurial in the areas we reach out to," Tadler says. "We continue to have people call us every day asking for us to represent them. Likewise, there are certain firms that continue to call us and say, 'Hey, we want to partner up with you,' because we continue to be the best-resourced."

The case against Milberg Weiss may have a chilling effect on private enforcement of securities laws in the U.S., says Lawrence Rosenthal, a former federal prosecutor in Chicago who now teaches at Chapman University School of Law in Orange, Calif.

Milberg Weiss has been "the single most effective securities regulator in the country," Rosenthal says, taking on major cases that federal regulatory agencies haven't pursued. "I don't want to speculate on anyone's motives who I haven't even met, whose names I don't even know," Rosenthal says of the Justice Department decision to prosecute the firm. "I'm just talking about the effect. It's hard to understand how the incremental deterrent value of pursuing the law firm could possibly exceed the value as a securities regulator that this law firm has had."

Considering Milberg Weiss' history, the firm is getting support from some surprising allies, says Fox.

"The delicious irony here is that we actually had the U.S. Chamber of Commerce come out and decry the fact that Milberg Weiss was indicted, even though the chamber hates Milberg Weiss," Fox says. "Because the Chamber of Commerce understands that the same sledgehammer that was used on Milberg Weiss is being used on corporations every day."

CIVIL LAW:

Family To Be Awarded $500,000 In VA Case (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons, Senior Writer

Albany Times Union, December 6, 2006

Widow wins settlement in corrupt cancer study, but 6 others kept waiting

ALBANY -- The federal government agreed to pay $500,000 to settle the first of seven federal lawsuits brought by the widows of veterans who died in a corrupt cancer research program at Stratton VA Medical Center Hospital, the Times Union has learned.

The six other widows, who still have lawsuits pending against the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, are finding the government less willing to admit their husbands were used as guinea pigs in the tainted drug studies.

The Justice Department has not agreed to settle the remaining cases, in part because it's never been determined -- or publicly disclosed -- that more than one veteran died as a result of the corruption. The government's position has been that the men had advanced stages of cancer, so it is impossible to determine what killed them, attorneys in the case said.

But in at least one case it was clear, and Justice Department lawyers recently settled with the family of that victim, James J. DiGeorgio, a 71-year-old Air Force veteran from Brunswick who died at Stratton in June 2001. The settlement comes a little more than a year after a former hospital researcher, Paul H. Kornak, was sentenced to nearly six years in prison for his role in the scandal.

VA officials and federal prosecutors have portrayed Kornak as an out-of-control researcher who forged medical records to push cancern-stricken patients into drug studies that allegedly paid the hospital thousands of dollars. But attorneys for the families and people familiar with the hospital's operation contend the corruption was widespread and Kornak was following orders from oncology doctors.

At his sentencing, Kornak said he was a scapegoat. His conviction exposed deep problems at the hospital, where he masqueraded as a doctor despite flunking out of medical school, and was hired despite a felony criminal conviction in Pennsylvania in 1992 for forging a medical license application.

The scandal triggered nationwide efforts by Congress to reform the Department of Veterans Affairs' hiring practices and embattled research programs. Many widows have dismissed the government's assertions that Kornak acted alone.

Attorneys for the widows recently obtained permission to depose Kornak at an Ohio prison, giving the public an opportunity to hear Kornak's story, contained in sealed files kept by the Justice Department, which has declined to prosecute anyone else.

An assistant U.S. attorney in Massachusetts declined comment on the settlement last week, saying it has not been publicly filed. The criminal investigation was handled by the U.S. attorney's office in Albany.

Mary Snavlin, DiGeorgio's daughter, said her family's settlement doesn't bring any closure.

"The families that are out there waiting for their due, they need to get that," she said. "The Justice Department, the VA, the doctors, the non-doctors, they need to own up for what they did to all of the veterans. They need to say 'OK, we did this,' and whether it's 5 cents or $2 million, they need to understand that families are still hurting over this. It will never go away."

In January, the DiGeorgio family filed a motion saying their case should be settled because there was no dispute that his death was caused by experimental drugs that he should never have been given. Settlement talks began the following month.

"We have several other family members of victims to deal with," said Alan C. Milstein, an attorney for plaintiffs in the case, including the DiGeorgio family. "The difference between DiGeorgio and the others is that Mr. DiGeorgio was the one victim the government used in the prosecution (of Kornak) to basically say it was akin to manslaughter."

Many of the remaining widows have said the litigation is not about money. They contend it's about getting answers to why their husbands were used as experiments and in making sure it doesn't happen again.

Milstein said the quandary in their cases is convincing the government that it is indefensible to argue the men would have died anyway because they all had advanced cancer. Kornak admitted forging their medical backgrounds so they could be enrolled in the drug studies, where they were given drugs that may have worsened their conditions and hastened their deaths.

"It's always been my position that when somebody is used and abused the way these people were, that's what I call damage to their human dignity," Milstein said.

Hospital officials have denied a widespread coverup and instead placed blame on Kornak, who pleaded guilty to federal charges of negligent homicide and falsifying medical records.

Kornak posed as a doctor at Stratton, including carrying the title "M.D." on his VA-issued business cards and being introduced to patients as "doctor" even though he never finished medical school. His supervisors knew about his lack of credentials.

In all, Kornak is accused of undermining at least four major research studies involving dozens of veterans and hundreds of thousands of dollars. The hospital earned thousands of dollars for each patient enrolled in the programs, in which pharmaceutical companies tested new drugs on cancer patients to obtain approval for them from the Food and Drug Administration.

Over the summer, attorneys for the plaintiffs obtained permission from a federal magistrate to depose Kornak at Elkton Federal Correctional Institution in Ohio.

At his sentencing in November 2005, Kornak apologized for his crimes but told a judge he was "used" by the hospital's former cancer research director, James A. Holland, who was fired along with Kornak shortly after the scandal broke about four years ago.

No one else, including Holland, has been charged in the case. Holland now works in a cancer research program at a Georgia hospital. A federal review of his research credentials is pending.

Albano To Testify In FBI Suit (SPRINGREP)

By Stephanie Barry

Springfield (MA) Republican, December 6, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - Former Springfield Mayor Michael J. Albano is among witnesses scheduled to testify in Boston federal court on behalf of four men and their families suing the government for an FBI-sanctioned frame-up in a 1965 murder.

Albano, once a Massachusetts Parole Board member, joins two former governors, notorious gangster-cum-informants and corrupt federal agents as witnesses for Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the estates of the late Louis Greco and Enrico "Henry" Tameleo.

The four - two of whom died in prison - were wrongly convicted of the murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan, who met a shower of mob bullets in a dark alley in Chelsea. They were falsely identified by onetime hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, whom the FBI wooed as a top-level informant in the 1960s. The three initially received death sentences in 1969, later commuted to life in prison.

What's more, the government knew it, even ignoring chatter about the then-proposed hit picked up on a secret FBI wire tap before Deegan's ambush, according to once-secret bureau records presented to bolster the plaintiffs' case.

Reports on the matter were made public during a 2001 U.S. Justice Department probe that exposed collusion among former Boston agents and their informants. Limone and Salvati were released after 30 years; Greco and Tameleo were pardoned posthumously. Their families are suing for malicious prosecution and conspiracy.

So, what does Albano have to do with a 40-year cover-up?

He's glad you asked.

Albano's once-lauded tenure as mayor, 1996-2004, was tainted when his administration became the subject of a federal corruption probe starting around 2000.

Albano argued he was targeted, in part, because he voted to pardon Limone in 1983. He said two FBI agents, one named in the Boston lawsuit, tried to bully him while the state police launched an investigation. Albano contended tangling with the bureau won him a spot on a black list, though investigators have denied this.

Many local political observers looked askance at Albano's theory as several in his administration were charged in federal court in connection with various scandals at City Hall.

More than a dozen were convicted and still more face trial, but Albano was never charged. He declined to run for a fifth term in 2003, moving into the private sector.

Contacted recently, the former mayor confirmed he will testify at the trial in U.S. District Court in Boston. He declined to discuss the case further, citing a gag order.

However, the complaint filed by the plaintiffs in 2002 refers directly to the FBI's treatment of parole board members who supported pardons for Limone, Salvati and Greco in the 1980s. Albano served from 1982 to 1994.

"FBI agents ... caused state law enforcement officials to investigate members of the Advisory Board of Pardons who had voted in favor of commutation to determine if they had relationships with 'organized crime,' with the intent to discourage members of the Board from supporting any future petitions for commutation by Limone," the complaint reads.

The trial began Nov. 16. Albano may testify next week.

Others on the witness list:

Gov. William F. Weld, Massachusetts U.S. attorney for a period in the 1980s;

Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, whom the plaintiffs argue was misled by federal investigators and denied commutations for Limone and others, and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, now serving a life sentence for 10 murders.

The plaintiffs also intend to introduce testimony from the late H. Paul Rico, the former FBI agent who facilitated the Boston cover-up and died in federal prison in 2004 while awaiting trial for a Miami murder.

Barboza and Flemmi's brother, Vincent, were suspected to have committed the murder. Barboza was gunned down in San Francisco in 1976. Vincent Flemmi died of a drug overdose in prison. As for any connection between the Boston cover-up and the current corruption investigation in this city, the local FBI supervisor scoffed at Albano's theory.

"When I got here in 2001, I had never, ever heard of Michael Albano," Springfield FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said during a recent interview. "Organized crime was so entrenched, I felt there had to be public corruption. I made it a priority. ... If it affected his administration, so be it."

Smokers Await Calif. High Court Ruling With Bated Breath (LAW)

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 6, 2006

More than 40 years ago, at age 13, Leslie Grisham was already hooked on smoking, convinced doing it would make her part of the cool crowd.

Even as subsequent scientific evidence revealed smoking could cause serious health problems, the Los Angeles-area woman claims she was misled by industry ads proclaiming cigarettes safe.

Five years ago, however, Grisham's faith was shattered when she was diagnosed with severe periodontal disease, which doctors said had been caused by toxins in cigarette smoke. She sued Philip Morris USA Inc. and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., accusing them of deceiving her for four decades about the safety of their products.

Today, the California Supreme Court will hear arguments in Grisham's case to resolve an unsettled point of law in the vast realm of smoking suits. At what point, the court must decide, are longtime smokers who relied on manufacturers' false safety claims required to file suit -- when health problems emerge or much earlier, when smokers realize they're addicted?

Millions of dollars in damages hinge on the court's decision. If the justices find that the statute of limitations tolls upon awareness of addiction, thousands of already sick smokers could be left with no recourse, while manufacturers' exposure to damages would be sharply limited.

Manufacturers consider addiction a disease in itself, and contend that all smoking-related claims accrue at that point. However, plaintiffs lawyers, knowing damages for addiction could be hard to prove, contend there are two statutes of limitations -- one at the time of addiction knowledge and another when an actual disease develops.

Kentfield appellate specialist Daniel Smith, who will argue Grisham's case, said last week that the court's ruling will be critical for ailing smokers who were lulled by ads into a sense of security only to develop emphysema, lung cancer, periodontal disease and other serious illnesses.

Tobacco manufacturers, he said, "misled the public by undermining truthful statements and attacking scientific conclusions as not yet being established. They effectively blunted the truth."

Smith, a solo practitioner, will share the lectern with Santa Monica, Calif., lawyer Martin Stanley, a solo practitioner who represents Maria Cannata, an emphysema victim who began smoking about the same time as Grisham. Both plaintiffs are seeking damages not only for their medical bills, but also for smoking cessation programs and the cost of all the cigarettes they purchased over the years.

Daniel Collins, a partner in Los Angeles' Munger, Tolles & Olson who is scheduled to present the industry's position today, didn't return several calls seeking comment. But based on his court documents, it appears he will argue that smokers shouldn't be allowed to wait decades to sue over use of products that the surgeon general declared hazardous in 1966, and addictive in 1988.

"Indeed, Grisham's complaint makes clear that she had actual knowledge of 'deadly health risks associated with smoking' long before her complaint was filed," Collins wrote, "and that she knew she was 'addicted' no later than 1993 -- nine years before she filed suit."

Grisham's and Cannata's case was referred to the state Supreme Court last year by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which noted different federal and California court interpretations about the statute of limitations in tobacco cases.

"The two lines of tobacco precedent in federal and state court," the 9th Circuit held, "may suggest that California law presumes a general public awareness of the risks of smoking, but that an individual plaintiff, in an appropriate case, can overcome this presumption and receive a jury determination on whether [his or her] reliance on cigarette manufacturers' misrepresentations are justifiable."

The case had reached the 9th Circuit after a Los Angeles federal court dismissed Grisham's and Cannata's case as being time barred.

That decision was based on the 9th Circuit's 2002 ruling in Soliman v. Philip Morris Inc., 311 F.3d 966, which held that the statute of limitations "began to run not when [the plaintiff] was first diagnosed with injuries stemming from his tobacco use, but

'when he should have known of any significant injury from [the companies'] wrongful conduct.'" The court said that included when smokers realized they were addicted.

Since then, however, two state appellate court cases -- 2004's Whiteley v. Philip Morris Inc., 117 Cal.App.4th 635, and 2005's Boeken v. Philip Morris Inc., 127 Cal.App.4th 1640 -- have held that a manufacturer's fraudulent statements might be more important than a smoker's awareness of addiction. A common-knowledge defense to fraud claims, the rulings held, raises a question of fact for a jury to decide.

"Our holdings in Soliman bind us," the 9th Circuit said in Grisham's case, "but at the same time we do not wish to ignore the intervening decisions of California's intermediate appellate courts."

The 9th Circuit judges stated that they would dismiss Grisham's and Cannata's claims if the California Supreme Court decides the two women "cannot overcome the presumed awareness that smoking causes addiction and other health problems."

In his court documents for Grisham, Smith argued that California law doesn't presume a smoker's awareness of addiction, nor does it deem addiction a trigger for the statute of limitations.

"It is illogical to absolve the industry from liability simply because addiction arose years before serious disabling injuries occurred or were diagnosed," he wrote.

In his answer brief for the manufacturers, Collins insists that it would be ridiculous to let career smokers -- aware of tobacco's dangers through accounts in the media, reports by the surgeon general and massive public health campaigns -- claim ignorance about the risks of smoking.

"In light of the overwhelming common knowledge of the dangers and addictiveness of smoking since at least 1988 (and well before)," he wrote, "consumers are presumed to be aware of those risks for statute-of-limitations purposes."

The case, which will be heard in Los Angeles, is Grisham v. Philip Morris U.S.A. Inc., S132772.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Inquiry Into Jail Begins (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, December 6, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice has opened a civil-rights investigation into the King County Jail in Seattle, focusing on sexual abuse of inmates and on allegations of inadequate suicide prevention and contagious-disease control.

Lawyers from the department's Special Litigation Section met with jail and public-health officials Monday and will conduct a wide-ranging investigation that may be expanded beyond those topics. The county learned of the investigation in a letter received by King County Executive Ron Sims last month.

"I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail," said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C. "Beyond that, I cannot comment."

The investigation will focus on the jail in downtown Seattle and will not involve the Regional Justice Center in Kent.

Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates and a third is awaiting a retrial after a jury failed to reach a verdict. The assaults surfaced in April 2005 after a female inmate was transferred to state prison and spoke up about the assault.

One of the former officers, Louis G. Laurencio, was sentenced to four months in jail last week after pleading guilty to inappropriately touching an inmate and photographing her breasts.

A report commissioned by the county and released two weeks ago found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication are among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention.

Cedric McGrew, who coerced an inmate to perform oral sex, is scheduled to be sentenced Dec. 15. Harland Richmond, accused of exposing himself to women and of later having sex with two female inmates, is scheduled for a second trial soon. His first trial ended in a mistrial in August when the jury failed to agree on a verdict.

"We've been pretty aggressive in dealing with jail staff misconduct," said Carolyn Duncan, a spokeswoman for Sims.

Jail Director Reed Holtgeerts said the county will cooperate fully with the DOJ investigation.

According to a list provided by the county, seven inmates have committed suicide while in custody since Jan. 1, 1999. They include three hangings, two self-induced poisonings, a suicide by jumping and a carbon-monoxide asphyxiation by an inmate on home confinement, according to inmate death certificates.

The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving "methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus," or MRSA, commonly called "Mersa."

In a letter last December to the Metropolitan King County Council, Dorothy Teeter, the interim director of the Seattle-King County Public Health Department, said Jail Health Services staff has been trained to prevent and watch for MRSA infections.

Justice Department Investigates King County Jail (AP)

SEATTLE - The U.S. Justice Department has launched a civil-rights investigation of the King County Jail following incidents of sexual abuse and allegations of inadequate suicide and disease prevention.

"I can confirm the existence of an investigation ... into the King County Jail," Cynthia Magnuson, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, D.C., told The Seattle Times. "Beyond that, I cannot comment."

The county was apprised of the investigation -- which concerns the downtown jail but not the Regional Justice Center in Kent -- in a letter to Executive Ron Sims last month, the newspaper said.

Jail and public-health officials met with Justice Department lawyers on Monday, and they plan to cooperate fully with the investigation, said jail director Reed Holtgeerts.

Two former jail guards have been convicted of sex-related acts with female inmates, while another is to be retried following a hung jury. Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999 -- three hangings, two poisonings, a suicide by jumping, plus a carbon-monoxide poisoning by an inmate on home confinement, according to the county. The jail also has investigated reports of potentially dangerous infections, including a jail death involving methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus, or MRSA, commonly called "Mersa."

Two weeks ago, the county released a report it commissioned which found that a sexualized work environment, meager training and poor communication were among the root causes of the string of sexual-misconduct allegations against corrections officers with the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention.

One of the former officers, Louis G. Laurencio, was sentenced to four months in jail last week after pleading guilty to inappropriately touching an inmate and photographing her breasts. Cedric McGrew, who coerced an inmate to perform oral sex, is to be sentenced Dec. 15. Harland Richmond, accused of exposing himself to women and of having sex with two female inmates, is scheduled for a second trial soon.

"We've been pretty aggressive in dealing with jail staff misconduct," said Carolyn Duncan, a spokeswoman for Sims.

Feds Look Into King County Jail Problems (SEAPI)

By Hector Castro, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, December 6, 2006

The past year has been a tough one for the King County Jail with corrections officers caught sexually abusing inmates, suicides and reports of contagious diseases.

Now, the federal government has begun an investigation into jail operations.

Monday, investigators with the U.S. Department of Justice visited the King County Jail to meet with staff and tour the facility, said Carolyn Duncan, spokeswoman for King County Executive Ron Sims.

"We're cooperating," Duncan said Tuesday. "Whatever suggestions they make, we're obviously going to be making changes."

In an Oct. 30 letter to Sims, the Justice Department told the county it would be examining the incarceration and treatment of inmates housed at the main jail in downtown Seattle, which has a bed capacity of 1,697.

"Our investigation will focus on the protection of inmates from harm, including, but not limited to, custodial sexual misconduct, inadequate suicide prevention measures, and inadequate contagious disease prevention measures," wrote Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim, who oversees the DOJ Civil Rights Division.

The letter went on to suggest the federal government may actually be able to assist King County in its efforts to improve conditions at the jail and the government may be able to provide financial assistance.

Jail officials have been working on problems cited in the letter for some time.

Last year, investigators learned about the first of several cases of sexual misconduct by jail guards. Reed Holtgeerts, director of the King County Department of Adult and Juvenile Detention, called in Seattle police to investigate whether there were any other cases.

To date, four guards have been charged with incidents related to sexual misconduct. Several other jail personnel have been disciplined as a result of several internal and criminal investigations into alleged misconduct.

In November, former corrections officer Cedric McGrew pleaded guilty to second-degree sexual misconduct and third-degree assault for having sexual contact with a female inmate and another woman in a work-release program. Another former officer, Louis Laurencio, was convicted of sexual misconduct and sentenced last week to four months in jail.

A third officer, Harland Richmond, is expected to face trial in January on unrelated sexual misconduct charges. And a female guard with the Youth Services Center, Lydia Korolak, was charged with custodial sexual misconduct for her alleged acts with two teenage inmates.

The county brought in an outside consultant, the Moss Group, to suggest ways to curtail sexual misconduct within the main jail. The consultants found in their study that many employees were themselves concerned about the atmosphere within the facility.

Jail officials have made several changes, many of them involving increased training of staff.

As for suicides, Duncan said King County's jail has fewer suicides per capita than is average for jail facilities nationwide, and a suicide prevention program.

Seven inmates have committed suicide since January 1999.

There also were recent concerns about the spread of MRSA, a type of staph skin infection resistant to traditional antibiotic treatments. Last year, in a letter to the King County Council regarding the problem, jail officials said there has been extensive training of the staff to prevent the spread of the disease.

Duncan said the contagious disease is not running rampant in the jail. "There's no medical epidemic," she said.

Still, it will be one area federal investigators will examine.

There is no timeline for when the investigation will be complete.

Atlanta Police Give Few Details For 'no Knocks' (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

AP, December 6, 2006

ATLANTA - Atlanta police often offer only cursory details when asking judges for so-called "no-knock" warrants that allow them to burst into homes unannounced, like the one used when an elderly woman was killed in a shootout with plainclothes officers as they stormed her home, according to an analysis by The Associated Press.

Police Chief Richard Pennington called for a review of how his agency uses the warrants after Kathryn Johnson died and three officers were wounded Nov. 21 in the shootout during a no-knock search for drugs in Johnson's northwest Atlanta home. Family members say Johnson was 92 years old; authorities claim she was 88.

An AP review of all no-knock warrants filed in Atlanta's Fulton County this year found that authorities often give scant detail when applying for the warrants, which are typically used to search for drugs and weapons. The special warrants are intended to prevent suspects from getting rid of evidence or to protect officers from suspects who can show a threat of violence.

In an August affidavit, an officer pursuing a suspect named "Kabuki" offered a two-line explanation for the no-knock warrant, claiming that an informant said people at the home "always carry pistols" and could store guns. In others, officers only detailed their years of experience with the police force as justification for no-knock powers.

Critics of no-knock warrants say Atlanta is no anomaly when it comes to judges granting the special search warrants to police on few details.

"One of the problems we have in the country are that lower-level judges who issue search warrants are notorious for being rubber stamps," said Donald E. Wilkes Jr., a University of Georgia law professor who studies the practice. "This is compounded by the fact that police tend to use these boilerplate allegations for no-knock search warrants."

Use of the warrants has ramped up as the war on drugs has intensified, said Peter Moskos, a former Baltimore police officer who teaches police studies at New York's John Jay College of Criminal Justice.

"The problem is that you do get cases where police bust down the wrong door and people die," he said. "And to me, it's not worth it. I don't really care if they flush the drugs down the toilet. I don't care if drugs are destroyed. So what? It's not like the drug war is being won."

Officers obtained the no-knock warrant to search Johnston's home by claiming there was a carefully monitored surveillance system in the home and that an informant recently bought $50 worth of crack cocaine at the house from a man called "Sam."

But since the woman's death, concern over the police's investigation has increased. Her friends and neighbors describe Johnston as a woman who rarely left her one-story brick home and carried a rusty revolver for her protection. The informant cited in the search warrant's affidavit told Atlanta television station WAGA-TV last week that he was never at the house and that he was coached by police to cover for them.

Pennington has said Johnston's death has led his department to closely scrutinize its procedures. The FBI is investigating the shootout.

"Were mistakes made? That is yet to be determined. Could we, or should we, have done anything differently? That will also be determined," Pennington wrote in an Atlanta Journal-Constitution editorial.

"But I do know this: Every policy and procedure that the Atlanta Police Department relies on for guidance in drug arrests and search warrants will be scrutinized."

Pennington said at a community meeting Monday that of the 200 search warrants his department has served this year, 20 have been no-knock warrants. At the meeting, hosted by the NAACP, many in the audience wanted to know where in the city the no-knock warrants had been served - accusing the department of targeting poor, black neighborhoods.

The NAACP is now calling for the establishment of a civilian review board with subpoena powers. On Sunday, the Rev. Al Sharpton called for a congressional inquiry into incidents like Johnston's and the fatal police shooting on Nov. 25 of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell in New York.

In Atlanta, community members and police have been at odds since Johnston's shooting, and Mayor Shirley Franklin has publicly defended Pennington in an effort to ease tensions. The case has been turned over to state and federal authorities for investigation.

On the federal level, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that evidence obtained in violation of police knock-and-announce rules could be used at trial. A measure was proposed in the House of Representatives shortly after the ruling that would have blocked the Justice Department from obtaining evidence without officers knocking and announcing first. It failed by a 310-109 vote.

Federal Case May Be A Longshot (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 6, 2006

While federal officials said they are only monitoring developments in the fatal shooting of Sean Bell, new data indicate that making criminal cases against law enforcement officials such as cops is still a difficult task for the Brooklyn U.S. Attorneys Office, the office that would have jurisdiction if the case shifted to the FBI.

The probe into the police shooting of Bell and two friends on Nov. 25 outside the Kalua Cabaret in Jamaica is currently being handled by Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, who has promised a thorough and fair inquiry. As of Tuesday, the case hadn't been sent to the local grand jury where prosecutors would have to not only present evidence against the cops but also raise the issue of self-defense.

Tuesday attorneys for the wounded men signaled they would be waiting to see what happens to the Brown case before going to federal prosecutors.

"We're taking a wait-and-see attitude," said lawyer Sanford Rubenstein, who wouldn't speculate about what his next move would be if no state indictment comes. "Our clients are fully cooperating with the Queens district attorney in this case."

But federal prosecutors nationwide, including Brooklyn, find that making a criminal case against law enforcement officials for misconduct -- be they federal agents or local police -- is tough. Nationally, data show that 96 percent of civil rights cases are not prosecuted.

As reported in October by Newsday, Brooklyn federal prosecutors in fiscal 2005 declined to prosecute 75 percent of civil rights cases, be they complaints about police misconduct, racial violence or human trafficking, according to data compiled by the Department of Justice.

In recent weeks the data, compiled by the non-profit Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, affiliated with Syracuse University, showed that Brooklyn federal prosecutors continued to take a tough look at complaints involving specific allegations of law enforcement misconduct. Statistics for the first 10 months of fiscal 2006 (October 2005 through July 2006) found the prosecutors declined to prosecute 91 percent of allegations involving "deprivation of rights under color of law," the statute that covers police and other law enforcement misconduct.

Though the data didn't readily show why the cases were declined, statistics for fiscal 2005 showed that weak or insufficient evidence and lack of evidence of criminal intent were key reasons for tossing the cases. An additional problem, said one federal prosecutor yesterday who didn't want to be named, was the standard of criminal intent required under the civil rights law. The standard was a high one for prosecutors to meet, said the official, who added that the issue of self defense in a police shooting could make a federal case harder to prove.

Still, while federal prosecutions of law enforcement aren't frequent, the cases that do go trial often lead to convictions. For instance Brooklyn federal investigators in fiscal year 2006 convicted 84 percent of the law enforcement defendants accused of civil rights violations. A spokesman for the Brooklyn U.S. attorneys office couldn't provide a list of such cases late yesterday, but noted that a number of law enforcement defendants, including "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, had been convicted or charged this year for offenses committed while acting as public officials.

"Getting convictions in these kinds of cases isn't easy, but it is not impossible," said Rubenstein, noting how his former client Abner Louima was able to prevail in getting justice when police officers were convicted in Brooklyn federal court in connection with the attack on him in 1997.

"We proved in the Louima ... [case] that federal government can bring to justice police officers who have acted criminally."

Port Chester Challenges U.S. Government's Stance Over Election System (NYJN)

By Liz Sadler

NY Journal News, December 6, 2006

PORT CHESTER - The village is challenging the federal government's claim that its election system illegally disenfranchises Hispanic voters, possibly paving the way for an expensive legal battle.

The Board of Trustees voted unanimously tonight to notify the U.S. Department of Justice that it does not believe the village's at-large election system violates Section 2 of the federal Voting Rights Act, as claimed by the Justice Department. The board reached the decision after reviewing data the Justice Department provided the village.

"The federal government's data does not credibly support their allegations and contentions," Mayor Gerald Logan said before the vote. "I speak for the entire Board of Trustees when I say that we are shocked. The federal government has been working on their case for the past three years. I can only imagine the waste of taxpayer dollars."

Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, said he had already notified the Justice Department of the board's decision and "they've indicated they will get back to us." Piscionere said he could not speculate about whether a lawsuit is imminent.

"It's very hard to say at this point," he said. "What I'd like to see is some further dialogue."

Tonight's decision came in response to an April 20 letter from the Justice Department to Village Attorney Anthony Cerreto that threatened to sue the village unless it switches to district voting. The letter called for a districting plan that includes a majority Hispanic district and concluded that "voting patterns in Port Chester are polarized by ethnicity."

Though the village's population is nearly half Hispanic, no Hispanic has ever been elected to village office. Hispanic residents represent about 22 percent of the citizen voting age population, or 3,058 of 13,980 eligible voters.

Hawaii Schools' Racial Enrollment Upheld (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

The Kamehameha Schools in Hawaii, private schools with an endowment of more than $6 billion, are entitled to limit their enrollment to Native Hawaiian children, a federal appeals court panel in San Francisco ruled yesterday by a vote of 8 to 7.

Students may be denied admission based on their race without running afoul of a civil rights law, the majority ruled, citing what it said were unique factors in the history of Hawaii, the plight of Native Hawaiians and the schools' distinctively remedial mission, which Congress has repeatedly endorsed.

The schools are the only beneficiary of the enormous legacy of a 19th-century Hawaiian princess. They have an enrollment of some 5,000 students, from kindergarten through 12th grade, on campuses on three islands. Admission is a great prize, as students pay about $1,800 in annual tuition for an education worth about $20,000.

The schools' admissions policy requires prospective students to prove that at least one ancestor lived on the Hawaiian Islands in 1778, when the British explorer Capt. James Cook arrived.

The suit was brought by a student identified as John Doe. The schools conceded that the student probably would have been admitted had he possessed Hawaiian ancestry. The suit argued that the admission policy ran afoul of a Reconstruction-era law, the Civil Rights Act of 1866. The court, splitting almost entirely along partisan lines, ruled that the prohibition did not apply to the schools' admissions program. (The eight judges in the majority were appointed by Democratic presidents. All but one of the dissenters were appointed by Republicans.)

"The schools are a wholly private K-12 educational establishment, whose preferential admissions policy is meant to counteract the significant, current educational deficits of Native Hawaiian children in Hawaii," Judge Susan P. Graber wrote for the majority. That fact, coupled with Congressional praise for the schools' mission, she wrote, meant that the admission program did not violate the civil rights law.

The decision overturned a decision by a divided three-judge panel last year. Judge Graber was in dissent in that decision. Judge Jay S. Bybee, who wrote the principal dissent yesterday, wrote the majority decision last year.

Eric Grant, the plaintiff's lawyer, said he would ask the United States Supreme Court to hear the case. "We're disappointed to be on the seven side rather than the eight," Mr. Grant said. But the closeness of the vote, he added, made Supreme Court review more likely.

Kathleen M. Sullivan, a lawyer for the schools and a law professor at Stanford, said her clients were elated by the decision and particularly by its unanimity on some points.

"All of the judges agreed that the Kamehameha School has a noble mission and has had extraordinary success in addressing what all the judges admitted are the continuing disadvantages suffered by Native Hawaiians," Professor Sullivan said.

The schools' history and mandate is so unusual, she added, that yesterday's decision will have "no precedential impact on any other school in the nation."

In a dissent joined at least in part by six other judges, Judge Bybee said the schools' worthy mission nonetheless violated the law.

"I cannot reconcile its admissions preferences — a racially exclusive policy that operates as a complete bar to all applicants who are not of the preferred race — with the Supreme Court's requirements for a valid affirmative action plan," Judge Bybee wrote. "The majority exempts an organization with noble goals that seeks to remedy a significant problem in a community that is in great need, but it can do so only because the majority departs from clear principles and established precedent."

The case from Hawaii is only superficially similar to the ones from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., argued Monday before the United States Supreme Court, Professor Sullivan said.

In contrast to the schools involved in the Supreme Court case, the Kamehameha schools are private, receiving no federal funds; they say their discrimination is remedial, meant to address historical wrongs; the beneficiaries are indigenous peoples; and the program has met with Congressional approval.

The student-assignment programs before the Supreme Court, Professor Sullivan said, involve public schools, mean to achieve racial diversity, are not directed at any particular racial group and come without similar Congressional endorsement.

Federal Appeals Court Upholds School's Admissions Policy Favoring Hawaiian Natives (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 6, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-A private school in Hawaii can favor Hawaiian natives for admission as a means of giving a helping hand to a downtrodden indigenous population, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

The decision by a 15-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned an earlier ruling by three of the same judges that the Kamehameha Schools policy amounted to unlawful discrimination.

In Tuesday's decision, the majority noted that the case was unique because Congress has singled out the plight of native Hawaiians for improvement, just as lawmakers have done with Alaskan natives and American Indians.

The policy "furthers the urgent need for better education of Native Hawaiians, which Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary," the court said.

Admission to the elite school is first granted to qualified Hawaiian students, and non-Hawaiians may be admitted if there are openings available.

Only one in eight eligible applicants is admitted to the schools, which serve about 5,400 students at three campuses.

The case was brought by a white student excluded because of his race.

Three of the dissenting judges wrote separately that civil rights law prohibits a private school from denying admission because of race.

The Kamehameha Schools were established under the 1883 will of Princess Bernice Pauahi Bishop as part of a trust now worth about $6.8 billion (â,¬5.1 billion).

The trust subsidizes tuition and is designed to help remedy some of the wrongs done during the U.S.-backed overthrow of the Hawaiian kingdom in 1893.

The decision came a day after the Supreme Court suggested during arguments in a different case that it might ban the practice of race-based admissions in public schools, even if the policy was intended to create racial harmony.

The last time the Supreme Court ruled on a similar issue was in 2003, when justices banned the use of rigid formulas that award points based on race for admission to the University of Michigan and its law school.

But the court that same year also permitted colleges to consider race as part of a "holistic review" of every application.

Private School Is Allowed To Favor Native Hawaiians In Its Admissions (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

The 9th Circuit Court splits 8-7 on the policy for educational parity.

DOJ_NMG_0102805

A sharply divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that a private school can favor Native Hawaiians for admissions in an effort to "counteract the significant, current educational deficits" experienced by the islands' indigenous population.

In an 8-7 ruling, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco held that the admissions policy of Hawaii's Kamehameha Schools is constitutional because it is narrowly tailored to remedy a well-documented problem and does not unnecessarily trammel on the rights of other students.

The schools' policy furthers a goal that "Congress has repeatedly identified as necessary," Judge Susan P. Graber wrote for the majority.

Native Hawaiian students, she wrote, "are systematically disadvantaged in the classroom." They score lower on standardized tests than other ethnic groups in the state, are more likely to be in special education classes, and are less likely to graduate from high school and attend college.

The Kamehameha Schools — with campuses on Oahu, Maui and Hawaii — admit students from kindergarten through 12th grade. They were founded in 1887 to educate Native Hawaiians and are supported by a $6.2-billion trust endowed by the last direct descendant of King Kamehameha I.

The schools receive no federal funding and typically cover 60% or more of a student's tuition — making them considerably less expensive than other private schools in Hawaii.

Graber said the schools' admission policy "is not an absolute bar to non-Native Hawaiians; instead it is intended only for so long as Native Hawaiians suffer educational disadvantages."

But Judge Jay S. Bybee, writing for the dissenters, said the policy clearly violated the rights of other students by in effect blocking their admission. Kamehameha has admitted only one non-Native Hawaiian since 1962, he said.

The case highlighted a stark ideological divide on the 9th Circuit, which considers federal appeals in nine Western states, including California. All eight judges who voted to uphold the school's policy were appointed by Democratic presidents, whereas all but one of the dissenting judges were appointed by Republicans.

The ruling came one day after two affirmative action cases were argued before the U.S. Supreme Court, in which the debate suggested most justices favor halting the use of race to assign students to public schools.

But Stanford University law professor Kathleen Sullivan, who argued the case successfully for Kamehameha Schools, said: "Apart from the fact that both are about education, our case is nothing like" the Seattle and Louisville, Ky., school systems cases before the high court.

"Kamehameha is private; Seattle and Louisville are public. Kamehameha involves remedial preferences; Seattle and Louisville involved diversity," Sullivan said. "Kamehameha involves preferences of a kind explicitly adopted by Congress; Seattle and Louisville do not."

Kamehameha is highly selective, with only one in every eight students who applies gaining admission.

The case was brought by a white Hawaiian student who initially was denied admission to Kamehameha four years ago when he applied for the 9th grade, and then was turned down the next three years too, said the applicant's attorney, Eric Grant.

A U.S. district judge in Honolulu initially dismissed the case. But the student, identified as John Doe, appealed to the 9th Circuit and prevailed, 2 to 1, last year in a decision written by Bybee. But Kamehameha was granted a rehearing by a larger panel of judges, setting the stage for Tuesday's ruling.

Hawaii's political establishment, including its Republican governor and its full congressional delegation, supported the schools' position in the case.

Grant said he and his client were disappointed but planned to ask the Supreme Court to review the case. "We think the closeness of the decision bodes very well for the eventual resolution of this case by the U.S. Supreme Court," Grant said. "The admissions policy does operate as an absolute exclusion of children with the wrong ancestry."

He said John Doe is now a freshman in college but declined to say where.

But Sullivan said that "it is hard to see why the Supreme Court would be interested in a case that turns on such unique circumstances. There is no other case just like this one."

Black, White And Brown (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

FIFTY-TWO YEARS after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in Brown vs. Board of Education that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," the court still can't agree on what that landmark decision really meant. That was painfully clear Monday when the Brown ruling was cited by justices on both sides of a debate over the constitutionality of programs that try to maintain a racial balance in public schools.

It was equally clear that the outcome of the cases, from Seattle and Louisville, hangs on the vote of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. Some of Kennedy's comments from the bench Monday were ominous for the school districts. But if Kennedy views Brown in the proper perspective, he will provide a fifth vote to allow school districts, including the Los Angeles Unified School District, to experiment with ways to bring children of different races together in the classroom.

Brown vs. Board of Education, of course, was the 1954 case in which the court ruled that Topeka, Kan., and several Southern states had violated the 14th Amendment's guarantee of "equal protection of the laws" by operating separate schools for whites and blacks. Yet wrapped inside that seemingly straightforward result was a riddle. Were segregated schools wrong because they violated the principle that pupil assignments must always be "colorblind," or because they took race into account for a malign purpose: to separate "superior" whites from "inferior" African Americans?

Four conservatives on the Supreme Court seem wedded to the first view of Brown. In their view, once the vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are remedied, schools may not engage in what Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. has called the "sordid business [of] divvying us up by race."

But for the court's four liberal justices, Brown wasn't primarily about abstract colorblindness. Rather, it was about giving force to the 14th Amendment, which was intended, as Justice Stephen G. Breyer noted Monday, "to take people who had formerly been slaves and their children and make them full members of American society. And part of that was that the state couldn't insist that they go to separate schools."

Breyer has the better of the argument. Taking account of race to bring children of different backgrounds together is fundamentally different from using race to keep those children apart. Is there a ray of hope that Kennedy, the likely swing vote in these cases, will agree?

At several points Monday, he seemed to be endorsing his conservative colleagues' colorblind approach. At other points, he signaled that he recognizes that efforts to integrate schools are not the moral or constitutional equivalent of pre-Brown school segregation. In this, as in so many other cases, what Kennedy decides may well dictate what the court itself does.

It's Not Black And White (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, December 6, 2006

Monday, the Supreme Court once again ventured into the quagmire of affirmative action. In two cases, the court will decide whether it is permissible to use race as a criteria in the selection of students on the elementary or high school levels — three years after the court barely sustained the use of such policies on the university level.

Even after many decades, affirmative action remains one of the most contentious issues in our society. Yet, like abortion, there appears to be less, not more, true dialogue. Many people who are uncomfortable with these programs remain silent in fear that their concerns will be misconstrued or mischaracterized.

All too often, critics of affirmative action are dismissed as racists. Such hair-trigger attacks were common during the debate over Michigan's Proposition 2, a ban on affirmative action in government contracts, hiring and public education. In launching his organization's campaign against the measure, NAACP President Bruce Gordon said the organization "does not plan to stand by while the architects of racism dismantle affirmative action programs that attempt to level the playing field in higher education and help create a diverse work force."

Such racial politics clearly did not serve opponents well: The proposition passed with an impressive 58% of the vote. According to Gordon's logic, does that mean that 58% of Michigan is either racist or enabling racism? If so, 55% of Californians were racists in 1996 when they enacted Proposition 209 barring affirmative action, and 59% of voters in Washington were racists in 1998 when they passed Initiative 200 that imposes a similar ban.

Most Americans are neither racist nor hostile to the ends sought by affirmative action. It remains a question of means.

We have a long way to go to bring down the continuing economic and social barriers for African-Americans. There is considerable support for programs to assist minority students with extra funds for improving schools, creating scholarships, and affording greater opportunities to excel on their own merit. There is also broad support for continuing to offer low-interest loans to minority businesses to help get them into the competitive marketplace. Nonetheless, there is a valid distinction between programs that "level the field" of competition and programs that direct its outcome.

When it finally comes down to the competition itself between students or businesses vying for the same goals, the outcome should be based entirely on merit. In other words, we need to draw a clear line between programs that assist minority students and businesses in reaching the field of competition and those that favor competitors on the basis of race, gender or religion. That means that some anti-affirmative action measures go too far. Yet, it is equally wrong when the government moves beyond facilitating and begins manipulating competition.

Under such an approach, states would be allowed to give disproportionate funds for improving opportunities for minority students or businesses, but they would be barred from using racial preferences in competitive selections for schools, government contracts, or hiring. For example, while a minority business can be given special help in its formation, government contracts should be awarded entirely on the basis of the best product and the lowest cost for citizens.

Not surprisingly, both sides take different meanings from studies of the effect of eliminating affirmative action programs. Thus, many people were rightfully alarmed to learn that UCLA would have only 96 African-Americans among its incoming freshmen — 2% of the class. For affirmative action advocates, it shows why special programs are necessary even after so many years of racial preferences in selection. For opponents of affirmative action, it shows that many students in prior years were not the most qualified on academic scores and achievement.

Both sides might be partially correct. The fall in minority admissions and minority contractors should motivate leaders to improve recruiting efforts in minority areas for schools and explore programs to help minority businesses. But it also shows that many past students and businesses were not sufficiently competitive to prevail on a playing field that is entirely free of racial preference in selection.

Some leaders, however, cannot shake the desire to manipulate the final outcome of competition. After Proposition 2 passed, Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick stated his interest in an ordinance that gave a preference to Detroit-based contractors — who would presumably be largely minorities in the largely minority city population. "That way, you don't have to deal with gender or race," said the mayor's spokesperson. Putting aside the legal mistake of openly admitting an intention to create de facto preferences to avoid the law, Kilpatrick would be better off addressing the underlying reasons for the lack of competitive showing through special pre-competition programs. Indeed, the removal of preferences will increase the pressure on such firms to be competitive and the pressure on cities such as Detroit to better educate and train citizens for such competition.

It is time to have a substantive dialogue about the promise and limits of affirmative action — free of race-baiting language. Opposing some forms of affirmative action does not make someone any more of a racist than opposing abortion makes someone a misogynist.

Until such true dialogue occurs, we will continue to speak to each other through ballot referendums, or worse yet, many will continue not to speak to each other at all.

Police Analyst Sues New York, Charging Anti-Muslim E-Mail (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

For several years, the New York Police Department has touted an elite undercover unit of Middle Eastern and Asian investigators who use their foreign-language skills online to search out potential terrorist threats against the city.

But now the department is under sharp criticism from a member of the unit, an Egyptian-born analyst who filed a lawsuit yesterday that charges he was subjected to hundreds of blistering anti-Muslim and anti-Arab e-mail messages sent out by a city contractor over the course of three years.

The analyst, who is not named in the court papers, filed the discrimination lawsuit in federal court in Manhattan as "John Doe Anti-Terrorism Officer" because he still works undercover in the Cyber Unit. In an interview yesterday, he said that he complained repeatedly to his supervisors about the messages but that no one took action.

A 48-year-old captain with the New York City Department of Correction, the analyst has been assigned to work with the Police Department's Intelligence Division since 1998. He said he helped to form the Cyber Unit in 2002. He and the other members, who number about a dozen, troll message boards and Web sites to engage extremists and collect intelligence about potential threats, the lawsuit says. He fears that his family in Egypt might face retaliation if his name and the nature of his work were revealed, said his lawyer, Ilann M. Maazel.

At the center of the lawsuit are e-mail briefing messages sent out several times a day to members of the Intelligence Division by Bruce Tefft, a former C.I.A. official who has identified himself in the past as the Police Department's counter-terrorism adviser.

Mr. Tefft worked for Orion, a company that provided the department with counter-terrorism information culled from its massive database, including news articles and other materials known as open-source intelligence.

According to the suit, the briefing messages were preceded by commentary from Mr. Tefft that included virulent anti-Muslim and anti-Arab statements like, "Burning the hate-filled Koran should be viewed as a public service at the least," and "This is not a war against terrorism ... it is against Islam and we are not winning."

In one message, he asked, "Has the U.S. threatened to vaporize Mecca?" and responded, "Excellent idea, if true."

"These e-mail briefings ridiculed and disparaged the Muslim religion and Arab people, and stated that Muslim- and Arab-Americans were untrustworthy and could not reliably serve in law enforcement positions or handle sensitive data," the suit said.

Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman, said in an e-mail message that the department moved to stop the e-mail messages when it became aware of a complaint about them. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Panel Backs Guideline Favoring Voting-Machine Verification (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

A federal panel voted yesterday to begin developing a national standard that could result in the gradual phasing out of the paperless electronic voting machines in use across the Washington region and in many parts of the country.

The "next generation" of voting systems should have an independent means of verifying election results, the Technical Guidelines Development Committee said. The standard would have to be adopted by the U.S. Election Assistance Commission.

"This seems to mark the end of an era" for paperless electronic voting, said Doug Chapin, director of electionline.org, a nonpartisan organization that tracks changes in the country's election systems.

The commission and its advisory panel have yet to determine when the new standard would go into effect and how it would apply. A report prepared by scientists at the National Institute of Standards and Technology last week said the new standard would not be implemented until 2009 at the earliest.

Some politicians indicated yesterday that they would move more quickly to add verification systems -- also known as paper trails -- to voting systems that lack them.

The speaker of Maryland's House of Delegates, Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel), said the legislature would start exploring options for a paper trail during its upcoming session with an eye toward having something in place for the 2008 elections.

"It would be nice if we could get a look at a couple of options," Busch said. "The price tag is going to be great."

Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) said his administration would "have to find some way to move forward" and noted that a transition panel is looking at election issues.

Maryland is one of five states that exclusively use electronic voting systems that offer no independent means of verifying an election result. Virginia and 10 other states, as well as the District, use such systems in some jurisdictions or allow voters to choose whether to use them or some other voting system.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) said he plans a careful review of the findings. "I'm going to take a look at this report. I've talked to a lot of people who are very concerned about electronic machines without a paper trail," he said.

Del. Timothy D. Hugo (R-Fairfax), a main sponsor of unsuccessful legislation in Virginia's General Assembly last year that would have required the state to launch a paper-trail pilot program, said: "I think the committee recommendations will help validate what we have been doing. It will really make people stand up and pay attention."

District Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) said in a statement that the red flags raised by the federal panel had caught his attention and that "we need assurances that election outcomes are reliable. As Mayor, I will work closely with the Council and the Board of Elections to make sure that the District of Columbia's election process is regulated and administered in a fashion that supports the report's findings and is in-line with best practices from around the Country."

In unanimously approving the resolution yesterday, members of the panel made it clear that they would not recommend that states stop using such systems "at this time" as long as proper security measures are in place.

The panel also said the commission should ensure that all voters -- including disabled ones -- "can verify the independent voting record." Advocates for people with disabilities have said that existing systems of verification, such as electronic voting machines that show voters a printed summary of their choices before they cast their ballots, would not be accessible to blind voters.

The voting-machine industry will have to come up with new technology to satisfy the need to provide verification accessible to all voters, said James C. Dickson, vice president for governmental affairs at the American Association of People with Disabilities. That means it could be 2020 before the voting systems envisioned by the panel are "widely available in polling places."

A supporter of the paperless electronic machines, Dickson disputed the notion that the panel's resolution meant the end of an era for such systems. "Era, schmera," he said. "There isn't any money to buy anything else."

The panel considered a similar resolution Monday but deadlocked and failed to pass it. The version adopted yesterday contained new language that grandfathers in existing systems, calls on the commission to ensure that verification systems are universally accessible and credits election officials and voting-machine makers for adopting security controls.

Michael Newman, a spokesman for the National Institute of Standards and Technology, said the panel, which the institute is advising, would have until the end of July to prepare a draft set of standards that would then be considered by the Election Assistance Commission.

The commission would solicit public input before adopting new standards. The standards are voluntary, but many state laws require voting systems to meet federal or national criteria before they can be used.

Microsoft Technical Documents Back On Track In Antitrust Case (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, December 6, 2006

Microsoft sets up delivery schedule after complaints about the company's technical documentation caused delays in the DOJ antitrust case

A U.S. district judge on Tuesday praised the schedule set up in a revamped technical documentation project that's part of the 4-year-old antitrust settlement between Microsoft Corp. and the U.S. government.

Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, hailed a new plan that would deliver 58 documents related to Microsoft's software communication protocols by Dec. 15, with more documents coming in February, April and May.

Kollar-Kotelly in May approved a two-year extension to parts of her antitrust judgment against Microsoft because of ongoing problems in the technical documentation for Microsoft's software communication protocols.

"I hope this approach works," Kollar-Kotelly said during Tuesday's antitrust compliance hearing. "We seem to be on the correct time table."

Kollar-Kotelly, in an antitrust settlement approved in November 2002, ordered Microsoft to create the technical documentation so that competing software companies can buy licenses to Microsoft's communications protocols and make products that work with Microsoft software.

The judge expressed support for the new plan after numerous delays and past complaints about the quality of technical documentation."We'll have to see if this achieves the [results] that have eluded us so far," she said after Microsoft representatives explained the technical documentation "reset," as they called it.

Under the plan, Microsoft delivered 32 technical documents to the court-mandated technical committee overseeing the settlement by Oct. 25, and is on track to deliver another 26 documents by Dec. 15. The technical documentation that's most useful to protocol licensees will be delivered first, Microsoft said.

The schedule has Microsoft delivering another 99 technical documents between Feb. 22 and May 29. About 90 days after the initial release of a document, Microsoft will give the technical committee and licensees an online build of the document.

In addition, there were 943 identified problems with the current technical documentation as of Oct. 31, up from 835 problems identified as of Sept. 30, according to court records. Microsoft will work on fixing those problems as part of the revamped documentation project, said Robert Muglia, senior vice president of Microsoft's server and tools business.

Lawyers for the U.S. Department of Justice and some of the plaintiff states in the antitrust case said the documentation plan seems to be working. But Stephen Houck, a lawyer for the California group of state plaintiffs in the case, noted that hundreds of problems still exist in the current documentation.

"While much as been accomplished, there's much left to do," Houck said.

Muglia walked the judge through an example of the new technical documentation, and Kollar-Kotelly noted the new version had "a lot more details."

"My only wish is that it had been done earlier, so we wouldn't be at this point," she said.

US Airways Won't Fight Over Delta Deal (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 6, 2006

US Airways will give up its proposed takeover of Delta Air Lines if management there can't be persuaded of the benefits, US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Tuesday.

Parker said he's not prepared to fight Delta's management in bankruptcy court by submitting a merger plan to the judge without the backing of Delta officials.

"We have to get to a point where we are all working together on this, or it's not going to happen," Parker said at a meeting with editors and reporters at USA TODAY. "This is all about convincing Delta's management that this plan makes sense."

US Airways has made an unsolicited takeover offer of $8.5 billion in cash and stock to acquire Delta, the USA's third-biggest carrier.

Delta's management has rebuffed the offer, saying it's too risky and that Delta is better off as an independent airline. Delta declined to comment on Parker's remarks. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein has repeatedly voiced opposition to the merger proposal since US Airways announced it Nov. 15.

In a memo to employees Tuesday, Grinstein said Delta, "is making crucial progress toward becoming a strong, independent, stand-alone company."

But because Delta is in bankruptcy, its management does not have complete control of the company's fate. Its creditors must approve Delta's post-bankruptcy business plan before the airline can exit. Delta executives plan to unveil the plan this month.

Delta CFO Ed Bastian has expressed alarm that a merger would prolong the airline's stay in bankruptcy at least by several months because it would have to be reviewed by antitrust experts at the U.S. Department of Justice. That would increase Delta's bankruptcy costs and run the risk of a downturn in the economy or a spike in jet fuel prices, Bastian says.

Parker predicted a US Airways-Delta merger could close by June 30, 2007, roughly when Delta had predicted emerging from bankruptcy alone.

Parker called the proposed merger schedule "aggressive," but said he believes it can be done, although his airline is still working through last year's merger of America West and the old US Airways.

Although that deal closed 15 months ago, the new, combined US Airways is still flying with two separate reservation systems and two sets of pilots and flight attendants who are scheduled separately and who work under separate labor contracts.

Parker and US Airways President Scott Kirby said they would finish merging America West and the old US Airways before beginning a merger with Delta.

Delta Chief Firmly Against Merger (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

US Airways Proposal Bad for Consumers, Grinstein Asserts

The top executive at Delta Air Lines said he would vigorously defend his company against an unsolicited takeover bid, insisting that the Atlanta-based carrier would be a stronger company and better for consumers if it remained independent.

In his first interview since US Airways Group announced its merger proposal last month, Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said he was confident that creditors would accept his reorganization plan. He also said it would be difficult for a combined company to overcome internal and regulatory hurdles.

"Whenever you go from having two carriers to one, or three carriers to two, that is going to have a consumer impact," he said. "There will be a loss of service in some smaller communities. There will be an increase in fares. . . . There is no question that there are antitrust issues that won't be quickly or easily resolved."

"I think the track record of good mergers is hard to find" in the airline industry, he said.

Delta and US Airways are battling to convince creditors, regulators and legislators of the virtues of their competing plans. US Airways has dominated the early rounds. Its stock price soared the day the merger proposal was announced but has since retreated slightly.

Many outside analysts and airline executives think the industry needs to consolidate to improve its financial outlook.

Grinstein, 74, has been working to get Delta, the nation's third-largest carrier, out of Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection for the past year. He is expected in the coming weeks to present creditors and the court with a reorganization plan that he says would be better for creditors than US Airways' $8.5 billion offer.

Several analysts and executives at other airlines said US Airways appeared to have lost momentum, as investors and creditors look more carefully at the merger proposal. Among their concerns are the reaction of regulators, the new Democratic-controlled Congress and the short time available for US Airways to complete a deal. US Airways hopes to do that before Delta leaves bankruptcy protection, which is expected next year. Otherwise, US Airways would lose some cost-cutting advantages it could gain in the bankruptcy process.

"There are more chances of this deal being killed because of market forces and the Justice Department," said Michael Miller, an analyst with the Velocity Group. But, he added, the offer has "the power of dollars behind it."

Ray Neidl, another analyst, said the merger proposal has a 30 to 40 percent chance of overcoming internal and regulatory hurdles in such a short time.

US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker said he was confident that the merger would be completed. Creditors seem receptive to the offer, he said in an interview. "It was well received and the process continues. The process is gaining steam."

Parker expressed confidence that the companies could address antitrust issues. A combined airline would probably have to sell some airport gates and one of the lucrative shuttle routes among Washington, New York and Boston, US Airways executives acknowledged.

Parker is interested in Delta because the two airlines compete on many of the same routes. A merger would allow him to reduce the number of flights and aircraft serving those cities. He said he thought such a business plan would save $1.6 billion a year by combining functions and cutting flights.

Parker said such a strategy would benefit consumers by offering them a healthier airline that serves more destinations. He said the new airline would not raise fares.

"Consumers will be better off," he said.

Grinstein disputed that claim and said his airline would serve customers better without a merger because it has already streamlined operations and achieved more than $2 billion in annual savings.

Although it is still has problems with mishandled baggage and major delays at some airports, Grinstein said Delta is using planes more efficiently and plans to expand its lucrative international routes.

Grinstein would not discuss the specifics of his restructuring plan and said he did not know what creditors thought of the US Airways offer. "They have their cards to play and they are going to play them," he said.

He said there were a variety of obstacles that would make a merger difficult, such as the airlines' different fleets, employment structures and cultures.

US Airways also hasn't fully digested its prior merger, with America West, raising questions about whether it could handle a hostile takeover at the same time, Grinstein said.

"They haven't concluded last night's dinner before planning tonight's," he said. "This was totally unexpected, unsolicited, unencouraged and unhoped for. . . . We are so dissimilar. We have different equipment. We have different service philosophies."

If the merger sets off a spree of consolidation among the other major carriers -- American, Continental, United and Northwest -- the outlook wouldn't be good for a combined Delta and US Airways, which would be smaller than other partnerships, Grinstein said.

"If this devolves into three systems, which is the weakest of the three systems?" he said. "The answer is pretty clear."

Grinstein declined several attempts by Parker to discuss merger possibilities before US Airways made its offer public last month. The Delta executive said he was surprised to learn of the offer while listening to the radio at home before going to work. "I would have handled it differently," Grinstein said.

FCC Chair Acts To Clear Vote On Telecoms By GOP Panelist (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK — If you can't settle through negotiation, why not try a different approach?

So it goes these days at the Federal Communications Commission, which is using legal maneuvering to break its 2-2 deadlock on the pending AT&T-BellSouth merger.

The $80 billion deal just needs FCC approval to close. It already has received the other necessary approval, from the Department of Justice, which imposed no conditions.

Last week, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin asked the panel's third Republican to cast the tiebreaking vote on the deal. The commissioner, Robert McDowell, has recused himself because he worked as a lobbyist for a trade group opposing the deal. McDowell also cited ethical concerns of the Virginia Bar Association.

An official can be unrecused if the FCC's general counsel determines that the need for his or her participation outweighs public ethics concerns.

Gene Kimmelman, public policy director of Consumers' Union, which opposes the deal, calls the move "the most unusual thing I've ever seen in my entire career."

Kimmelman says he was helping to negotiate an agreement among AT&T and the two Democrats and Martin when the chairman pulled the plug.

"We thought we were making progress," Kimmelman says. "It's just bizarre."

DOJ_NMG_0102813

In moving to unrecuse McDowell, Martin, who declined to comment, cited legal precedent in a case involving the National Association of Broadcasters. But that request to break the FCC stalemate came from the U.S. Court of Appeals after a two-year impasse.

In the AT&T case, the request is from an FCC chairman who openly favors approval with no conditions. And it comes after a stalemate of just two months.

Tuesday, McDowell issued a statement that he is prepared to get up to speed quickly on the AT&T merger should the general counsel unrecuse him.

McDowell offered no comment on the merits of the deal or whether conditions should be attached. He did note that the deal "is not that different from the two (deals) we saw last year," referring to SBC's acquisition of AT&T and Verizon's purchase of MCI.

In those cases, both buyers were forced to divest a number of assets, including hundreds of phone and high-speed broadband lines, to gain approval.

Some lawmakers are unhappy with Martin's actions. Chief among them is Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., the ranking Democrat on the House Subcommittee on Telecommunications and the Internet.

In a Monday statement, Markey urged McDowell to abstain from voting "as a matter of principle." The FCC can unrecuse McDowell, but cannot make him vote.

The two holdout Democrats have been pushing AT&T to make concessions in the area of "special access." The term refers, generally, to the high-speed, high-capacity lines that serve business customers across the USA. It's a $16 billion-a-year business. Big carriers like AT&T continue to dominate the segment by dint of their size and reach.

By the time Martin pulled the plug on talks last week, Kimmelman says AT&T was offering a number of sweeteners, including an offer to sell "naked" DSL — meaning stand-alone DSL with no strings attached or purchase of other services required — for $24.95 a month. That's almost half the $45 price for stand-alone DSL currently.

But he says the carrier did not address a larger issue: its post-merger market power. "AT&T was unwilling to provide strong assurances that they won't abuse the enormous power that they will get with this merger."

Top Democrats Question Move By FCC Chairman On Telecom Deal (HC/AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two powerful Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday night sharply questioned a move by the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to allow a fellow commissioner who had claimed a conflict of interest to vote on the nation's largest telecommunications industry merger.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote FCC Chairman Kevin Martin expressing "disappointment" in Martin's "apparent willingness to waive government recusal rules" to allow former lobbyist and current commissioner Robert McDowell to vote on the proposed merger of San Antonio-based AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., along with Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., sent a letter to the FCC's general counsel asking 15 pointed questions about past precedent of such recusals and other issues.

Their dismay takes on added significance because the Democrats will take control of Congress in January. Inouye will be chairman of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee and Dingell will chair the House Energy and Commerce Committee. Both committees oversee the FCC.

Late Friday, with the commission deadlocked on AT&T Inc.'s proposed $82 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., Martin — who favors approval of the deal — told members of Congress that he had asked the FCC's counsel to consider whether to allow McDowell to vote.

McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-person commission, had recused himself because he is a former lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. Despite that background, Martin is betting McDowell will cast a deciding vote in favor of the deal.

The two Democratic commissioners are demanding the companies offer concessions to ensure the deal won't harm consumers. The Justice Department approved the deal without requiring such concessions.

Inouye, who has been largely quiet on the issue, said waiving the rules and allowing McDowell to vote would derail negotiations over concessions he said were necessary to preserve competition.

He urged Martin to reconsider his decision and "return to serious negotiations with your other colleagues."

In his letter to FCC General Counsel Sam Feder, Dingell and Markey asked what it officially means to be at an impasse and whether it is possible to reach that point since no formal vote has been held.

Neither Inouye nor Dingell have the authority to stop the FCC vote from occurring, but as the chief congressional overseers of the FCC, they are in a position to make life difficult for the chairman.

McDowell once worked for the trade association COMPTEL, which represents companies that compete with AT&T and the other regional Bell phone companies.

Democratic commissioner Michael Copps said allowing McDowell to vote would be "taking a mulligan" and "starting over with a changed set of players." He said the move would "create more problems than it resolves" and "short circuit discussions, and very likely shortchange consumers."

Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, also a Democrat, said Martin was trying to cut short negotiations "about measures to safeguard choice and competition for consumers."

Federal ethics regulations permit the FCC's general counsel to clear McDowell to vote as long as the government's interest outweighs concerns about how the vote may affect the agency's integrity.

It is unclear how long it will take for the general counsel to reach a determination on whether McDowell should be allowed to vote. The commissioner, who has declined to participate in any conversations about the pending deal, would need time to get up to speed, if he participates.

The next FCC meeting is scheduled for Dec. 20. Dingell and Markey have asked for responses to their questions by Dec. 11.

NYSE-Euronext Steams Ahead As EU Regulators Back Merger (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald And Aaron Lucchetti

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

One of the last major hurdles to a merger of the New York Stock Exchange and Euronext NV was removed yesterday, after European regulators gave their provisional clearance, pushing the first major trans-Atlantic stock-exchange merger toward the finishing line after a six-month battle.

NYSE's likely success will heap further pressure on its fast-growing rival, Nasdaq Stock Market Inc., to do a deal. Last month, Nasdaq made a bid for London Stock Exchange PLC, but London rejected its approach. Nasdaq has acquired a 29% stake in the London exchange since April, but says its bid is a final offer, unless London agrees on a deal or a rival bidder comes in.

The Euronext deal still needs approval from the Dutch finance minister, because the exchange is incorporated in Amsterdam, though operated from Paris. Also, shareholders in Euronext and NYSE Group Inc., which operates the New York Stock Exchange, will vote on the deal in about two weeks. Neither the finance minister nor shareholders are expected to block the creation of what would be a $28 billion company. A spokesman for the Netherlands Finance Ministry said Finance Minister Gerrit Zalm is expected to decide in January.

NYSE-Euronext Group, as the combined company will be called, will have stock exchanges in New York, Paris, Brussels, Lisbon and Amsterdam, as well as a London-based market in the fast-growing sector of derivatives.

Yesterday, Euronext's College of Regulators, which include the market watchdogs of France, Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Belgium and Portugal, said they won't block a deal, subject to commitments from the combined company that will include giving them some limited say over board appointments and future integration of the business. NYSE and Euronext said such conditions are acceptable.

DOJ_NMG_0102815

The European regulators also said they were working with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on "a memorandum of understanding" for coordinating regulation and supervision of Euronext-NYSE. It will be signed when the deal gets its final approval. The potential for U.S. regulatory interference had been a concern to both market users and investors in Europe.

NYSE's rival suitor for Euronext, Frankfurt stock-market operator Deutsche Börse AG, had sounded this concern unsuccessfully to drum up support for its rival bid.

Euronext and NYSE each need more than 50% of their shareholders to approve the deal. Hedge fund Atticus Capital, which owns almost 10% of the exchange, and French bank Société Générale, which owns about 3.5%, have publicly given their approval.

The share prices of both exchange operators climbed on news of the regulatory clearance, with Euronext closing up 2.3% at €87.30 ($116.35) and NYSE Group trading up $1.55 at $97.60 in 4 p.m. Big Board trading yesterday.

Still, Euronext trades below the valuation of about €93.50 a share under the NYSE bid, indicating investors don't believe the road ahead is entirely clear.

Bloodied Investor Icahn Returns To Flying Solo (WSJ)

By Susan Pulliam And Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

For years, financier Carl Icahn has been a prominent "activist" investor, attempting to push companies to make changes in a bid to boost their stocks. Now he's being forced to change his game plan in using this brand of investing.

This week Mr. Icahn's partners pulled out of a $4.6 billion bid for Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust. Mr. Icahn initially pressed ahead with the Reckson bid on his own. Late Monday night, the Reckson board rejected Mr. Icahn's offer in favor of a merger with SL Green Realty Corp., a rival real-estate trust. Yesterday, Mr. Icahn said he would back out.

"The offer is pretty much done," Mr. Icahn said in an interview. "It's a minor disappointment." Reckson shareholders must decide whether to approve SL Green's cash and stock offer, valued at about $45.56 a share as of yesterday's market close.

The development illustrates the complications for even the sawviest shareholders in mounting corporate challenges. These days, companies are launching ever-more aggressive legal and public-relations efforts, among other things, to block such efforts. Competition from industry players is intense.

"It's a daunting proposition to challenge management in a public activist scenario unless you have experience at it," said Ken Squire, who runs 13D Monitor, a research service that tracks activist investing.

Real-estate developer Harry Macklowe and Mack-Cali, a real-estate investment trust, both dropped out of the partnership with Mr. Icahn over the weekend. Now, Mr. Icahn said he is returning to his roots as a solo financier, bringing him full circle in his approach to "activist" investing. Until a couple of years ago, when Mr. Icahn began joining forces with other investors to prod corporate managements to change, he largely had operated on his own.

During difficult management battles, Mr. Icahn said, "most guys fade away." In the end, he said, many investors don't have the stomach for "activist" investing because "it's not easy."

Mr. Icahn could potentially re-emerge if less than two-thirds of Reckson shareholders approve the SL Green merger. The merger agreement has been contentious because of questions about a sale of one-third of the Reckson portfolio to an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler for $2.1 billion -- an amount that some investors believe is too low.

Mr. Icahn's bid, by contrast, may have been too high, some analysts say. After due diligence, Mack-Cali found the offer wasn't "in the best interests of its shareholders." Mr. Macklowe backed away at least partly because he couldn't secure the amount of bank financing at the terms he desired, according to a person familiar with the matter. When Mr. Macklowe informed Mr. Icahn that he wasn't prepared to pay $49, Mr. Icahn stayed firm, prompting the partnership's termination. Mr. Macklowe didn't return calls for comment.

It isn't the first time Mr. Icahn's enthusiasm has exceeded that of his partners. When Mr. Icahn -- with the help of another powerful hedge-fund manager, Steven Cohen's SAC Capital Advisors -- made a big investment and waged a proxy contest with Time Warner Inc. in mid-2005, corporate chiefs fretted it was the beginning of a period in which hedge funds would throw their financial muscle around, posing threats to management at even the largest companies. Instead, Mr. Icahn backed away from his proxy battle with Time Warner earlier this year as some of his hedge-fund investors lost their resolve.

Mr. Icahn has made a bundle on his Time Warner investment -- about $210 million, according to people familiar with the situation. Mr. Icahn said Time Warner has adopted many of the measures he had been pushing, including a $20 billion share-buyback program and $1 billion in cost cutting. Mr. Icahn added that he and Richard Parsons, Time Warner's chief executive, have patched together a working relationship and are planning to dine together this week. "We meet every few months," he said.

REAL-ESTATE PLAY

The Situation: Shareholders of Reckson Associates Realty Corp., a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust, are to vote today on whether to merge with SL Green Realty Corp., another REIT.

The Bids: SL Green is offering cash and stock valued at $45.56 as of yesterday's close, about $4.1 billion not including debt assumption. The Reckon board rejected a late bid by financier Carl Icahn offering $1.1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners LP, a publicly traded company that is 90% owned by Mr. Icahn.

The Controversy: The SL Green merger agreement has been contentious because of a secondary transaction in which SL Green is selling back about one-third of the Reckson portfolio to an investor group led by Reckson Chief Executive Scott Rechler for $2.1 billion, a price some shareholders say is low.

Even though his partners haven't shown much staying power, Mr. Icahn has had successes this year. His hedge fund, a private investment pool for wealthy individuals and institutions, is up 26.3% this year, compared with hedge-fund returns averaging 9% this year.

His hedge fund has made a profit of $300 million on its investment in Kerr-McGee Corp., an Oklahoma City energy and chemicals producer, and a profit of $175 million on its investment in South Korea's KT&G, South Korea's dominant tobacco maker, which it has sold. American Real Estate Partners LP also sold NEG Oil & Gas LLC to Riata Energy Inc. for $1.26 billion, giving it a return of about 40% on the investment.

Mr. Icahn, 70 years old, isn't the only veteran investor who is shifting gears. Last week Kirk Kerkorian, 89, sold his stake in General Motors Corp. stock after finding the battle to persuade management to adopt his plans for the company more difficult than he expected.

Said Mr. Icahn: "Activism is a lot more difficult than it looks."

Mr. Icahn is adapting to fit with the market changes since he began making investments for his hedge fund in 2005, which has quadrupled in size, to $4 billion in assets. About half of the increase stems from profits on investments with the rest from new investor money.

In a twist, Mr. Icahn is trying to buy shares in companies a step ahead of private-equity players, who make a profit by buying and selling companies. "It's no secret which companies are set up well for leverage buyouts," he said. Mr. Icahn says investment bankers call him and say: "This is a good one" for (a private-equity firm) -- "why don't you look at it?"

Ryanair Offers Airport Slots In EU's Review Of Aer Lingus Bid (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, December 6, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, has offered to sell slots at eight airports, including London's Heathrow, to win European Union antitrust approval to buy Aer Lingus Plc.

Ryanair told the European Commission, the EU's antitrust authority in Brussels, that it would sell as many as four Aer Lingus slots at Heathrow if its bid for the carrier succeeds, according to a document submitted to the regulator last week. It also offered slots at Stansted Airport near London and airports serving Frankfurt, Paris, Milan, Rome, Bratislava and Barcelona.

``The purpose is to allow one or more entrants to operate a new or additional non-stop scheduled daily frequencies on the 8 identified relevant airport pairs," said the document, which was obtained by Bloomberg News today.

Ryanair Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary has pursued the 1.48 billion-euro ($2 billion) hostile takeover of Ireland's flag carrier to add routes to the U.S. The Irish government and Aer Lingus employee shareholders, who together control almost 40 percent of the carrier, have rejected the offer, which expires Dec. 22. Ryanair said on Nov. 21 that it won't raise its offer.

Peter Sherrard, a spokesman for Ryanair, and commission spokesman Jonathan Todd declined to comment.

Gillian Culhane, a spokeswoman for Aer Lingus in Dublin, couldn't be reached for comment. A spokeswoman at Drury Communications, the airline's public-relations company, said the airline wouldn't be commenting.

Government Resistance

The Irish government, which has a 25 percent stake in Aer Lingus, is ``unlikely to support'' the sale of the Heathrow slots to defend the public's interest in connections in London, according to Aer Lingus's prospectus when it was partially privatized.

The government's stake plus a further 5 percent of shareholders is enough to block any sale of the Heathrow slots.

Rival airlines would have ``limited interest'' in Ryanair's other offers, such as up to four slots at Girona, an airport 104 kilometers (64 miles) from Barcelona, said Nick van den Brul, an analyst at Exane BNP Paribas in London.

The commission will decide by Dec. 20 whether to approve the deal, refer it to another antitrust authority or launch a four-month investigation.

Ryanair on Oct. 23 acquired a 19.2 percent stake and offered 2.80 euros a share for the rest of Aer Lingus. The discount carrier then spent about 87.5 million euros Nov. 29 to boost its stake to 25.2 percent.

Ship's Crewmen Plead Guilty To Covering Up Oil Dumping (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) _ The chief engineer and second engineer of a South Korean cargo vessel have pleaded guilty to environmental crimes and obstruction of justice for covering up illegal dumping of oil residue at sea, the U.S. Department of Justice announced Tuesday.

The owner and operator of the vessel, Sun Ace Shipping Co., based in Seoul, South Korea, previously pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to pay a $400,000 fine and $100,000 to New Jersey environmental organizations.

Chief engineer Chang-Sig O pleaded guilty to obstruction of justice for maintaining a false oil record book and lying to the Coast Guard about his knowledge of hoses used to bypass shipboard pollution control equipment.

Second engineer Mun Sig Wang pleaded guilty to violating the Act to Prevent Pollution from Ships for presenting a false oil record book to Coast Guard inspectors who boarded the ship in Camden on Jan. 3.

Inspectors learned that crew members had dumped oily waste into the ocean at least two times on their voyage from South Korea, the Justice Department said.

International and U.S. law prohibit such discharges without treatment by an oil-water separator, and then require all discharges be recorded in an oil record book.

Chang-Sig O faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Mun Sig Wang faces up to six years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The Justice Department announcement did not mention a sentencing date.

Activists Use Research To Win Pollution Battles (USAT)

By Charisse Jones

USA Today, December 6, 2006

Whether it's bus fumes in Harlem or nuclear waste in Utah, advocates for minority and poor communities do homework needed to win 'environmental justice'

NEW YORK — The buses idle along 146th Street, the faint smell of diesel exhaust in the air. The weathered brick bus depot sits across the street from day care and recreation centers for seniors and children.

Millicent Redick raised a son and daughter here in Harlem, across the street from the city's Mother Clara Hale Bus Depot. She recalls how they both suffered from eczema and asthma. "I was always led to believe that I had to keep the dust out of my apartment, so I cleaned all the time," says Redick, 61, a retired accountant. "But I was never informed that the air we were breathing played a role. … I thought it was all me."

Then she learned of connections between pollution and asthma attacks, and cleaning up the air became her new mission. "I've always felt strongly that no matter where I live, I have a right to everything every other community has," she says. "That's what I fought for."

Five of Manhattan's six bus depots are north of 96th Street. The struggle by residents and activists against that concentration is one of many environmental battles being waged around the nation in a campaign to improve the health and safety of poor and minority communities.

"People are not … taking the poison quietly," says Robert Bullard, director of Clark Atlanta University's Environmental Justice Resource Center and author of the book Dumping in Dixie: Race, Class, and Environmental Quality. "Over the last decade or so, not only do you have communities fighting, but they also have developed alliances and coalitions with scientists and lawyers and economists."

Neighborhood activists from California to Washington, D.C., are using a growing body of research on how pollutants exacerbate illness to block the building of facilities, relocate residents from contaminated communities and gain other concessions from large firms.

"One of the problems with all environmental struggles, but particularly when you have the overlay of environmental racism, is the community always has the burden of proof of harm," says Elizabeth Crowe, an organizer with the Kentucky Environmental Foundation in Berea, Ky. Now, "we have much more definitive information as to how bad this stuff is. … So the science is catching up to the experiences of folks on the ground, and it helps prove the point."

Among recent developments:

•A group in Port Arthur, Texas, signed an agreement on Nov. 6 with Motiva Enterprises under which the oil company will pour up to $3.5 million into the impoverished neighborhood as it expands a refinery there. The money will help fund new local businesses.

•A plan to build a nuclear waste storage facility on the Skull Valley Goshute Indian reservation in Utah was scuttled in September by the federal Bureau of Land Management and Bureau of Indian Affairs. The agencies were concerned that it would have a negative impact on the reservation, says attorney Paul EchoHawk, who represented tribal members opposing the project.

•From Sept. 24 to Oct. 1, representatives of more than 70 social justice and human rights groups toured the nation by bus caravan, visiting communities where residents face health problems associated with pollution.

Upper Manhattan's bus depots, many of them former trolley barns, have been around for nearly a century. The New York City Council's transportation committee held a hearing in October on the concentration of bus depots in Harlem, which has the city's highest rate of asthma hospitalizations for children 14 and younger, according to the city Department of Health and Mental Hygiene. The department says diesel particulates have been proved to worsen asthma.

"We think (the depots are) very, very responsible for the high asthma rates in the community," says Kizzy Charles-Guzman, policy coordinator of the group WE ACT for Environmental Justice. "It goes beyond air quality. … It's also quality of life impact. You have constant noise and vibrations from the buses, and we also have sanitation truck depots and sewage treatment facilities. … We're not necessarily saying let's shut down the depots and move them all over the city, but if all the clean buses the (bus agency) claims to have in the fleet were assigned to these particular depots, that would help."

MTA New York City Transit, which operates 4,489 buses, says it is dealing with pollution. "No one has done more to improve air quality than New York City Transit," spokesman Charles Seaton says. "We have more than 350 hybrid electric buses on the road. … And the majority of them are in depots in Upper Manhattan."

The environmental justice movement took root in the South in the early 1980s, when activists, church leaders and residents complained that toxic waste sites and other polluters often were located in poor and black neighborhoods. Their protests merged the struggle for a clean environment with that of civil rights.

Winning environmental justice cases in court has become more difficult since a 2001 Supreme Court decision increased the legal burden for those filing suit under the 1964 Civil Rights Act by requiring proof of intentional discrimination, Bullard says.

Analyzing the location of many landfills, chemical plants and highways, Bullard says, "you have to ask is this random or patterns that follow historically the path of least resistance? … If you don't have a lot of resources in terms of money, experts, lawyers and political leaders to divert those things, you are going to get (them)."

Ted Cromwell, senior director of security and operations for the American Chemistry Council, which represents leading U.S. chemical firms, says businesses don't target certain communities.

"In the vast majority of situations, chemical plants have been in place for many, many years," Cromwell says. Since the late 1980s, emissions from group members' factories have dropped more than 75%, he says. "It's not so much plants being sited in these communities as it is communities building up around them and over time the demographics change."

Some activists see progress. Companies increasingly are trying to create safer products, says Crowe of the Kentucky foundation. "What community organizers look for is … steps forward."

In the Port Arthur case, Hilton Kelley says the agreement he and his organization, Community In-Power and Development Association (CIDA), reached with Motiva is "a significant victory" for his neighborhood.

"We found out it would be difficult to stop the (refinery) expansion, but we were able to negotiate some things for our community's well-being and for our economic stability," Kelley says.

Kelley and his group had challenged Motiva's application to increase the production capacity of its refinery from 275,000 to 600,000 barrels of crude a day. Motiva now has agreed to provide air- pollution monitors and other controls. It also will help finance a local health clinic to offset the medical expenses of residents and supplement services for the diagnosis and treatment of asthma and other respiratory ailments in children.

Extensive pollution controls at the facility were planned before the community challenge, says Rick Strouse, a refinery manager. However, "CIDA had some concerns. I think we've resolved them."

In New York City, concerns remain over the buses in Harlem.

"This is first and foremost a health issue that is important to the residents and children of Harlem," says City Councilman John Liu, who heads the committee that held the hearing. "Secondly, it's a simple matter of honest accountability."

Redick, who has lived in her Harlem apartment for 38 years, says neighbors living closest to the depot entrance never "can open their windows. Never."

She has also noticed the cough her 4-year-old granddaughter develops when she visits — which disappears once she returns home. So Redick fights on.

"I have a right to walk down the street," she says, "and see flowers and trees and pretty buildings and people with smiles on their faces."

Leave Bristol Bay Alone (NYT)

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

President Bush is thinking about rescinding a longstanding presidential order that specifically prohibits oil and gas drilling in Alaska's pristine Bristol Bay. He should resist the impulse to do so, no matter how powerful the entreaties from his friends in the oil business. Drilling in Bristol Bay would threaten one of the nation's most productive fisheries without appreciably strengthening the nation's long-term energy security.

Bristol Bay occupies over 33 million acres of open sea, islands and estuaries just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland. It is home to the world's largest wild salmon run and the source of a commercial fishing industry with an estimated annual value of nearly $2 billion. In the furor following the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989, the bay was placed off limits to drilling, first by Congress, and then, in 1998, by President Clinton.

The presidential prohibition has remained in effect even though the Congressional moratorium was lifted in 2003 when Alaska's Ted Stevens — overriding protests from local fishing interests — called in all the chits he had accumulated as head of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

The Interior Department now wants to make about one-fifth of the bay available for leasing — a move, it says, that could create 11,000 jobs and "net benefits" of about $7.7 billion in oil and gas. But this would be a one-shot deal, and the numbers are trivial compared with the country's overall resources. More to the point, they pale in comparison to the sustainable year-after-year yields from a fishing industry that could be devastated — as was Prince William Sound in 1989 — by another major spill.

Mr. Bush has been speaking out lately about the importance of making America more energy independent. Few things are more important for the new Democratic Congress than developing an energy policy more heavily weighted toward conservation, efficiency and development of alternatives to traditional fossil fuels. This might be a rare area in which both sides can work together, but opening Bristol Bay to drilling would be exactly the wrong way to begin the conversation.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Needs To Step Back Before Moving Forward, IG Says (FCW)

By Dibya Sarkar

Federal Computer Week, December 6, 2006

Although the FBI is forging ahead with establishing an interoperable fingerprint system with the Homeland Security Department, the Justice Department needs to regroup following a failed $1.18 million effort to modernize a system that manages evidence, according to a semi-annual report released by Justice's inspector general.

The recently released 66-page IG report, which summarizes the office's audits, investigations, inspections and special reviews, provided updates on several information technology initiatives Justice agencies started.

In March, after two and a half years, FBI officials terminated a contract with a private company for a commercial laboratory information management system that would have used bar code technology to track evidence and improve reporting capabilities at the FBI Laboratory in Quantico, Va. "After many delays and extensive customization" the system did not meet the agency's security requirements, the IG report states.

According to the report, the initiative began before the agency's IT investment management processes were established, making it difficult to identify problems with the contract and adequately document security requirements for certification and accreditation of the software. Among several recommendations, the IG report states that an experienced IT manager must oversee any future project.

The laboratory conducts more than 1 million examinations of physical evidence annually, but the current system is limited in tracking evidence and reporting capabilities.

However, the joint initiative to make the bureau's 10-fingerprint Integrated Automated Fingerprint Identification System interoperable with DHS' two-fingerprint Automated Biometric Identification System is on track, the IG report states. In the first phase of the three-phase project, both agencies will establish a joint automated system to share important immigration and law enforcement data. The other two phases will focus on expanding the shared data and access by various federal, state and local law enforcement agencies to that data. The initiative is scheduled to be complete by December 2009.

"When the interoperability effort is completed, a single request will search all fingerprint records maintained by the FBI and the DHS, and the requestor will receive all associated criminal history and immigration information about an individual," according to the IG report.

The IG report also provided updates with respect to the Federal Information Security Management Act (FISMA).

A review found that systems within the FBI; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosive (ATF); the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA); and the Justice Management Division (JMD) were all certified and accredited, security controls were tested and evaluated in the past year, and contingency plans were in compliance with FISMA. However, the FBI, ATF and DEA did not perform electronic authentication risk assessments, and the FBI and ATF did not fully implement Justice's process for tracking system vulnerabilities and corrective actions, the IG report adds.

"Moreover, departmentwide system configuration policy was not always implemented as required within the DEA and JMD," the IG report states. "With respect to IT security awareness training, we found that ATF did not fully ensure that all of its employees were trained as required by department policy."

The IG's office is also reviewing and evaluating several classified and unclassified systems within several Justice agencies and plans to issue reports this fiscal year.

In assessing compliance with the Office of Management and Budget guidelines for securing sensitive data, the IG report states that although Justice is implementing additional security controls to protect personally identifiable information, it is not fully compliant for all automated systems.

"For example, the department failed to ensure that personally identifiable information is transported and stored off-site only in encrypted form," the report states. "We also found that the department is not requiring users who access the system remotely to provide two independent ways of authenticating identity, as required by the National Institute of Standards and Technology Special Publications 800-53 and 800-53 A."

Additionally, Justice has established a task force to develop a comprehensive approach to secure wireless access to personally identifiable data on the internal systems and assess technical solutions for remote access.

FBI Denies Woes In Data-sharing Computer System (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

The FBI says a new computer system -- introduced last year as a replacement for a failed case-file program -- is within cost and on schedule to be fully operational by 2009, despite criticisms in a report this week by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General.

In a report released this week, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that the new program, known as Sentinel, faced a $56.7 million funding gap and that although it could still prove to be successful with careful oversight, the Bush administration's funding request for this year's share of the $425 million system is short of what is needed.

"The FBI appreciates the Inspector General's continued interest and assessment of the Sentinel program," the bureau said. "The OIG performed the audit at the request of the FBI Director and Congress. This audit was the second in a series of audits to evaluate the progress and implementation of Sentinel.

"According to the audit the FBI has made 'good progress' in addressing the concerns surrounding staffing, information sharing, earned value management, cost tracking and controls, and documentation that were identified in the first audit report," it said.

The FBI said Phase II of the Sentinel program is expected to cost about $157 million. As part of President Bush's fiscal 2007 budget request, $100 million in funding was requested and the balance of $57 million "has long been identified from existing FBI balances and will not impact operational programs."

"The total project cost for Sentinel was budgeted at a cost of $425 million and that figure remains the same. Characterizations to the contrary are misleading," the FBI said. "At this time, Sentinel is within cost and schedule."

The Sentinel program was introduced last year as a replacement for the failed Virtual Case File system and is scheduled to be fully operational by 2009, as part of an FBI effort to close internal communication gaps and improve information sharing with other law-enforcement and intelligence agencies.

The system will be built by Lockheed Martin Corp. on a $305 million contract. The FBI also expects to spend about $120 million evaluating the system.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III has said the Sentinel program will "strengthen the FBI's capabilities by replacing its primarily paper-based reporting system with an electronic system designed for information sharing."

"Sentinel will support our current priorities, including our No. 1 priority: preventing terrorist attacks," he said.

The Sentinel program will deliver an electronic information-management system, automate work-flow processes for the first time and provide a user-friendly Web-based interface to access and search across multiple databases. It is designed to help the FBI manage information beyond the case-focus of the existing Automated Case Support (ACS) and will provide enhanced information-sharing and search-and-analysis capabilities.

Sentinel also is expected to facilitate information sharing with members of the law-enforcement and intelligence communities. Mr. Mueller is scheduled to testify today during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight.

20 Alleged Gang Members Arrested In Drug Trafficking Sting (AP)

By Sophia Tareen

AP, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102822

CHICAGO - Twenty alleged street gang members have been arrested on charges of running of sophisticated drug trafficking operation in the culmination of what officials said was a three-year undercover investigation, authorities announced Tuesday.

Since the investigation began, 38 alleged members of the Latin Kings street gang have been charged and at least 20 individuals - including several men believed to be top leaders - are in custody on drug and weapons charges, U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said during a news conference.

The charges are included in 13 separate federal complaints filed or unsealed Tuesday.

"We pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side," said Andrew Traver, a special agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the main agency involved in the investigation.

Among Tuesday's arrests were 36-year-old Fernando "Ace" King of Chicago, who authorities allege is a gang leader. He is charged with attempted drug possession with the intent to distribute.

"If you take out the main person, you also send a message to gang leaders that the position comes with a price," Fitzgerald said.

Also arrested was Anthony "Loks" Compean of Cicero, believed to be the second-in-command, authorities said. Compean, 29, has been charged with intent to distribute narcotics.

It was unclear Tuesday who was representing King. Compean's attorney, Todd S. Pugh, declined comment Tuesday evening because he was just receiving the complaint. They were to appear Wednesday in U.S. District Court.

Authorities said they had an informant who wore a wiretap during the investigation and officials seized more than 15 kilograms of cocaine and 90 guns - including at least seven AK47 rifles.

"Every one of these guns is one less crime that won't take place, " Traver said.

Authorities showcased an organizational flow chart Tuesday, detailing what they believed to be the gang's inner workings and systematic coverage of seven regions around the Chicago area.

The Latin Kings street gang in Chicago started in the 1960s as a social club in the Humboldt Park neighborhood, according to Mike Casey, an ATF supervisory special agent.

Officials said their influence has grown to a "tightly controlled narcotics distribution empire." Though the group's presence has been strongest on the city's South Side, authorities said their operations also are active in the suburbs.

"It's time for a lot of people to wake up and see, gangs do not see borders," said Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart.

Feds Make Landmark Arrest Of 30 Gang Leaders (WMAQ)

WMAQ-TV, NBC 5, Chicago, December 6, 2006

CHICAGO -- A lengthy federal probe leads to the arrest of nearly 30 gang leaders in Chicago.

Federal agents moved in on the gang on Tuesday.

"Operation Broken Crown" started when a member of the Southside Latin Kings began cooperating with ATF agents.

Federal authorities were able to infiltrate the gang, described as one of the area's largest and most violent drug trafficking street gangs.

Officials made a point to say they're "not going to pretend to end the drug wars with this arrest or end gangs with this arrest, but we're making a dent and we'll keep pushing."

Numerous automatic weapons were also seized during the undercover operation.

Feds Arrest Latin Kings Gang Leader (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Rudolph Bush

Chicago Tribune, December 6, 2006

A Chicago man described by federal authorities as "the CEO of the Latin Kings Nation on the South Side" was taken into custody early Tuesday, capping a three-year investigation into the operations of the violent street gang.

Fernando "Ace" King was among 18 gang members whose arrests were announced Tuesday by U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald. King had the title of "Supreme Inca," running the gang's drug empire on the city's South Side and the south suburbs, officials said. There are only a small circle of leaders above him, including Gustavo "Gino" Colon, the gang's imprisoned head, officials said.

"It may seem pretty cool to be a Supreme Inca when you're the leader on the street of a gang until the title 'Supreme Inca' becomes 'lead defendant,'" Fitzgerald said.

The Latin Kings operate in seven regions in Chicago, including the southwest and northwest suburbs, authorities said.

King is one of 38 members and associates charged in the case after investigators with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives used wiretaps and undercover drug purchases to crack the gang's operations. He was charged with intent to distribute cocaine as part of "Operation Broken Crown," which is billed as the most significant federal effort against the Latin Kings since the takedown of Colon in 1998.

Others in the case are charged with a wide range of drug and gun violations.

The investigation began in 2003, when a longtime gang member agreed to cooperate and provided investigators with access to the organization's structure, authorities said. About 90 guns were seized during the probe, along with more than 15 kilograms of cocaine.

Investigators said they hoped the case would have an effect in many of the subregions controlled by King.

"I think at this point we've pretty much decapitated the Latin Kings on the South Side," said Andrew Traver, special agent in charge of the Chicago ATF.

Traver said support in executing arrest warrants early Tuesday came from a variety of federal agencies, the Cook County sheriff's office and police in Summit, Hickory Hills, Stickney and Orland Park.

King's alleged second in command, 29-year-old Anthony Compean of Cicero, was charged with conspiring to distribute cocaine.

Compean, known on the street as "Loks," was charged after a cooperating gang member was arrested by the ATF early this year and decided to help investigators.

The gang member, who was not identified, has a rap sheet that includes a 1997 attempted murder conviction in Cook County and a 1999 drug conviction in Texas. He told authorities he knew Compean as a Latin Kings leader in "Chi-Town" and agreed to record drug transactions with him, according to a criminal complaint against Compean.

During a March meeting at the gang member's house, Compean agreed to sell the man a half-kilogram of cocaine for $10,000, the complaint states.

Compean's lawyer, Todd Pugh, declined to comment Tuesday, saying he has not had a chance to read the complaint.

Oscar Diaz, 32, of Blue Island, the alleged southwest regional leader of the gang, was charged with providing a Russian assault rifle to a cooperating witness in November, a gun delivered to Elmhurst. Danny "Fat Danny" Aguilar, 29, of Justice, the gang's alleged regional enforcer, was charged with conspiracy to distribute drugs.

In the case against King, a former gang member cooperating with federal agents recorded conversations with King in which drug deals were discussed, according to a criminal complaint released Tuesday.

On Monday, the informant provided King with a kilogram of what King thought was cocaine, leading to his arrest and the charges against him. The informant told agents that he understood King to report to no one but the gang's highest echelon.

An attorney for King could not immediately be reached for comment.

Fitzgerald said authorities hoped investigations such as the one that ended Tuesday would send a message to would-be gang leaders that such a position comes with a price.

New Cook County Sheriff Tom Dart said the case should also be a warning for suburban residents that street gangs are entrenched in their neighborhoods too.

"For those people who still feel for some reason that gang crime is centered in the city of Chicago and does not touch suburban Cook County, if this is not their wake-up call, I don't know what they're looking for," Dart said. "Gangs do not see borders."

8 SF Gang Members Plead Gulity In Federal Case (BCN)

Bay City News Wire, December 6, 2006

(BCN) SAN FRANCISCO Eight members of San Francisco's Down Below Gang will spend years in prison after pleading guilty to federal racketeering and drug-dealing charges Monday, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

The gang, whose turf lies in the Sunnydale housing projects in Visitacion Valley, has been involved in criminal activity such as selling crack cocaine and intimidation for years, according to U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan.

Four of the gang members admitted to committing acts of violence as egregious as murder, robbery and carjacking.

For their crimes, Don Johnson, 20, agreed to 23 years in federal prison; Robert Calloway, 22, agreed to more than 17 years; Dornell Ellis, 25, agreed to almost 16 years; and Ricky Rollins, 21, agreed to 15 years.

The admissions help police put to rest at least three murder cases from 2004.

The defendants admitted to murdering Beverly Daryl Robinson on April 15, Kenya Taylor on June 25 and Jacquain Williams on Oct. 14.

The pleas are the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the San Francisco Police Department.

Ryan thanked the two organizations in a statement.

"We continue to be committed to bringing peace and justice to communities that have been devastated by gang violence," Ryan said in a statement. "These guilty pleas mark a significant step in the resolution of this prosecution."

The other four defendants face sentences of up to seven years.

Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24, all admitted to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances.

Police Chief Heather Fong also highlighted the cooperation between federal and local authorities.

"A violent criminal street gang has been removed from the streets of San Francisco," Fong said in a statement. "This case represents a historic chapter in San Francisco's commitment to ending gang and gun violence."

SAN FRANCISCO Guilty Pleas In Gang Case (SFC)

Eight members of a violent San Francisco street gang involved in murder and the trafficking of narcotics and weapons pleaded guilty Monday to federal racketeering and conspiracy charges, the U.S. attorney's office announced Monday.

The defendants admitted responsibility for a number of crimes, including murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder, robbery, carjacking and various drug offenses. The FBI and the San Francisco Police Department led the joint investigation.

The Down Below Gang is based in the violence-plagued Sunnydale public housing project in San Francisco's Visitacion Valley neighborhood on the south side of the city.

Authorities, who obtained indictments last year, said the gang sold drugs and engaged in armed robbery to help finance its operation. Its members also killed rivals. Prosecutors used the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act to go after the gang.

"In their plea agreements, several defendants admitted to significant acts of violence, including three murders," said U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who is in charge of the agency's Northern California office. Four of the defendants admitted involvement in the murders of Beverly Daryl Robinson, Kenya Taylor and Jacquain Williams, all of which took place in 2004.

The four men who pleaded guilty are Don Johnson, 20; Robert Calloway, 22; Dornell Ellis, 25; and Rickey Rollins, 21. They agreed to sentences ranging from 15 years to 23 years in federal prison. Any prospect of the death penalty has been taken off the table.

The four other defendants pleaded guilty to drug-related charges, according to federal prosecutors. They are Christopher Byes, 26; Paris Ragland, 21; Ronnie Calloway, 26; and Allen Calloway, 24. Their sentences will range from 21 months to 77 months in federal prison.

Man Cooperates For Less Jail Time (CHCP)

By Leo Strupczewski, Courier-Post Staff

Cherry Hill Courier-Post, December 6, 2006

TRENTON -- A Camden gang member who cooperated with federal investigators was sentenced Friday to 10 years in federal prison for his role in a drug trafficking organization, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

U.S. District Judge Freda L. Wolfson said she recognized the need to reward Lamont Powell, also known as "Mont G," 29, for his cooperation. Had he not cooperated, Powell would have faced a sentence of anywhere from 30 years to life.

Powell will also serve eight years of supervised release and pay a $2,000 fine after his prison sentence.

The sentence stems from a April 15, 2004 plea agreement in which Powell pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to distribute and possession with the intent to distribute heroin and crack cocaine.

Powell was a member of the "Tuten Organization," a notorious drug gang. After his arrest, he cooperated with federal investigators to convict other gang members, including one of the organization's leaders, Leonard Paulk of Camden.

Powell also testified against two leaders of another drug organization called the "Perez Organization." Those men -- Bernard Murray and Allen Resto, both of Camden -- were convicted on charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin and crack cocaine and gun-related charges, including use of an AK-47 rifle and three handguns.

Wolfson said rewarding Powell sent a message to the community about the importance of cooperating with the government.

Doctor Or Dealer? (ORS)

By Karen P. Tandy, Special To The Sentinel

The Orlando Sentinel, December 6, 2006

To find new patients, Dr. Freddie Williams, a general practitioner in Panama City in the Florida Panhandle, would send two recruiters, one of whom was a heroin addict, searching for people looking for easy prescription drugs -- and frequently found them in bars. The recruiters were paid in OxyContin prescriptions, and the new "patients" received practically limitless amounts of high potency OxyContin. The OxyContin was not for pain, nor any other medicinal purpose, but simply for abuse. Patients were injecting and snorting it for the heroin-like high it gave.

Williams created addicts. Patients were overdosing. Parents called his practice pleading for him not to give their children any more drugs. He did anyway. Williams was even demanding sex in exchange for prescriptions.

He was diverting so many OxyContin pills to abusers and traffickers that after Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) agents and our partners arrested him, the street price of OxyContin nearly doubled in the area because of the significantly diminished availability of OxyContin. Similarly, pharmacy burglaries and patients seeking treatment increased.

A jury convicted Williams on 94 counts of conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and health-care fraud, among other violations, and he was sentenced to life imprisonment.

Fortunately, these kinds of criminal doctors are few and far between. In any given year, including 2005, fewer than one in every 10,000 physicians in the United States -- less than 0.01 percent-loses their authority to prescribe controlled substances based on a DEA investigation.

These few doctors cause grave harm and contribute to the alarming prescription-drug-abuse problem in our country. Prescription controlled substances are the second most abused type of drugs -- behind only marijuana. Nearly one out of every 10 high-school seniors abuses dangerous painkillers.

The addictions these drugs cause are rapidly swelling the number of Americans seeking treatment -- 63,000 at last count. The consequences can turn deadly as illustrated by the deaths of Jason Surks of New Jersey and Ryan Haight of California, who died at ages 19 and 18 after overdosing on prescription narcotics they obtained through the Internet. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention report that Jason and Ryan are part of a disturbing trend: Prescription painkillers now cause more drug-overdose deaths than cocaine and heroin, combined.

It is DEA's job to enforce the laws of this nation to ensure pharmaceutical narcotics and other controlled drugs are used only for the health and welfare of the public. Prescription drugs help millions of Americans every day, but when these drugs harm citizens' health, feed addictions, ruin innocent lives and put more dangerous substances in our neighborhoods, the DEA must target that diversion and those responsible.

In September, the DEA announced three steps to ensure that people who medically need drugs get them, and that those who are diverting them, don't. We issued a proposed rule that will make it easier for patients with chronic pain or other chronic conditions to avoid multiple trips to a physician. The DEA also released a first-of-its-kind pain statement to give the medical community the information they requested on prescribing and dispensing controlled substances to treat pain. Finally, DEA launched a new page on our Web site (www.dea.gov) to provide everyone with the facts on DEA cases against the small number of doctors who violate federal drug laws.

There is much debate within the medical community about how chronic pain should be treated, how aggressively and with what medications. The DEA doesn't enter into that debate except to ensure the drugs aren't being diverted for illegal purposes as we are required to do by federal law. Doctors need to practice medicine as they have been trained to do and as they are sworn to do: to help their patients. The DEA in turn will do what we are sworn to do: to protect the American public by putting dealers like Williams out of business.

Hearing Set For Chargers Player Accused Of Shipping Codeine Cough Syrup (KGTV)

KGTV-TV, December 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- A Feb. 7 preliminary hearing was set Tuesday for a Chargers player accused of getting codeine-based cough syrup from a friend who worked at a San Diego pharmacy and trying to ship it to his home state of Texas.

Terrance Kiel faces a maximum of seven years and four months in state prison if convicted of five felony charges: three counts of possession for sale of a controlled substance and two counts of transporting a controlled substance, said Deputy District Attorney James Fontaine.

The 26-year-old safety, out of custody on $160,000 bail, was arrested Sept. 26 at team practice after federal agents searched his car and locker.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents said they intercepted two FedEx packages containing 18 pint bottles of the codeine-based cough syrup in June and September.

Prosecutors alleged Monday that Hope Devina Vines, 30, was stealing codeine-based cough syrup from her employer, Sharp Rees-Stealy, and giving it to Kiel.

Vines, charged with grand theft and possession for sale of a controlled substance, was released on her own recognizance, Fontaine said. A readiness conference was set for Dec. 14.

A bar code on one of the codeine bottles that Kiel tried to ship was traced back to the pharmacy where Vines worked, Fontaine said. Other bottles that were intercepted seem to have bar codes that had been scratched off, the prosecutor said.

The prosecutor said earlier that the amount of cough syrup with codeine that Kiel allegedly tried to ship did not constitute "personal-use quantities."

Defense attorney Bob Grimes said adding a co-defendant wouldn't change the case against Kiel much.

Bottles of codeine-based cough syrup sell for up to $325 on the street in Texas, where people are known to mix the drug with soft drinks and refer to it as "lean," according to the DEA.

Kiel allegedly admitted knowing that it was a controlled substance that he was shipping. The athlete paid cash to ship the parcels, even though he has an account with FedEx, according to the DEA.

Kiel is among five Chargers players arrested since last spring.

In early April, linebacker Shaun Phillips was taken into custody for allegedly resisting arrest when officers tried to detain him over an alleged domestic dispute. No charges were filed.

A week later, linebacker Steve Foley was jailed following a scuffle with police at a University City hotel.

Over the Labor Day weekend, Foley got into another confrontation with police, this time when an off-duty Coronado officer tried to pull him over on suspicion of drunken driving.

DOJ_NMG_0102827

An ensuing pursuit ended outside the linebacker's Poway home, where the lawman opened fire as Foley allegedly advanced on him in a threatening manner. Foley, who was hospitalized with multiple gunshot wounds, is facing misdemeanor DUI charges.

On Oct. 9, the Chargers released practice squad defensive back Markus Curry following his arrest on suspicion of domestic violence.

On Nov. 27, cornerback Cletis Gordon was arrested on suspicion of driving drunk in the Gaslamp Quarter.

Pharmacy Worker Arrested In Terrence Kiel Case (KFMB)

KFMB-TV,, December 6, 2006

A pharmacy technician working at a downtown medical building is being accused Tuesday of supplying San Diego Charger Terrence Kiel with the codeine-based cough syrup he allegedly shipped to Texas.

According to drug enforcement agents, 30-year-old Hope Vines was arrested Thursday afternoon. She worked at Sharp Rees-Steely in the downtown area, where a large number of bottles of cough syrup were reported missing.

Prosecutors allege that Kiel shipped several bottles of the cough syrup to his home in Texas. They say a bar code on one of the bottles was tracked back to the San Diego pharmacy where Vines worked.

Vines was charged with theft and possession of a controlled substance. She was released without bail after a court appearance on Monday.

Kiel is accused of possessing and transporting a controlled substance.

Prosecutors say Vines and Kiel will be tried in court together.

Nevada Boxing Officials Suspend Nino, Salido Over Drugs (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, December 5, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) — WBC light flyweight champion Omar Nino was temporarily suspended Tuesday after testing positive for methamphetamine after last month's title bout, Nevada boxing regulators said.

The 30-year-old Mexican fighter retained the 108-pound title Nov. 18 with a majority draw over former champion Brian Viloria of Hawaii, even though Viloria knocked down Nino twice in the Las Vegas bout. Nino first won the title with a unanimous decision over Viloria in August in Las Vegas.

Nino is the first fighter ever to test positive for methamphetamine in Nevada.

The Nevada Athletic Commission decided to keep Nino out of the ring until it could hold a formal hearing, probably in January, commission executive director Keith Kizer said.

Two tests on a urine sample taken after the Nov. 18 title fight came back positive, enough to bring a case before the commission, Kizer said.

Nino has denied using the drug.

Under commission rules, Nino (24-2-2) could face a suspension, have his boxing license revoked, be fined and have the commission rule that his latest bout was a no-decision.

Also, the WBC is preparing to conduct its own test, which could put Nino's belt in jeopardy, Kizer said.

Kizer said Nino is the first fighter ever to test positive for methamphetamine in Nevada.

The commission also temporarily suspended Orlando Salido of Mexico after he tested positive for the banned steroid Nandrolone after his Nov. 4 unanimous decision over IBF featherweight champ Robert Guerrero.

Salido faces a one-year suspension and up to a $250,000 fine, although Kizer said the commission would consider fining Salido only the $17,500 he was paid for the fight.

Saints' Thomas Barred After Failing Drug Test (NYT/AP)

The New York Times/AP, December 6, 2006

Saints defensive tackle Hollis Thomas was suspended yesterday for the final four games of the regular season for violating the N.F.L.'s steroid policy.

DOJ_NMG_0102828

Thomas, supported by the club, appealed the suspension, which he said was caused by asthma medication. He uses an inhaler daily and it apparently contained a banned steroid.

Thomas signed this year with New Orleans after playing nine seasons with the Eagles. He missed the 2002 season in Philadelphia with a broken right foot. He has had 43 tackles and 3½ sacks for the Saints and has been an important component in building their division-leading 8-4 record.

If New Orleans makes the playoffs, Thomas will be eligible to play. He can be added to the active roster on Jan. 1, the day after the regular season ends.

SHOULDER SURGERY FOR PORTIS Redskins running back Clinton Portis had shoulder surgery yesterday that will require six months of rehabilitation.

Portis was placed on injured reserve Nov. 15 after breaking his hand in a loss to Philadelphia. His left shoulder had also been ailing him. He partly dislocated the shoulder making a tackle in the first preseason game, then jammed the rotator cuff in the regular-season opener.

FRYE HAS WRIST IN BRACE Browns quarterback Charlie Frye did not practice because of a bruised right wrist, leaving his status uncertain for Cleveland's game against the Pittsburgh Steelers tomorrow night.

If Frye cannot play, the Browns will turn to the backup Derek Anderson. Frye will spend at least another day with his wrist in a brace. Today team doctors will re-evaluate his injury, which the club feared was a break before X-rays and magnetic resonance imaging test results came back negative.

COURT DATE FOR TITANS' JONES A judge in Nashville set a Feb. 1 hearing for Titans cornerback Pacman Jones on a misdemeanor charge of assault filed by a woman who said he spit on her at a nightclub.

Jones's lawyer hoped to settle the case with yesterday's appearance before Judge John Holt and had talks with the district attorney's office. But Krystal Webb, the Tennessee State University student who filed the charge over the October incident, has hired a lawyer.

"I had had some positive dialogue with Ms. Webb, but since she's retained outside counsel, I'm no longer able to discuss the case with her," said Worrick Robinson, the lawyer who is representing Jones.

Jones told Robinson that he left before the incident happened.

LATER START FOR GIANTS The starting time of the Giants' game against the Eagles at the Meadowlands on Dec. 17 was moved to 4:15 p.m. from 1 o'clock.

Also moved that day was the starting time for the Dolphins-Bills game, to 4:05 p.m. from 1 o'clock.

The moves are part of the network's flexible scheduling, a feature of the new television contract with the National Football League.

CLAYTON OUT Another disappointing season for Buccaneers receiver Michael Clayton came to an end yesterday when the team said he would miss the remaining four games because of a knee injury.

Clayton was one of the N.F.L.'s top rookies in 2004, with 80 receptions for 1,193 yards and 7 touchdowns. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Mounting Gun Violence, Gang Activity Seen In Area (SEAPI)

By Scott Gutierrez, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, December 6, 2006

The slaying of King County sheriff's Deputy Steve Cox is another harsh reflection of resurging gun violence and gang activity plaguing Seattle and cities around the country, law enforcement officials say.

Cox was shot and killed early Saturday as he interviewed witnesses in connection with a shooting and beating outside a party at a White Center home. The felon and gang member who apparently shot him, Raymond O. Porter, is thought to have killed another man in SeaTac Friday night.

"Gang members are more dangerous, they're more armed, than other criminals and that fact alone means we're going to run into more people and things like this," Sheriff's Sgt. John Urquhart said Monday.

"But I don't believe (Porter) killed Deputy Cox because he was a gang member. I believe he killed Deputy Cox because he was armed," Urquhart added.

Cox's death comes after a year in Seattle in which gun assaults were up by 25 percent, similar to national trends, according to law enforcement. Police say shootings are becoming much too frequent, whether gang-related or not. Even as deputies responded to the gun blasts that killed Cox in White Center, Seattle police were busy Saturday hunting for another shooter in Rainier Valley who wounded another man in an unrelated case.

"There is certainly much more willingness to use firearms and a willingness to use them on human beings," Urquhart said.

In October, Seattle police gang detectives lamented in a Seattle P-I story that they had already investigated more gang cases than in all of 2005. An estimated 30 to 60 street gangs are operating in the Seattle area.

The Sheriff's Office does not field a gang unit, which means gangsters pushed out of Seattle likely work their way into the suburbs and unincorporated areas such as White Center, Urquhart said.

The reasons for the latest surge in violence vary, according to law enforcement and gang experts. Some experts say it's stoked in part by gang-bangers who went to prison in the early 1990s and now are finishing their sentences.

Earlier this year, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales promised $30 million to buttress anti-gang programs nationwide, calling street gangs "an increasingly deadly threat to the safety and security of our citizens." Locally, agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives teamed up with Seattle police, the Sheriff's Office, the state Department of Corrections and others to form a Violent Gang Task Force.

"We don't have the problems that Chicago and Los Angeles have," ATF Special Agent Julianne Marshall said. "But rather than be reactive, we want to attack it from the front end so we really can make a difference."

The ATF also launched a database called "Gangnet," which links law enforcement data from the West and East coasts on tens of thousands of suspected gang members.

Martin Speckmaier, a retired Edmonds police officer who now works as a consultant on school security, said there is a consensus gang activity is back on the rise.

The problem, however, is that officials have no uniform criteria for defining a gang member.

"It's so hard to fight a problem when you can't even define it," said Speckmaier of Comprehensive School Safety LLC.

"It's just really, really sad and tragic that someone so committed to this like Deputy Cox would have his life taken from him in such a tragic way," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Court Rejects Interpretation Of Immigration Drug Law (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The Supreme Court rejected the government's interpretation of immigration law on Tuesday, ruling that a noncitizen is not subject to mandatory deportation for a drug crime that, while a felony in the state where the crime was prosecuted, is only a misdemeanor under federal law.

The 8-to-1 decision restored to one category of immigrants, caught in the nearly impenetrable maze where immigration law and criminal law meet, the ability to avoid automatic deportation and the other dire consequences of being guilty of an "aggravated felony."

The category is made up of immigrants convicted of simple drug possession in states that treat those offenses as felonies. Federal law treats possession in most instances as a misdemeanor. But in the government's view, possession when deemed a felony under state law became a "drug trafficking crime," which under federal immigration law is an "aggravated felony" that strips an immigrant of the right to seek relief from automatic deportation, to seek asylum, or ever to return legally to the United States.

Writing for the majority on Tuesday, Justice David H. Souter said the government's interpretation was based on a strained and implausible reading of the definition of "drug trafficking crime" in the federal criminal code.

Thousands of immigrants every year might benefit from the ruling, according to Jayashri Srikantiah, a law professor who heads the Immigrants' Rights Clinic at Stanford Law School and who filed a brief on behalf of Jose Antonio Lopez, the immigrant whose Supreme Court appeal led to the decision, Lopez v. Gonzales, No. 05-547.

In an interview, Ms. Srikantiah said the decision was informed by "a sense of proportionality" and of the "real world consequences" of subjecting legal residents convicted of minor offenses to automatic deportation.

The Immigration and Nationality Act contains a list of aggravated felonies that includes "a drug trafficking crime." This phrase, in turn, is defined not in the immigration law, but in the criminal code as "any felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act," the basic federal narcotics law.

The government's position was that "any felony" meant any crime that was considered a felony either under federal law or in the state where the prosecution took place. In this way, a conviction for simple possession could become a drug trafficking offense and hence an aggravated felony, which is what happened to Mr. Lopez.

A Mexican who was a permanent legal resident of the United States, Mr. Lopez pleaded guilty in a South Dakota state court to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine. That crime is a felony in South Dakota, although the analogous offense is a misdemeanor under federal law.

Mr. Lopez served 15 months in state prison and was then placed in federal deportation proceedings as an aggravated felon. After unsuccessfully contesting the designation before the immigration service and the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in St. Louis, he was deported to Mexico.

The Supreme Court's decision makes Mr. Lopez eligible to apply for the administrative relief from deportation known as "cancellation of removal," an option that was foreclosed by his designation as an aggravated felon.

In analyzing the government's position that any offense "punishable" under the Controlled Substances Act therefore became a "drug trafficking" felony, Justice Souter said that "there are a few things wrong with this argument, the first being its incoherence." While "trafficking" ordinarily meant "some sort of commercial dealing," he said, "commerce, however, was no part of Lopez's South Dakota offense of helping someone else to possess."

Justice Souter continued that while the government's argument appeared implausible, that was "not to deny that the government might still be right; Humpty Dumpty used a word to mean 'just what he chose it to mean — neither more nor less,' and legislatures, too, are free to be unorthodox."

But in this instance, he said, if Congress meant to define drug trafficking in such an "unexpected" way, "Congress would need to tell us so, and there are good reasons to think it was doing no such thing here."

Justice Souter said that under the government's interpretation, a central part of federal immigration law, deportation, would depend not on a federal judgment about the seriousness of an offense, but on "varying state criminal classifications." He added, "We cannot imagine that Congress took the trouble to incorporate its own statutory scheme of felonies and misdemeanors if it meant courts to ignore it whenever a state chose to punish a given act more heavily."

The court's conclusion was that "a state offense constitutes a 'felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act' only if it proscribes conduct punishable as a felony under that federal law."

Justice Clarence Thomas was the lone dissenter, observing in his opinion that "without doubt, Congress could have written the definition with this limitation, but it did not."

This was not the first time the Supreme Court has resisted a categorical interpretation of immigration law by the executive branch. In a unanimous opinion two years ago, the court ruled that contrary to the government's view, driving under the influence of alcohol was not a "crime of violence" for which an immigrant could be subjected to automatic deportation. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Justices Rule On Deporting (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that a foreign national living here legally should not be automatically deported if he is convicted of a low-level drug offense that would be a misdemeanor under federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0102831

The 8-1 decision could affect thousands of permanent legal immigrants, often known as green-card holders, who, because of certain state convictions, face deportation without a chance to plead their case before a judge.

The ruling ensures that legal immigrants can fight deportation after they have been convicted of simple drug possession or other offenses that are misdemeanors under the federal Controlled Substances Act even though they are classified as felonies in a state law.

The decision, drawing the dissent of only Justice Clarence Thomas, rejected a position taken by the Bush administration and resolved a split in views among lower courts.

Federal law requires green-card holders who have been convicted of an "aggravated felony" to be deported without an opportunity for appeal. The case tested whether simple drug possession could rise to the level of "illicit trafficking" and an "aggravated felony" because the offense was a state felony.

Jose Antonio Lopez, a Mexican national who became a legal permanent U.S. resident in 1990, was convicted in South Dakota of aiding and abetting possession of cocaine. He was sentenced to five years in prison and released after 15 months for good conduct.

Federal officials began the deportation process, contending that the felony status of drug possession in South Dakota qualified it as an "aggravated felony" requiring Lopez's mandatory banishment.

Justice David Souter wrote for the majority that a state offense should lead to automatic deportation only if it was a felony under the federal Controlled Substances Act.

Souter said that helping someone else possess cocaine does not constitute "illicit trafficking" under federal law: "The government's reading would render the law of alien removal … dependent on varying state criminal classifications," rather than code written by Congress.

Lopez has been in Mexico since his January deportation. Robert Long, his lawyer, said Lopez would now have a chance to argue that he should be allowed to return.

Justice Department spokesman Kathleen Blomquist said officials had not determined how the ruling would affect recent deportations and pending cases.

Court Bars Automatic Deportations In Drug Cases (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Tuesday rejected the Bush administration's aggressive use of immigration laws to automatically expel legal immigrants for minor drug crimes, a decision that could spare thousands from being deported.

Immigrant-rights lawyers said the resounding 8-1 decision will allow noncitizens who have a family, a job and an otherwise clean record to appeal to immigration judges to stay in this country, despite a drug conviction.

"This ensures these lawful residents will have their day in court," said Benita Jain, a lawyer for the New York State Defenders Assn. in Brooklyn.

Federal judges in nine Western states, including California, have previously rejected the government's position on the language in the law. Immigrant-rights experts said Tuesday's decision doesn't change anything for legal immigrants in those states.

Since 1996, the more than 12 million legal immigrants in the United States have been subject to mandatory deportation if they are found guilty of an "aggravated felony," including a "drug trafficking crime." Four years ago, the government expanded the reach of this law to include state drug crimes that can result in a one-year jail term, even if the offense is simple drug possession.

In Tuesday's decision, the high court said that broad interpretation ignored the plain words of the law.

Noting Humpty Dumpty's use of words to mean whatever he wanted them to mean in author Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking-Glass," the justices said it did not make sense to interpret the words "aggravated felony" and "drug trafficking crime" to mean simple drug possession.

Justice David H. Souter, who wrote the opinion, said the government's interpretation was incoherent and is "just what the English language tells us not to expect, and that result makes us very wary of the government's position."

The court said the automatic deportation rule should be triggered only by drug offenses that are the equivalent of drug crimes "punishable as a felony under federal law."

The decision reopened the case of Jose Antonio Lopez, an immigrant from Mexico who had lived as a permanent resident of South Dakota since 1990. He was married with two children and had owned a grocery store.

In 1997, he pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine. This was a felony in South Dakota but a misdemeanor under federal law.

After serving 15 months in prison, Lopez was released, but U.S. immigration authorities deported him to Mexico.

His lawyer, Patricia G. Mattos of St. Paul, Minn., said she told Lopez on Tuesday about the decision and his right to file a request to cancel his removal. "He was speechless. It was very emotional. He was very pleased the system had worked in the United States and that he will have his day in court," she said.

The ruling does not shield immigrants who commit minor drug crimes from being deported in all instances.

However, without the trigger of the automatic deportation rule, they can seek relief from an immigration judge.

It's unclear how many legal immigrants have been deported for minor drug crimes. Last year, the government said 77,000 legal immigrants were deported because they had criminal records, about 10% of which involved drug crimes.

From mid-1997 to May 2006, federal officials used the aggravated felony provisions to deport an estimated 156,713 people through court proceedings, according to the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, which is associated with Syracuse University.

Of that number, a third had criminal convictions for a controlled substance.

Immigrant-rights advocates say the stepped-up enforcement has collared many legal residents who are generally law-abiding and often well established in their adopted communities.

The Washington Legal Foundation, which had supported the government's view, called Tuesday's ruling a disappointment. Lopez was initially charged with more serious drug crimes, said Richard Samp, the group's general counsel.

"One would hope that immigration judges will grant 'cancellation of removal' to aliens convicted of felonies only in the rarest of circumstances," he said.

Tuesday's ruling is the second in three years in which the high court has limited the law's reach. The immigration law requires the government to expel those who commit a "crime of violence," but in 2004, the high court said that drunk driving is not a crime of violence.

In recent years, federal judges have split over whether an immigrant's conviction for a low-level state drug crime can be deemed an "aggravated felony" under immigration laws. Judges in the South and Midwest had adopted the government's view, but judges on the West Coast had rejected it.

"This does not change the situation for folks in California and the 9th Circuit," said Jayshri Srikantiah, a lawyer and director of the Immigrants Rights Clinic at Stanford University.

The Supreme Court justices did not focus on whether it was fair to deport longtime legal immigrants for a low-level drug offense.

Instead, they parsed the words in the federal law.

Souter said that "normal English usage" suggests Congress meant to punish and deport those who sell drugs, not those who simply possess them.

Justice Clarence Thomas was the sole dissenter, saying the law also makes reference to "any felony," which he said could mean both state and federal drug offenses that carry the felony label.

Lawyers who worked on the case said they were uncertain whether those who had been deported several years ago could reopen their cases.

By coincidence, the court heard arguments Tuesday in a related case involving the deportation of a legal Peruvian immigrant who was convicted of stealing a car in Marin County.

A ruling on that issue is due in several months.

Supreme Court Allows Discretion In Deportation For State Felonies (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that an immigrant convicted of a state felony drug charge that would be a lesser crime under federal law may contest the government's decision to deport him.

The 8 to 1 ruling, with Justice Clarence Thomas dissenting, held that a state felony charge that would be only a misdemeanor under federal statutes is not the kind of conviction that would trigger automatic deportation under the federal Immigration and Nationality Act.

The court's action reverses lower-court decisions that led the government to send back to Mexico Jose Antonio Lopez, a South Dakota grocery store owner who had pleaded guilty in 1997 to aiding and abetting another person's possession of cocaine.

The decision came in one of several cases the justices are considering to reconcile conflicting lower-court decisions on when immigrants convicted of crimes must be deported. After announcing yesterday's decision, the court heard arguments in a separate case from California in which a Peruvian immigrant was convicted on car theft charges.

Justice David H. Souter's opinion contained something of a grammar lesson for prosecutors and said Lopez's crime could not be classified as the kind of "aggravated felony" that means the government must move for deportation without any discretion.

At issue was the phrase "felony punishable under the Controlled Substances Act."

The government held that that meant the crime could be a felony under state law, as long as it was also punishable under the act.

"But we do not normally speak or write the Government's way," Souter wrote. "We do not use a phrase like 'felony punishable under the [CSA]' when we mean to signal or allow a break between the noun 'felony' and the contiguous modifier 'punishable under the [CSA].' "

Neither, Souter wrote, should it be read as "if it said 'felony punishable under the CSA whether or not as a felony.' "

Thomas agreed with the government's view of the law and found his colleagues' arguments "unpersuasive."

Despite Lopez's victory, his future is uncertain. He entered the country illegally in 1986 and became a legal permanent resident in 1990. He married and had two children in South Dakota and, according to his attorney -- Washington lawyer Robert A. Long Jr. -- had never been in legal trouble until his conviction in 1997 for telling someone where he could buy cocaine.

The court's decision does not mean that Lopez could stay if he decided to return to this country, only that the government had discretion over whether to initiate deportation proceedings. The justices remanded the case, Lopez v. Gonzales , No. 05-547, to the lower courts.

Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Immigrant On Deportation Issue (LAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, December 6, 2006

The Supreme Court on Tuesday made it easier for some immigrants convicted of drug possession under state law to remain in the United States rather than being subject to deportation.

In an 8-1 decision, the justices ruled in favor of an immigrant who pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting possession of drugs in South Dakota for telling someone where to obtain cocaine.

While such a crime is a felony in South Dakota, most first-time simple possession offenses are punished as misdemeanors under the federal Controlled Substances Act.

The issue before the Supreme Court was the interpretation of the federal Immigration and Nationality Act, which says immigrants found guilty of aggravated felonies are subject to deportation.

Conduct that is a felony under state law but a misdemeanor under the Controlled Substances Act is not a felony for purposes of immigration, stated the ruling by Justice David Souter.

DOJ_NMG_0102834

Jose Antonio Lopez, a 16-year permanent U.S. resident, was deported to Mexico in January 2006, but could return to his wife and two children, who are U.S. citizens, one of his lawyers has said.

Even then, Lopez, who had operated a grocery store in Sioux Falls, S.D., still could face deportation, but an immigration judge would have discretion to allow him to remain in the United States.

In opposing the immigrant's legal position, the Bush administration said that Congress left the door open to counting state felonies as felonies under the federal Controlled Substances Act, which would make them a crime that could trigger deportation under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

"We do not normally speak or write the government's way," Souter wrote, referring to the government's interpretation of the law. "Regular usage points in the other direction."

Treating a misdemeanor under the federal law as a felony "would be so much trickery," Souter wrote.

Justice Clarence Thomas dissented, declaring his colleagues' approach "unpersuasive."

"Whatever else 'illicit trafficking' might mean" in federal law, "it must include anything defined as a 'drug trafficking crime,'" Thomas said.

The court dismissed the case of another immigrant whose case had been consolidated with that of Lopez. The court said its decision to accept the case of Reymundo Toledo-Flores had been improvidently granted.

Toledo-Flores is a Mexican national who objected to having his latest conviction for illegally entering the United States classified an aggravated felony. Toledo-Flores was contesting his prison term, not his deportation, and he had already served it.

The cases are Lopez v. Gonzales, 05-7664, and Toledo-Flores v. U.S., 05-493.

Dems May Take Hardline On Those Who Hire Illegal Immigrants (HILL)

By Cameron Joseph And Bob Cusack

The Hill, December 6, 2006

The selection of Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) to head the Intelligence Committee may be an indication that Democrats will press the Bush administration to crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants.

Reyes, a former Border Patrol agent, is one of the most outspoken proponents of enforcing these types of employer sanctions and appears to have an ally in Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), who will be the House caucus chairman next year.

In an interview with The Hill earlier this year, Emanuel said many Democrats want to focus on employer sanctions as a way to stem illegal immigration. He accused the White House and the Republican-led Congress for letting “its guard down when it comes to employer sanctions.”

Reyes is a cosponsor of a bill by Rep. Charles Gonzalez (D-Texas) to increase enforcement of sanctions against employers of illegal aliens. And while the Judiciary Committee has lead jurisdiction on immigration reform, Reyes has argued that lax enforcement on illegal immigrants jeopardizes national security, which is under his panel’s purview.

He was the lead Democratic cosponsor on a bipartisan bill to enforce restrictions on employment in the United States of unauthorized aliens through the use of improved Social Security cards and an employment eligibility database. He worked closely with House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) in crafting the bill.

Republican leaders championed border security throughout the 109th Congress, but the GOP has been reticent to call for increased government enforcement on corporations.

A recent Government Accountability Office study showed that the enforcement of employer sanctions has been nearly nonexistent over the last few years. Audits of employers to make sure they are checking employee documentation fell 77 percent from 1998 to 2003. Based on available figures, after reaching a peak in the early and mid-1990s, employer-sanctions investigations, warnings and fines have all dropped sharply.

Reyes called the Republican-led immigration reform in the House “a waste of time” because, he claimed, it was an unfunded mandate, and he voted against the House border security bill. He also argued that Republicans’ border-security plan was politically motivated, stating at the time, “Instead of acting to secure our borders and pass immigration reform, Republicans are holding hearings, just so they can keep scapegoating immigrants.”

DOJ_NMG_0102835

Democrats are expected to seek to permanently bridge the gap with "Lou Dobbs Democrats" that voted for "fair trade" policies, while avoiding alienating an expanding Hispanic voting bloc. In focusing on employer sanctions, Democrats hope to appear tough on border security and illegal immigration while avoiding alienating most voters.

However, this may be difficult to do. Asked whether Democrats are likely to push hard for more employer sanctions, a senior Democratic committee staffer familiar with the immigration debate expressed doubt: "I'm not sure that many people in either party want employer sanctions. There are just too many constituencies that don't support this."

The AFL-CIO opposed the Gonzalez-Reyes bill, and expresses reservations about expansion of employer sanctions based on Social Security number verification.

"Implementation of employer sanctions in the short run has been disastrous," said AFL-CIO legislative representative Sonia Ramirez. "In the future I think that we would really be concerned with expansion of employer sanctions, and would have to look very carefully at any legislation to make sure that it will not give amnesty to any complying employers."

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas), the ranking member on the Judiciary subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims, supports employer sanctions but acknowledged union concerns last summer during the immigration reform debate: "The AFL-CIO has a meritorious argument that when you enforce employer sanctions, employers who are unscrupulous will then enforce them against innocent persons."

Many business groups will oppose a Democratic effort to increase employer sanctions.

Angelo Amador, the director of immigration policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said, "We think everything should be done as part of a package. You need to address the 12 million [estimated illegal immigrants in the U.S.] and the future flow of immigrants, and our concerns of filling jobs, as part of immigration reform." He promised to oppose any increased employer sanctions if they came to the House floor without other immigration reform provisions.

Some Democrats this fall called on their leaders to lay out a clear agenda on immigration reform. In a 25-page agenda document for 2007, Democratic leaders did not mention immigration at all, triggering criticism from the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

Still, Emanuel is committed to focusing on employer sanctions, saying earlier this year: "There are over 20 million businesses in the U.S.; the main attraction for people coming to this country is work and there has been almost zero enforcement … You have got to have a real consequence to hiring illegal immigrants if you want to fight it."

TAX:

Calif. Tax Case Linked Locally (NOPT)

By John Lindenberger, The North Platte Telegraph

North Platte (NE) Telegraph, December 6, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice is seeking a preliminary injunction against California accountant Lowell Baisden, who is currently under investigation for promoting an illegal tax fraud scheme.

The motion, which was filed Nov. 29 in U.S. District Court, asks for a preliminary injunction to prevent Baisden from preparing any federal tax returns for his clients and from representing them before the IRS.

Court documents indicate seven North Platte practitioners have been investigated by the IRS in connection with Baisden's scheme. They are doctors Michael Trierweiler, Chris Johng and Walter and Deborah Weaver, along with anesthetist Burt McKeag and nurse anesthetists Evan Geilenkirchen and Kathryn Snoozy.

According to the court records, Baisden helped his clients set up phony corporations to significantly reduce their tax liabilities. He also allegedly prepared their tax returns to perpetuate his scheme. Many of these clients were referred to Baisden by his brother-in-law, Michael Koning, a former North Platte anesthesiologist now living in Montana.

The tax scheme allegedly involves creating sham corporations to which the client's income is assigned. Baisden would then allegedly claim large illegal deductions for non-deductible personal expenses. The remaining income would then be reported as royalty or rental income, which is not subject to self-employment and social security taxes.

According to the complaint from the Justice Department, "several of Baisden's former customers have sought new representation, filed the past-due returns and conceded that the tax returns filed by Baisden are incorrect."

Supporting documents show that McKeag consulted a new accountant in 2003, who prepared an amended return to correct the false information Baisden allegedly reported on his 2002 tax return. In addition, McKeag told investigators that Baisden claimed his tax plan complied with the Internal Revenue laws.

Geilenkirchen said he has also refiled all his taxes with a credible local accountant and is in the process of paying the past taxes that are due. He and his wife have filed their own lawsuit against Baisden, seeking damages for the interest and penalties that have been assessed against them by the IRS.

Others involved could not be reached for comment on Monday.

While many of the local practitioners in this case are involved with the hospital, GPRMC president Cindy Bradley said the hospital is not involved in any way, and they have cooperated fully with the IRS in their investigation.

"Furthermore, no one has been convicted," Bradley noted. She added, she feels it is a shame the medical community could be tainted by the actions of a few people.

According to court records, Baisden has been promoting his tax scheme since 1999, when he created a corporation called Bioventures Inc. to assist Koning in reducing his tax liability by assigning income from his practice, Anesthesia Consultants of Nebraska, to the sham corporation.

The Justice Department's complaint states Baisden was able to offset more than 50 percent of Koning's yearly income. Over a three-year period Baisden allegedly understated Bioventures' tax liability by more than $676,000.

Koning reportedly classified the employees of Anesthesia Consultants as independent contractors to perpetuate Baisden's tax scheme. Court documents state this made it less apparent to the IRS that the employees' income was actually wage income, since no W-2 forms were issued.

Court records indicate Baisden eventually promoted his tax scheme to Koning's employees and associates as well as his Baisden's clients in California.

Baisden allegedly set up sham corporations in Nevada and provided similar tax avoidance by claiming large expense deductions that reduced his clients' taxable income by well over 50 percent.

Baisden reportedly charged his clients an initial fee between $5,000 and $6,000 to establish their corporations, according to the court records. In addition, he charged $1,000 to $2,500 per month to complete the necessary bookkeeping and accounting work to perpetuate the scheme and prepare his clients' tax returns.

When the IRS became aware of Baisden's alleged scheme, it began to investigate the tax returns of several of his clients and determined that the majority of the corporations he created were not engaged in any legitimate business activities.

In addition to promoting his illegal tax scheme and preparing fraudulent returns, the complaint says Baisden delayed IRS investigations by acting as a power of attorney for his clients. Baisden allegedly filed numerous taxpayer advocate forms requesting determination of whether his clients were experiencing a hardship from the IRS.

The court records state, "Using this technique, Baisden was successful in delaying the IRS investigations by several months while the taxpayer advocate was researching his meritless claims."

Based on the IRS investigations that have been conducted, the U.S. Department of Justice estimates Baisden has understated his clients' tax liability by more than $3 million.

Since the IRS investigations began, Baisden has reportedly stopped preparing tax returns for some customers and has filed requests for extensions for their 2003 and 2004 tax returns. However, he has failed to meet the deadlines, and court records indicate his clients are now faced with penalties for nonfiling and for the underpayment of taxes.

In addition, the court documents allege that Baisden has formed new corporations in Wyoming for at least two of his clients to avoid further detection by the IRS.

Baisden has been given 20 days to respond to the complaint filed by the U.S. Department of Justice. The complaint states failure to respond will result in a default judgment against him.

U.S. Giving Bank's Papers To Lawyers In KPMG Suit (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Federal prosecutors who are investigating Deutsche Bank over questionable tax shelters have been turning over internal bank documents to lawyers defending former employees of the accounting firm KPMG in a separate criminal case.

The providing of the Deutsche Bank documents, which began in earnest earlier this year and has accelerated in recent months, was disclosed in a court filing late Monday by John M. Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the case against the indicted KPMG employees. His office is also overseeing the investigation of Deutsche Bank.

The judge in the KPMG case, Lewis A. Kaplan of United States District Court in Manhattan, had previously criticized prosecutors for tardy production of evidence. The trial of the 16 former KPMG employees had been scheduled to begin in January, but last month Judge Kaplan postponed it indefinitely, citing concerns that the defendants, who include an outside lawyer and investment adviser, would not be able to pay their legal bills.

In his filing, Mr. Hillebrecht wrote that prosecutors were turning over the Deutsche Bank documents in part because the Deutsche Bank case had "substantial overlap" with the KPMG employees case, which prosecutors call the largest criminal tax case ever.

Mr. Hillebrecht also disclosed that prosecutors had asked Deutsche Bank to provide additional assistance with the documents for the defendants in the KPMG case, in which Jeffrey Stein, a former KPMG executive, is the lead defendant.

A spokesman for Deutsche Bank declined to comment yesterday.

Lawyers for the KPMG defendants, who requested the Deutsche Bank documents, have been seeking ammunition to make their case. KPMG and Deutsche Bank worked together on a number of tax shelters. But by giving the defense lawyers the Deutsche Bank documents, prosecutors may be hoping to entice one of the KPMG defendants to cooperate in the separate case against Deutsche Bank.

"They may have hit a brick wall with the Deutsche Bank case and need somebody to help them out from Stein," said Peter Henning, a former lawyer in the Justice Department's criminal division.

Prosecutors are also turning over to the defense for the indicted KPMG employees other evidence from other, unnamed tax-shelter investigations, according to Mr. Hillebrecht's filing. The evidence includes documents relating to a former tax lawyer with the firm of Jenkens & Gilchrist; to a previously unidentified investment firm called Qantas Investments U.S.; and to four unnamed employees of the accounting firm PricewaterhouseCoopers.

A spokesman for PricewaterhouseCoopers said yesterday that "we have no reason to believe that either PWC or our personnel are under criminal investigation." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

IRS Cracks Down On Dodgers Who Use Onshore Tax Havens (WSJ)

By Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Escalating its assault on cheating, the Internal Revenue Service is turning up the heat on tax dodgers who conceal taxable income by exploiting gaps in state business-formation laws that allow hidden ownership or control.

The IRS is focusing on individuals or small groups whose tools include use of corporations, trusts, partnerships, limited liability companies and other types of business structures. Some people may form a company, conceal their ownership and use it to claim phony expenses, an IRS official says. Other cases involve outright fraud. IRS officials say some people have created sham, one-person, tax-exempt religious corporations to dodge taxes.

Officials say the problem appears to be particularly severe in Nevada, where recent investigations into promoters of corporations there have turned up widespread abuses. As a result, the IRS has begun expanding the number of audits of people involved in forming Nevada corporations, says Steven Burgess, director of examination for the IRS's Small Business/Self-Employed Division.

The IRS also is considering additional investigations of promoters, Mr. Burgess said at a recent Senate hearing. Even if promoters aren't guilty of wrongdoing, their client lists could be valuable in unearthing evidence of cheating, he said.

The problem isn't limited to Nevada. Mr. Burgess also pointed to Wyoming and Delaware laws as being particularly susceptible to abuse, but added that most states have gaps in their business-formation laws, creating the potential for disguising ownership and other abuses.

The push comes at a time when the IRS faces increasing pressure from Congress to do more to discourage tax evasion and reduce the nation's "tax gap" -- the difference between what the IRS collects each year and what it should be collecting. IRS researchers have estimated this gap at around $290 billion. Some influential lawmakers, notably Sen. Max Baucus, the Montana Democrat who will become chairman of the Senate Finance Committee next year, have said the Treasury needs to do much more to attack the problem.

For years, law-enforcement officials have expressed concern about widespread use of offshore tax havens to hide or shelter taxable income. But now IRS officials and senators are also focusing on the exploitation of onshore havens. "The absence of ownership disclosure requirements and lax regulatory regimes in many of our states make U.S. shell companies attractive vehicles for those seeking to launder money, evade taxes, finance terrorism, or conduct other illicit activity anonymously," said Sen. Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican.

While laws vary from state to state, a report earlier this year by the U.S. Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative arm, said most states don't require companies or third-party agents representing them to disclose ownership information when companies are being formed or in periodic reports.

Mr. Burgess, of the IRS, said the agency is taking additional steps to nab wrongdoers. For example, the IRS has begun using special types of summonses to discover the names of people who have paid businesses to help them form a business in Nevada. The IRS also is coordinating efforts with other federal agencies, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of Homeland Security and the Treasury's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network.

The GAO study reported that state officials, agents and others said that collecting company ownership information could be "problematic." For example, state officials told the GAO that the costs and time involved in approving company formations could increase, thus "potentially slowing down or derailing business dealings." A few states and agents feared losing business to other places with less stringent rules. Officials and agents also expressed concern about violating the privacy of owners of legitimate businesses.

Nevada statutes "were designed for legitimate purposes," says Scott Anderson, Nevada's deputy secretary of state for commercial recordings. "We do understand there are some entities out there using them for illegitimate purposes," he says, adding that "we will be addressing these in the upcoming legislative session." * * *

About 70% of taxpayers will be eligible for an offer of free federal tax-preparation software and electronic filing next year.

The offer comes through the "Free File" program, a partnership between the IRS and a coalition of tax-preparation software makers. For 2007, only taxpayers who earn $52,000 or less will be able to find an offer for which they're eligible, the IRS said. That means about 93 million people, or 70% of all taxpayers, will be eligible.

In a twist, the program includes an agreement by private-sector partners not to offer controversial "ancillary" services, such as "refund anticipation loans," through the program, the IRS said. Consumer groups have long attacked these loans, which use a taxpayer's refund as collateral for a short-term loan that typically carries a very high interest rate.

"We heard many legitimate concerns about the marketing of ancillary products during the last filing season," IRS Commissioner Mark W. Everson said. "This is a constructive step."

Sen. Baucus criticized the IRS decision to retain an income limit on the Free File program. Taxpayer participation in the program fell sharply this year after income limits were imposed. But Sen. Baucus also praised the decision to block the offering of refund-anticipation loans through the program.

"A direct portal on the agency's Web site should allow taxpayers to file directly and truly for free, regardless of income," Sen. Baucus said. * * *

The AMT Reckoning (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Fans of political irony will appreciate that Democrats in Congress are saying they now want to address the "wealth gap" even as they deplore and want to eliminate the Alternative Minimum Tax, or AMT. It was a previous crusade against the wealthy that created the AMT. Haven't we learned anything about the perils of tax policy rooted in political envy?

The AMT became law in 1969 after LBJ's last Treasury Secretary, Joseph Barr, created a liberal uproar by disclosing that 21 millionaires had managed to pay little or no income tax in 1967. Thus the "alternative" tax was designed to capture high earners who claimed a lot of deductions, and somehow Democrats never raised a peep over the years when the AMT was whacking mostly Republican voters. But the tax has now become the monster that ate Marin County, to pick just one of the blue state redoubts where the AMT hits especially hard. This year it will strike four million Americans, and next year without a change in law it will snare 23 million -- one in four tax filers.

More telling for class warriors, next year a higher percentage of Americans with incomes between $50,000 and $100,000 will pay the AMT than will tax filers with incomes above $1 million a year (see chart). One lesson: Whenever a politician claims a tax will only hit "the rich," don't believe him. Sooner or later the tax always soaks the middle class, because that's where the money is.

The latest data indicate that the eight states with the highest percentage of tax filers subject to the AMT all voted heavily Democratic in 2004 and 2006 -- including Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Rhode Island. Those voters are now screaming for relief, and the question for Democrats is where they'll find the money. Eliminating the AMT would cost about $50 billion for one year and $1.2 trillion over 10 years, according to the Treasury Department.

Our free advice is that they consider some bipartisan tax reform. What Americans loathe about the AMT is that it first requires filers to comply with the regular IRS tax code with its hundreds of tax forms, work sheets and instructions. But then if they qualify for too many deductions -- for state and local taxes, say, or the child credit -- they must double their pleasure by recalculating their income and filling out separate tax schedules for the AMT. Then they pay whichever tax is higher. It's really a Mandatory Maximum Tax.

The AMT is gradually evolving into the de facto U.S. tax system, and the regular tax code with its Byzantine rules and carve-outs is becoming less relevant each year. According to the liberal Tax Policy Center at the Brookings Institution and Urban Institute, the total cost to the Treasury of scrapping the entire IRS tax code but retaining the AMT would be only $63 billion in the first year, $56 billion in the second year, and less than that in each succeeding year. For a growing number of Americans, the first page of the IRS 1040 instruction manual might as well read: Go directly to the AMT.

So here's a possible deal between the Bush Administration and the Pelosi Democrats: Junk the IRS code and use the AMT as the basis for tax reform. The AMT provides at least the crude framework for a much simpler tax code, because it eliminates almost all deductions and special interest carve-outs. It requires only about one-tenth as many tax forms as the regular code. It has a broad tax base and only two tax rates, 26% and 28%.

Yes, a load of sticky tax issues would still need to be negotiated: The double and triple taxation of investment and savings would have to be eliminated, and adjustments would also be needed lest many families with children be socked with a huge tax hike as they are under the current AMT.

The Democrats created the AMT and we suppose it's rough justice that they're now stuck with finding a way out of their own mess. Yes, they could try to create some tax showdown between repealing the Bush tax cuts for "the rich" and AMT relief. But Republicans would rightly portray this as a tax increase and our guess is they'd win that fight. Meanwhile, today the average American sucked into the AMT pays an extra $6,000 of tax to the IRS, and next year some 20 million additional Americans will have to pay this "rich man's tax." Democrats running Congress would get the blame if they do nothing.

The whole tax system is on the verge of collapse and needs to be modernized. Republicans pledged for 12 years to create a simpler, fairer tax system and never delivered. This is your chance, Speaker Pelosi.

Bush To Meet With Centrist Dems (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 6, 2006

President Bush has invited leaders of the conservative Blue Dog and New Democrat coalitions to the White House Friday to discuss areas of "mutual cooperation" in the words of one Democratic Congressional aide.

The outreach comes at a time when Bush's image on Capitol Hill and around the country has taken a serious beating. The meeting is scheduled just two days after the Iraq Study Group is scheduled to release its findings and one day after the Senate Armed Services Committee plans to hold hearings on them.

Reps. Alan Boyd (Fla.), Dennis Moore (Kan.) and Mike Ross (Ark.) will represent the Blue Dogs, a coalition of usually southern, conservative-leaning Democrats and Reps. Joe Crowley (N.Y.), Artur Davis (Ala.), Ron Kind (Wis.), Adam Smith (Wash.) and Ellen Tauscher (Calif.) are set to represent the New Democrats, a group of business-friendly centrists, at the meeting, which the president is expected to attend.

Lawmakers Unlikely To Accept U.N. Position (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, December 6, 2006

As President Bush begins vetting candidates to succeed resigned U.N. Ambassador John Bolton, as many as five departing lawmakers have surfaced as players in the Beltway's nominations guessing game.

Centrist GOP Rep. Jim Leach (Iowa) was a longtime senior member of the International Relations Committee whose support of abortion rights and opposition to the 2003 Bush tax cuts often placed him at odds with conservatives in the conference. He has emerged as a favorite among House colleagues, 48 of whom recommended him to Bush before Bolton's resignation became public.

Leach is flattered and honored by the bipartisan effort on his behalf but is making other plans for his future, spokesman Gregory Wierzynski said. A former Princeton University trustee and expert on international affairs, Leach is leaning toward taking a visiting professorship at Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School.

One source close to Leach's deliberations said the 15-term veteran recognizes that the next nominee is likely to share Bolton's staunchly conservative record. "He realizes that he is in an awkward position, having voted against the war," the source said.

Another surprise on several U.N. shortlists is Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), who not only voted against the war in Iraq but also helped put the brakes on any reconsideration of Bolton during this month's lame-duck session. Chafee, a Foreign Relations Committee member, also is leaning toward taking an academic or policy position after leaving the Hill.

"It's something that's just such a very remote possibility that it would be an extreme hypothetical, and I don't think the senator wants to deal with hypotheticals at this time," Chafee spokesman Chris Spina said of reports that Chafee could be named Bolton's successor.

Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell (D-Maine), himself a subject of speculation surrounding the post, dismissed that possibility, telling CNN yesterday that Bush would seek to replace Bolton with a Republican.

Mitchell acknowledged the upside to naming a former lawmaker who might have an easier path to confirmation among former colleagues, and offered up three defeated Republican senators: George Allen (Va.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Jim Talent (Mo.). But DeWine took himself out of the running yesterday, telling the Cleveland Plain Dealer that he was flattered but planned to return to his home state.

The President's 'Lost Opportunity' For The 4th Circuit (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 6, 2006

Chief Judge William Wilkins, who has presided over the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the past four years, sent President George W. Bush a letter last week announcing his plans to step down in June.

DOJ_NMG_0102841

"I've had it for a good while now and it's time to move on," Wilkins tells Legal Times. Though Wilkins, a South Carolina native who will turn 65 in March, will still hear cases as a senior judge, his quasi-retirement creates a fourth official vacancy on the 15-member bench. (Technically, there are five openings, but Judge H. Emory Widener Jr., who announced plans to retire in 2003, has pledged to stay active until the nominee for his seat -- Defense Department general counsel William Haynes II -- is confirmed.)

The large number of vacancies during a Republican administration is particularly striking given the 4th Circuit's reputation as one of the most stalwart conservative courts in the nation. The circuit, which covers Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and North and South Carolina, also is the key appellate arena for the administration's terrorism cases, largely prosecuted in the Eastern District of Virginia.

"You'd think they'd want to fill them and fill them as quickly as possible," says Arthur Hellman, a professor at the University of Pittsburgh School of Law.

Though the Bush administration has tried to fill a few open seats, it has faced stiff opposition even during the Republican-controlled Congress. U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle's nomination to the 4th Circuit has languished since 2001, and senators have blocked Haynes' confirmation over questions about his involvement with the Justice Department's infamous "torture memo." It's unlikely the administration will fare any better under the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress.

So the question some court watchers are asking is whether future picks to the 4th Circuit could inch this reliably conservative bench closer to the center.

"A lot of people have said this is a lost opportunity for the Bush administration, because it has been considered quite a conservative court, and they haven't been able to confirm their nominees," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond School of Law.

U.S. Drops Plan To Increase Foreign Control Over Airlines (USAT/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Already rebuffed by a Republican-controlled Congress, the Bush administration on Tuesday withdrew its plan to give foreign investors more management control of U.S. airlines.

Announced Tuesday by Transportation Secretary Mary Peters, the decision follows a department review of public comments about the proposal, and votes by the Senate and House this year to prevent the plan from going forward.

"It was clear from reviewing the comments that the department needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits of allowing more international investment," Peters said in a statement.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who introduced the measure to block the plan in the Senate, said the Bush administration recognized that new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate "will not put up with this bad idea." The decision may affect U.S. negotiations with the European Union on a so-called Open Skies aviation treaty that would allow European and U.S. airlines to fly wherever they want between European cities and the USA, and charge whatever they want.

Advocates hope such a deal would increase air travel, lower airfares, create jobs and boost investment in U.S. carriers. Labor unions, some airlines and their allies in Congress fear it would cost U.S. jobs and allow foreign investors, even foreign governments, control over an industry critical to national security.

Peters' decision was greeted with disappointment by Jacques Barrot, vice president of the European Union's Commission in charge of Transport. In a statement, Barrot called the scrapped proposal "an essential element" to concluding a new aviation agreement. He did, however, accept Peters' proposal to send U.S. representatives to Brussels in early 2007 for talks on how to proceed.

Peters renewed the U.S. commitment to seeking an Open Skies agreement with Europe. She asserted the investment proposal was not directly linked to the treaty but acknowledged that some in the European negotiations had aligned the two.

The administration first proposed giving foreign investors in U.S. airlines more control over marketing, routing and fleet structure in November 2005. It amended the plan last May to limit the ability of foreign investors to make decisions about safety, security and national defense obligations.

DOJ_NMG_0102842

A 65-year-old law limits foreign ownership of U.S. airlines to 25%. The administration argued that its plan would not have lifted that limit, but opponents claimed it was trying to use regulations to circumvent the statute at the request of Europeans who viewed that as a prerequisite for an Open Skies treaty.

US Scraps Airline Investment Reforms (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Hopes for an open skies aviation pact between the US and the European Union suffered a severe setback on Tuesday when the US abandoned plans to give overseas investors more influence in the management of its airlines.

Bowing to pressure from Congress, labour unions and airlines, Mary Peters, the new transportation secretary, acknowledged dropping the reforms could affect the preliminary transatlantic deal agreed last year.

EU negotiators had made it clear a revision of the rules was essential for their approval of the preliminary open skies pact, which would have opened market access and led to co-operation in areas such as safety, security and competition policy.

The US transport department wanted to ease restrictions on the involvement of overseas investors in marketing and operational decisions, in part to boost airlines' access to capital markets, although the 25 per cent foreign ownership ceiling would remain unchanged.

Current rules prevent overseas investors having any "semblance" of influence in management decisions of US airlines.

After speaking to Ms Peters by telephone, Jacques Barrot, European transport commissioner, expressed disappointment at Tuesday's move.

"We have been waiting a year," said his spokesman. "The legal situation is now fragile."

Further talks are scheduled in Brussels next month, but the European Commission said it would resume legal proceedings if they broke down.

The European Court has ruled current bilateral deals between EU member states and Washington illegal as some countries receive better treatment than others.

Ms Peters, who inherited the controversial proposal when she took over in October, had hoped to present a revised version of the rule change to EU transport ministers next week, having twice missed self-imposed deadlines for the reforms as the DoT wrestled with domestic opposition.

She said: "There simply are too many questions and too many concerns about the potential impact of this rule for us to continue at this point," but she reaffirmed US commitment to a new transatlantic deal.

Congressional critics said that more foreign involvement in the operation of US airlines raised national security concerns and such changes were outside the DoT's jurisdiction.

U.S. Drops Plan For Greater Foreign Role In Aviation (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House withdrew a proposal to allow foreigners greater control over U.S. airlines, bowing to congressional opposition and putting in question an important aviation agreement with Europe.

The Department of Transportation said yesterday it was dropping a proposed regulation that would have allowed foreigners to exercise power over routes, scheduling and many other aspects of airline operations, after the planned change came under criticism from U.S. lawmakers, labor unions and others.

The move underscored the rising protectionist sentiments in Congress and throughout the country. It will have an impact on negotiations over a long-sought agreement that would allow U.S. and European airlines to fly without restrictions across the Atlantic.

The "open skies" agreement also would provide greater access to London's popular Heathrow airport for U.S. carriers. Europeans had said they wouldn't finalize that agreement if the U.S. doesn't liberalize the foreign-investment rules on U.S. airline operations.

The parties plan to return to the bargaining table in January to see how the deal might be salvaged. Europeans, who are after broader access to the U.S. market, could seek alternative concessions from the U.S., though it is unclear what those might include.

The Europeans face additional pressure to wrap up the talks: A European high court has ruled that the bilateral aviation agreements that all European countries have with the U.S. are illegal and must be replaced with a broader European regime. If those bilateral agreements were dissolved, it could disrupt airlines services, such as alliances among U.S. and European carriers.

European transport ministers are scheduled to meet next week in Brussels, where they had been expected to approve the open-skies agreement, had the change in U.S. law been complete. Deep and widespread opposition in Congress and elsewhere forced the White House to back down. Opposition is significant in the Republican-led Congress and is only likely to intensify once Democrats take over next year.

For years, U.S. law has limited stock ownership by foreigners in U.S. airlines and has barred foreigners from exercising "actual control" over operations. The administration of President Bush argued that loosening the control rules would attract more foreign investment in U.S. carriers, as well as help with the European negotiations. The Bush plan would have allowed foreigners power over most operations, save matters of safety, security and use of craft by the U.S. military.

Some Republicans Take A Scorched-Hill Tack (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Like a retreating army, Republicans are tearing up railroad track and planting legislative land mines to make it harder for Democrats to govern when they take power in Congress next month.

Already, the Republican leadership has moved to saddle the new Democratic majority with responsibility for resolving $463 billion in spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1. And the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Bill Thomas (R., Calif.), has been demanding that the Democrat-crafted 2008 budget absorb most of the $13 billion in costs incurred from a decision now to protect physician reimbursements under Medicare, the federal health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

The unstated goal is to disrupt the Democratic agenda and make it harder for the new majority to meet its promise to reinstitute "pay-as-you-go" budget rules, under which new costs or tax cuts must be offset to protect the deficit from growing.

"I think we're trying to get an accommodation," said Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) last evening. "You're digging a hole now and filling up with money from '08," he said of Mr. Thomas's demands. "He says he's trying to move away from that."

But with Mr. Hastert dismantling his office, House Republicans appear to be operating in a post-election leadership vacuum. The White House is watching with alarm, as are many Senate Republicans, who have a greater stake than the House in maintaining relations with Democrats.

"There are individuals who want to blow up the tracks, and there are more of those individuals in the House," said one Senate leadership aide.

The collapse of the appropriations process will be felt soon in the Justice and Commerce departments, food-safety agencies and veterans' health care. "It's not just a mess. It's a mountainous mess," complained Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the next House Appropriations Committee chairman.

In the Medicare dispute, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) has aligned himself with Democrats against Mr. Thomas and House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R., Texas). Talks continued last night in hopes of reaching agreement this morning on the physician issue and a larger $38 billion tax-and-trade package important to business.

"Failure is not an option," warned John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. New York City and Wall Street have a major stake in $682 million in tax provisions important to transportation infrastructure and redevelopment of the World Trade Center area. And the trade package, as introduced by Mr. Thomas last night, runs from Vietnam and Andean countries to a set of expired general preferences for developing countries around the globe.

"We are fairly close," said Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.), the next Finance chairman. But given the still-uncertain Republican support, the Vietnam trade bill could yet be sacrificed, Mr. Grassley warned.

With Congress turning off the lights this week, there seems no chance of saving the appropriations process. Instead, most of the government will remain on a stopgap bill through Feb. 15, and in kicking this can down the road, the Republican leadership has no idea where it will stop rolling.

"It's a demonstration of the irresponsibility of Republicans that they would leave this country with this mess," said the next House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.). "But we won, we will deal with it."

Democrats could simply extend the stopgap resolution again in February and set themselves up as a budget appeals court of sorts, to which the administration will have to come for relief. "I think we can work through it, but it is not our preference," said White House budget chief Rob Portman. But the administration admits it could yet pay a price if the spending issues become entangled with President Bush's spring supplemental-spending request for military operations in Iraq.

The stopgap resolution, which the House expects to take up today, allows no growth above 2006 spending, and as a rule, any spending cuts from 2006 levels voted by the House this past summer prevail. On balance, annual funding is about $6 billion less than the president's budget request -- without always reflecting his priorities.

In the course of the House floor debate, for example, general administration funds for the Justice Department were cut to $35.4 million, less than half the 2006 funding level and a nearly 70% cut from the president's request. House members were gambling then that at least some of the money could be restored in final talks with the Senate, but since the appropriations process has collapsed, those talks never took place, and the Justice Department must live with the results.

Mr. Portman will have greater discretion to apportion funds to deal with the crisis. But the gaps are too big in some cases to easily work around. Food-safety inspections face a $17 million shortfall by Feb 15. Veterans medical care will be funded at an annual rate $3.1 billion less than most of Congress agrees is needed, and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R., Texas) is demanding changes in the stopgap bill to recognize this shortfall.

"What a sad mess," said Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W.Va).

Lawmakers Try To Keep Their Bills Alive During Final Week (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Rep. Mark Green's (R-Wis.) legislation that would crack down on abuses against animals has an impressive 324 cosponsors. Green's party controls Congress and the White House. And Green's bill is going nowhere.

The legislation is one of many on its last breath as Congress inches closer to the end of its 109th session. But unlike the other thousands of bills that will formally die over the next several days, Green's bill is backed by an overwhelmingly majority of lawmakers, making its inevitable demise more frustrating.

When bills fail to cross the finishing line of the president's desk, the rationale usually is that "time ran out." However, with politically popular legislation, the real culprit is usually a powerful subcommittee or committee chairman.

On Feb. 15, 2005, Green introduced a bill to strengthen laws against animal fighting. Two months later, 70 lawmakers had signed on as cosponsors and the Senate passed similar legislation by unanimous consent. By the end of February 2006, the number of cosponsors totaled 221. In mid-May, a subcommittee held a hearing on the bill.

On Sept. 20, in a video sent to Congress, wrestling-entertainment star Hulk Hogan stated, "The laws against animal fighting just aren't tough enough."

On Sept. 25, the Humane Society urged House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) to put the bill on the House calendar.

Yet, nearly two years after it was introduced, hope is all that Green and his supporters have left.

"I am hopeful we will find a way to pass this legislation before the end of session," Green wrote in an e-mail to The Hill.

A lobbyist familiar with the issue blames Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) for stifling its passage.

DOJ_NMG_0102845

Wayne Pacelle, president and CEO of the Humane Society of the United States, said that Sensenbrenner "has been an impediment on this bill." He says the group doesn't know why the chairman, from Green's own state and political party, is holding it up.

Judiciary Committee spokesman Terry Shawn did not know why the bill hasn't been passed, but said "there certainly have been a number of priorities," citing homeland security matters. He did not follow up on the matter.

Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who is expected to head the Judiciary Committee in 2007, is a cosponsor on Green's bill. But there is no next year for the retiring Green, who ran unsuccessfully for governor.

As time runs out in the Congress, politics can trump policy in deciding which bills become law. Even if a bill has more than enough support to pass if brought to the floor, powerful members and long-held vendettas can determine a bill's fate.

Some lawmakers file discharge petitions to get their bills out of committee, trying to attach their legislation to appropriations bills or wage last-ditch efforts to get their objectives pushed through.

For Rep. Phil English (R-Pa.), who introduced a bill that would repeal Medicare's outpatient therapy caps, time just isn't on his side. His bill has 260 cosponsors.

"Frankly, it's not our time yet," said Julia Wanzco, English's press secretary. "Patience is a virtue in the legislative proc ess."

Wanzco stressed that there have been other vehicles for her boss to accomplish his goal — other legislation has created a temporary fix, while his bill would permanently eradicate the healthcare caps.

Other bills require that companion legislation be passed along with them.

For instance, Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) has a series of three bills that would bolster research-and-development programs, each of which has at least 60 cosponsors. But each of the measures was relegated to a separate committee, ma king passage difficult, Domenici's spokesman Matt Letourneau said. The bills have since been folded into a broad leadership bill, which may or may not be passed this year, he said.

Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) introduced legislation in January 2005 that would allow World War II Merchant Marines and Naval and Army transportation personnel to be eligible for benefits. He's got 267 cosponsors, but it hasn't yet passed.

"It has a bipartisan majority, but the Veterans [Affairs] Committee Chairman [Steve Buyer (R-Ind.)] just won't move it," Filner told The Hill.

The Veterans Affairs Committee's press secretary, Brooke Adams, said that Buyer has policy concerns with the bill.

And even though Filner had so many cosponsors, his discharge petition fell short by about 40 signatures, locking the bill in committee.

Leadership officials have warned their members not to sign on to discharge petitions. It is rare for GOP members to sign them because they are viewed as a rebuff of their leaders. Yet the week after the GOP washout on Election Day, Reps. Walter Jones (R-N.C), Ron Paul (R-Texas), and Ted Poe (R-Texas) put their names on discharge petitions.

Explaining his boss's decision to sign a petition on an education bill, Paul spokesman Jeff Deist said, "I think he was hopeful that leadership would do something about it and … there's no reason to give deference to the leadership if it's going to be different in the spring."

Sometimes a bill would be a piece of a larger puzzle that never gets discussed. Debate on Social Security reform, for example, was crucial for Rep. Buck McKeon's (R-Calif.) chances for his legislation, which had 326 cosponsors.

"The thought was that it would be incorporated into any Social Security reform package, [but] time ran out. We never got that far," said James Geoffrey, McKeon's press secretary.

One Democratic aide, who chose to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of his boss's bill, said it all comes down to money: "[Many bills have] a lot of members' support, but they're not paid for," he said. "There's a cost. It's not in the budget. It's not paid for; it ought to be, but it's not."

Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), who introduced a bill that would give Native American code-talkers commemorative medals, expressed frustration earlier this year when his bill stalled.

"The hard part of the bill was you have to have two-thirds of members to get it out of the Banking Committee. We had 79 on this," Inhofe said. "There wasn't any opposition to it, [but] a lot of people don't want to add any more commemor ative medals."

DOJ_NMG_0102846

Things changed in September, however, as Inhofe's press secretary Ryan Thompson had breaking news to relay: "I'm doing fantastic," he said. "The code-talkers bill went late last night."

GOP House Leaders Choose To Let Bill Die (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Yolanda Woodlee

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Republican congressional leaders decided yesterday not to bring to the floor a bill giving the District a full voting member of the House, dooming the measure's chances in this legislative session.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), the bill's author, had appealed to his party's leadership to cram in a vote during Congress's lame-duck session, which could end as soon as Thursday. But in a closed-door meeting, House leaders rejected the request.

"There was a certain level of resistance because there were a number of constitutional concerns from members," said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), the House majority leader. He did not elaborate.

The bill had faced long odds for approval this week, given the time constraints. Even if it got through the House, it would have needed to clear the Senate. But proponents had taken heart from the bipartisan support it had attracted. The bill would have balanced the new seat for the mostly Democratic District with an additional one for heavily Republican Utah.

D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) criticized lawmakers for not moving ahead this week. "I'm disappointed because District residents have waited long enough for basic voting rights, and we shouldn't have to wait one day longer," Williams said in a statement.

Questions about the bill's legal merits have persisted, as it worked its way through Congress this year. Some scholars have testified that the Constitution limits full membership in Congress to states; others have argued that Congress has the authority to treat the District as a state for the purposes of representation.

Davis, working with Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) and other voting-rights advocates, had built a wide-ranging coalition to support the bill, and had won the backing of some prominent legal scholars. He and Norton expressed dismay at the decision.

"It's tough to take after we, along with D.C. residents, had created so much momentum for this bipartisan bill," Davis and Norton said in a statement. "We got it farther than anyone anticipated."

They pledged to reintroduce the bill "as our first order of business in the 110th Congress."

Norton has represented the city in the House for eight terms, introducing legislation and serving on committees. But she is not allowed to vote on the floor. Advocates have sought to give the District a vote in Congress for decades, and backers are not giving up.

Some supporters are optimistic that it can win approval next year when Democrats take control of Congress. The House speaker-elect, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), is a co-sponsor of the measure, and Democrats have generally been more amenable to the issue.

In his statement, Williams said he hoped that the new Congress will revisit the issue next month.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who met with Norton and Pelosi last week, echoed that view. "I look forward to working with all stakeholders to ensure passage of the bill and enfranchisement for District residents," he said.

But Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote, an advocacy group that had been promoting the bill, said he worries that lawmakers will be too busy with budget bills and other priorities to consider the measure early in 2007.

"We're very skeptical about what might happen next year," he said.

District officials were jubilant after the voting measure was approved last May by the House Committee on Government Reform, chaired by Davis. The bill then moved to the Judiciary Committee, where it was held up over its plan to make Utah's new seat at-large, an arrangement some legislators considered unconstitutional.

To resolve that concern, the Utah legislature met in special session Monday to approve a redistricting map that would include a fourth congressional seat for the state. But the move came too late to propel the bill to a full House vote.

House Doesn't Allow D.C.- Vote Decision (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Congressional leaders decided not to allow a House vote this week on a measure that would give D.C. residents a vote in Congress for the first time.

Sponsors of the bill said last night that Republican leaders won't bring the measure to the floor during the lame-duck session that ends this week.

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, expressed their disappointment that the measure won't be voted on until after the new Congress is sworn in next month.

"It's tough to take after we, along with D.C. residents, had created so much momentum for this bipartisan bill," Mr. Davis and Mrs. Norton said in a joint statement. "We got it farther than anyone anticipated. We're disappointed not for ourselves but for residents of the District and Utah and all those who joined this fight for justice over the past four years."

The D.C. Voting Rights Act would give the overwhelmingly Democratic District a full vote in the House and create a fourth House seat for predominantly Republican Utah.

Mrs. Norton and Mr. Davis said they will reintroduce the measure in January. Under current House rules, Mrs. Norton only has a vote in committee and cannot vote on final legislation.

"The main problem is time," Mrs. Norton conceded earlier this week.

Mayor Anthony A. Williams, who leaves office Jan. 2, said it was "unfair and unreasonable" for the Republican-controlled Congress to shelve the issue.

"I'm disappointed because District residents have waited long enough for basic voting rights, and we shouldn't have to wait one day longer," Mr. Williams said.

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week to discuss the bill's prospects.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for the California Democrat, said the bill would be a priority for Democratic lawmakers next session when they are in control of the 110th Congress.

The Utah Legislature on Monday approved a map dividing the state into four congressional districts instead of three. The redistricting map was required by lawmakers to move the bill forward.

The two additional seats would expand the House permanently from 435 to 437 members.

House Republicans Stop Plan For District Of Columbia Seat (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 5 — A day after the Republican-led Utah Legislature approved a package aimed at creating two new seats in Congress, one for Utah and one for the District of Columbia, Republican leaders in Congress said the plan was dead and would not be voted on this session.

A spokesman for the chief backer of the plan, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said Mr. Davis would push for reconsideration. Failing that, the spokesman said, Mr. Davis would reintroduce the package in the next Congress, which the Democrats will lead.

A spokesman for Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah, a Republican, said Mr. Huntsman had not given up either and was making calls on Tuesday to Washington in an effort to keep the idea alive.

“We’re disappointed, but we view this as a temporary setback, not by any means a final decision,” said the spokesman, Mike Mower.

A Utah-Washington axis, with one side heavily Republican here in Utah and the other overwhelmingly Democratic in Washington, was clearly an odd-duck creation from the beginning.

The plan emerged out of an effort to gain voting representation on Capitol Hill for Washington residents, who have never been a voting voice in Congress. Utah was enlisted as a partner because it has its own grudges about representation. An undercount in the 2000 Census robbed Utah, leaders in both parties say, of a fourth Congressional seat that they believe they are due.

Utah fulfilled its part of the pact on Monday, calling a one-day legislative session at a cost of $15,000 to create a redistricting map for the proposed fourth seat, almost certainly to be held by a Republican.

A new Republican seat for Utah was meant to ease the way through the House and Senate by the Washington bill, the District of Columbia Fair and Equal Voting Rights Act.

That measure would allow residents to elect a voting member of Congress. That new representative would presumably be a Democrat. Thus, one new seat on each side of the aisle balancing the other.

Some Republicans in the Utah Legislature balked, saying that the Constitution authorized representation only to the states and that unless the status of the District of Columbia was changed or the constitutional language about statehood was changed, the courts would probably strike down the plan.

The bill's fate in the Senate was also questionable, especially if an allowance for representation in the House for the District of Columbia might lead to calls for a Senate seat, too.

GOP's Big Plans Yield Little Gain (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Twelve years after Republicans stormed into power on Capitol Hill with ambitious plans for action on energy exploration, abortion and other key issues, the GOP wraps up its run at the helm this week with a legislative whimper.

One of the few bills that may emerge from Congress before it adjourns for the year would expand oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. Yet even if the GOP succeeds in pushing the measure into law, it will be a more modest and much less controversial plan than party leaders envisioned just months ago.

In the House, a GOP-backed bill may pass that would require abortion providers to tell patients that fetuses feel pain. But the measure not only falls far short of initiatives Republicans once hoped to enact that would rein in abortions, it stands virtually no chance of taking effect — the Senate has no intention of considering the bill before leaving town.

The energy and abortion bills are examples of the last gasps of an expiring GOP wish list.

With Democrats slated to take control of Congress in January, proposals to expand oil drilling and reduce abortions are unlikely to see the light of day during the next two years. Instead, they will join other mainstays of the Republican agenda — such as abolishing the estate tax, limiting medical malpractice lawsuits and banning gay marriages — on the legislative sidelines.

GOP lawmakers express resignation as they contemplate seeing many of their cherished goals consigned to oblivion, replaced by priorities near and dear to the hearts of Democrats.

"It's going to be a challenge … and I say that tragically," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), whose bill on fetal pain will come up today for what almost assuredly will be its last vote in the foreseeable future.

A cornerstone of the Republican agenda was a pledge to control federal spending. But the party's congressional leaders have faced mounting criticism from their own rank-and-file members on this front as the federal budget deficit has grown in recent years. And in the final days of this congressional session, the GOP is making little effort to pass a series of bills to fund the federal government next year, much less implement any long-term budget restraints.

"There is a sense that the Republicans ultimately … said, 'Let the Democrats sweep up after the elephants, " said Ross K. Baker, a congressional scholar at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

As of Tuesday, Congress had cleared just two of 11 spending measures for the government — one that provides money for the Pentagon, the other for the Department of Homeland Security. Rather than grapple with tough spending decisions for the array of other agencies, the Republicans plan instead to pass a stopgap funding measure, leaving it to the Democratic-controlled Congress to adopt new funding bills early next year.

G. William Hoagland, the top budget aide to outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), chalked up this scenario to "a dispirited GOP."

DOJ_NMG_0102849

The abortion bill pending before the House has been a second-tier priority for anti-abortion activists, said Douglas Johnson of the National Right to Life Committee.

Under it, women whose pregnancies are 20 weeks past fertilization would have to be informed that "substantial evidence" existed that fetuses experience pain as an abortion is performed. The bill's supporters hope this requirement could dissuade some women from following through with an abortion.

The measure's assertion that fetuses feel pain is in dispute. But in a sign of the relatively low importance attached to the measure, it is not being actively opposed by NARAL Pro-Choice America, one of the nation's leading abortion rights groups.

Republicans scored some successes in the battles over abortion during their years in power. One of the most prominent was the 2003 passage of a bill banning so-called "partial-birth abortions," a procedure often used to end pregnancies during the second trimester.

The measure has yet to take effect, however, pending a U.S. Supreme Court ruling on its constitutionally. And this year, anti-abortion activists suffered a setback when Congress deadlocked on a measure that would have toughened parental-consent laws involving minors who crossed state lines for abortions.

Republicans have similarly had to scale back their hopes for expanding oil drilling off the nation's coastline.

House leaders had been holding out for a far-reaching measure that would have relaxed a decades-long ban on drilling in most coastal waters, including those in the Pacific Ocean. But pro-drilling industry groups lobbied the leaders to accept the more limited Senate bill that focuses only on the Gulf Coast.

"We want to take what we can get" before Democrats take over Capitol Hill, said Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.). "This is about a fraction of what we really wanted to do, but it's helpful."

Panel Turf Wars Looming (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Incoming Democratic House committee chairmen among themselves are edging toward a turf war and tricky talks with the Senate by pressing to reverse structural changes made to their panels by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and other Republican leaders.

Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), who for years struck fear in executive-branch officials and industry bosses as chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is arguing that his panel should be given back important jurisdictions that Republicans stripped from it.

He is at odds with incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who has opposed him in the past. She has said there will not likely be any changes of jurisdiction between committees. “I don’t think we’ll be changing jurisdictions but we’ll have to take a look at it,” Pelosi told The Hill.

Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), the presumed next chairman of the Appropriations Committee, is also seeking changes of jurisdiction and is haggling with Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) over reversing changes the GOP made to his panel’s jurisdictional structure.

But while Pelosi, keen to avoid turf battles, does not support changing committee jurisdictions, she has given Obey a green light to change the structure of his panel because the reforms would be internal.

Obey, a close ally of Pelosi’s, plans to add at least one new appropriations subcommittee and make Rep. Jose Serrano (D-N.Y.) a subcommittee chairman, according to House Democratic sources. That would allow at least one member of a racial minority to wield a gavel on the panel.

Obey is going to restore the Legislative Branch subcommittee and give the Defense Appropriations subcommittee headed by Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), another Pelosi ally, control over military healthcare issues, a big defense account, said a senior Democrat.

Dingell is one of a few House committee ranking members who have approached the Democratic leadership about jurisdictional issues, said a Democratic aide. The Small Business Committee is also pressing jurisdictional concerns.

Dingell says his panel would be more effective than Financial Services in presiding over securities, insurance and accounting, areas that Republicans carved away from Commerce. Republicans added those powers to the old Banking Committee and turned it into the Financial Services Committee.

"The Commerce Committee has always functioned very well with that jurisdiction. There were no scandals in the financial world whatsoever," said Dingell. "Since they carved up the jurisdiction we have a seen a number of scandals. I think rectification of those problems includes returning jurisdiction to where it was exercised well and where it properly belongs."

When asked whether he would press leaders to make those changes, Dingell responded: "We're still working on that."

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the second-most senior Democrat on Commerce, supports Dingell.

"I've heard his arguments and they're very persuasive to me as a member of the Energy and Commerce Committee," said Waxman.

But Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), incoming chairman of Financial Services, said there would be no jurisdictional realignment between his panel and Commerce. Frank noted that Rep. Mike Capuano (D), chairman of the Committee on Organization, Study, and Review, which is reviewing changes to House rules, is a fellow member of the Massachusetts delegation.

Frank said his staff and the staffs of other incoming chairmen would form a working group to ensure jurisdictional cooperation between committees.

Several senior members of the House Appropriations Committee said Obey and Byrd, the incoming chairman of the Senate panel, would implement reforms to align the Senate and House.

At the beginning of the 109th Congress, House Republicans eliminated the VA, HUD and Independent agencies subcommittee as well as the District of Columbia and Legislative Branch subcommittees.

In the Senate, Republicans managed to reach agreement on eliminating only the District of Columbia subcommittee, creating a misalignment between the two chambers. The Senate Appropriations Committee has 12 subcommittees while its House counterpart has 10. Because each is responsible for crafting a spending bill funding a portion of government, the mismatch created a headache for Senate and House negotiators seeking compromises between significantly differing versions.

Several senior members of the House committee said Obey and Byrd would restructure their respective subcommittees to create alignment.

Democrats have only agreed to add one new House subcommittee. But to create a match with the Senate another would be needed, or a Senate sub-panel would have to be eliminated, something almost impossible in light of how protective Senate subcommittee chairmen are of their fiefdoms.

"I'm told they're trying to get the House Appropriations subcommittees to match the subcommittees in the Senate," said Rep. Ed Pastor (D-Ariz.).

Pastor said the creation of at least one new subcommittee would create "a possibility for Serrano to be made whole."

Serrano, who had served as the ranking Democrat on the old Commerce, Justice, State and Judiciary subcommittee, lost his chance to become a subcommittee chairman because of the Republican alignment. He has since argued in private meetings with his colleagues that he should be given a new position because it's important to have at least one racial minority member wield an Appropriations gavel. Serrano is Hispanic.

One of the other Democrats to lose an Appropriations subcommittee two years ago was Rep. Chaka Fattah (D-Pa.), who is black. All Appropriations subcommittee ranking Democrats are white.

"I think it's important to have diversity," said Pastor.

Obey said he would not discuss changes until he is officially made chairman this week.

Democrats Stick With Seniority In Round One (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 6, 2006

As expected, seniority ruled the first round of selections for House committee chairmen yesterday afternoon, despite Democratic leaders' repeated insistence that seniority would be only one of many factors weighed in choosing panel leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0102851

In the first of what will be many decisions the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee will make in coming weeks, the panel met to select the chairmen of four "exclusive" committees: Appropriations, Ways and Means, Energy and Commerce and Financial Services. The leader of the fifth exclusive committee, Rules, is appointed by House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Although the results of yesterday's meeting were expected — Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.) will chair Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.) Energy and Commerce and Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) Financial Services — the gathering raised an obvious question among House Democrats: whether committee chairmen would cooperate with Democratic leaders or whether some would chart their own course on certain issues.

Frank said he did not foresee any differences.

"We've almost always worked together for the past two years, so I don't see why it will be any different," Frank said. "We have great cooperation, a lot of collegiality. We'll work together."

Pelosi was expected to appoint Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) as Rules Committee chairwoman and Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.) as Budget Committee chairman last night, with plans for the full caucus to ratify them today.

"We don't have any problems with that," Slaughter said, responding to a question about potential friction.

"Whatever message or direction leadership wants to move forward with, I'm comfortable with that," declared Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), expected chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

All incoming committee chairmen have fulfilled their member dues requirements to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, some paying much more than obligated. The two members vying to chair the Veterans Affairs Committee, Reps. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) and Mike Michaud (D-Maine), paid their $125,000 requirements. Veterans Affairs is the only disputed committee. The Steering Committee is expected to decide that contest by the end of the week.

Nearly all of the chairmanships will go to the Democratic member with the most seniority. Democrats have long held seniority in high regard and these decisions are unlikely to change that. In such an atmosphere, a member's dues payments or his or her overall political activity is less important. Frank said that dues were no factor at all in awarding chairmanships. More important, he said, was how a member had weighed in on key votes.

"There's more concern about voting record than giving record," he said.

But several years ago, Rep. Collin Peterson (D-Minn.) nearly missed becoming the ranking Democrat on the Agriculture Committee in part because he had failed to pay all his dues.

This year, Peterson paid all $200,000 of his requirement.

Democratic leaders hope to finish awarding chairmanships by week's end. The sooner they can dispense with the task, the better, Democratic sources said, since Democrats plan a flurry of activity when they formally take control of the chamber on Jan. 4.

"I have bad news for you. Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em," joked House Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) to reporters yesterday. "We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the fourth."

Hoyer said the House would conduct business Monday through Friday.

"Most weeks, yes, we will be working Monday, we will come in Monday at 6:30 [p.m.] and be working on Friday … until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon to give people time so they can get home," he said.

Black Caucus Ready To Flex Political Muscle (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

The Congressional Black Caucus today will announce its leadership team and agenda for the 110th Congress with Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, the group's chairman, expected to refocus on urban and poverty issues.

The Michigan Democrat, whose son Kwame Kilpatrick is mayor of Detroit, could be one of the most effective CBC chairman in 20 years because many caucus members are likely to lead key House committees -- Judiciary, Homeland Security, Administration, and Ways and Means.

DOJ_NMG_0102852

Almost every piece of legislation that Democrats bring to the House floor will have to pass the approval of a CBC member. The group, composed of Democrats, also will benefit from almost 17 subcommittee chairmanships and former CBC Chairman James E. Clyburn, South Carolina Democrat, as the House majority whip.

"The black caucus has an opportunity to raise the ante on its label as 'the conscience of the Congress' and will have the strength to deal with poverty issues; developing a better, more friendly relationship with Africa; criminal-justice issues; and the overwhelming work to be done in the Gulf region," said Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, who is expected to be elected as CBC whip.

Reps. Barbara Lee of California and Emanuel Cleaver II of Missouri will serve as the vice chairmen, and Rep. Danny K. Davis of Illinois, will be the secretary, said staffers and members who spoke with The Washington Times yesterday.

Mr. Cleaver said his top priority will be to push for an end to state election laws that require voters to present state-issued identification to vote, an issue that will be taken up by his CBC colleague, the next chairman of the House Administration Committee, Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald of California.

"Congressman Ike Skelton who lives in my metropolitan area couldn't vote because he showed up at the polls and didn't have a driver's license -- Ike has polio and can't use his arms and has no need for a license," Mr. Cleaver said, adding, "That kind of foolishness has to stop."

He said the public should expect the CBC leaders to move Democrats to address several issues, such as police misconduct, HIV/AIDS, mandatory minimum jail sentences and other issues that have been "ignored now for decades."

Mr. Cleaver said he soon expects the group to announce its legislative agenda for the first 100 hours of Congress to go in tandem with the issues House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has said will be done in that time.

The agenda is not likely to change much under the new leadership because almost every caucus member supported the agenda of the outgoing chairman, Rep. Melvin Watt, North Carolina Democrat, to end racial disparities in access to education, employment, incarceration rates and health care.

"He has created a wonderful platform for them and they are well-positioned to address issues that in many instances are considered privileges to some but for us in the CBC we consider civil rights," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Maryland Democrat and a past CBC chairman.

However, both he and Mr. Watt said the black caucus would be only as strong as its bonds with the leadership and the congressional Hispanic and Asian and Pacific Islander caucuses.

Mr. Cummings said that when he was chairman, the agendas of the black and Hispanic caucuses were identical with the exception of immigration.

"It was not on our core agenda when it started to gain resonance in the public debate, because it wasn't something that we really had to deal with," Mr. Watt said.

He said the group in the past year decided to work toward a common set of principles on immigration policy with the other minority caucuses that he expects the new leadership to advance.

"One of the primary tenets is a living wage for all workers, legal, illegal or otherwise," Mr. Watt said.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, who will be chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the second issue would be crafting an entry policy that is neither discriminatory based on race nor arbitrary based on country of origin.

House GOP Fixes Panel Term Limits (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Republicans renewed their six-year term limits on top committee posts yesterday, dealing a blow to three outgoing chairmen who lobbied for a rules change to head their respective panels in the minority.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) also withdrew his amendment to the party's internal rules that would allow ranking Republicans who are term-limited out of those posts to retain the chairman's gavel if the GOP returns to the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0102853

During the closed-door session in the Longworth House Office Building, Minority Leader-elect John Boehner (R-Ohio) instead agreed to create a review task force to study the impact of that change, members and staff present said.

Boehner agrees in principle with Rohrabacher's amendment, GOP leadership aides said, but would like to study it further before implementing the change.

Republicans are set to decide which members will head select panels during Steering Committee meetings today and tomorrow, and members of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC) will also decide their next chairman in a bruising race between Reps. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas) and Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.).

Tiahrt is the choice of the group's three remaining founders, but Hensarling scrambled to continue building support for his own campaign on the eve of today's election. One of the founders was rumored to be questioning Hensarling's record on immigration yesterday in calls to other members using misleading information, GOP aides said yesterday.

With Republicans set to decide the top committee posts this week, GOP leaders are not expected to decide individual committee slots until Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) determines the ratio of Republicans to Democrats on each panel. Her office has not yet notified the leaders of those ratios, and Republicans this week have not heard any timeline for those decisions to be made.

"No decision has been made yet," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

The biggest question regards members on the so-called "A" committees, with Energy and Commerce most likely to shed Republicans.

Republicans lost nine seats on the Ways and Means Committee and at least six on the Appropriations panel to either retirement or the election whereas three GOP lawmakers lost their reelection or retired from Energy and Commerce.

Meanwhile, there have been rumblings that incoming Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) would like to increase the size of the panel, according to lobbyists with work before the committee. A number of Republicans will soon make their case to the leaders and Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas), the presumed ranking Republican on that panel.

Republican rules prohibit members on an "A" committee from serving on any other panel, but at least eight Energy and Commerce members currently do, including Veterans Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer (R-Ind.) and Reps. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.), Vito Fossella (R-N.Y.), Paul Gillmor (R-Ohio), Ralph Hall (R-Texas), Charles Norwood (R-Ga.), George Radanovich (R-Calif.) and Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.).

Barton moved to force Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) off his panel a couple of years ago. But Wilson, a former Air Force officer, opted to resign from the Armed Services Committee and retained her spot on Energy and Commerce.

Boehner and a spokesman for the committee both said Barton and the leadership have not discussed enforcing the prohibition and will not address the issue until Pelosi determines the ratios.

Steering Committee members allowed Buyer to hold his seat on Energy and Commerce when he was named chairman two years ago, and he expects the committee to make a similar decision this year.

At the time, Rep. John McHugh (R-N.Y.) asked Buyer if he would stay on Energy and Commerce if he assumed the Veterans Affairs chairmanship, but Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who had just forced Rep. Chris Smith (R-N.J.) to retire his gavel on that panel in favor of the Indiana Republican, told committee members there would not be a problem with Buyer retaining his membership on the powerful A committee, Buyer said yesterday.

Stearns also would like to remain on Veterans Affairs and believes his status as a veteran along with waning interest in the committee itself should allow him to hold both posts.

"I would like to retain my seniority on the Veterans Affairs Committee and to continue to build upon my successes for veterans, and I will make that case to Mr. Barton," Stearns said in a statement e-mailed by his office.

The closest decisions during this week's Steering Committee meeting should be in the races to determine the top spots on Budget, Financial Services, International Relations and Transportation and Infrastructure. Republicans have been campaigning for these slots for much of the last Congress because each panel's chairman was set to be term-limited out of the top spot.

The committee will also decide the ranking slots on Judiciary, Resources, Science, Small Business and Ways and Means.

DOJ_NMG_0102854

Outgoing Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who had lobbied to retain the top spot on that committee, will make his case to the Steering Committee this week to once again be the top GOP member on the Science Committee. He served as chairman for four years before winning the Judiciary gavel.

House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young (R-Alaska) and House Small Business Committee Chairman Don Manzullo (R-Ill.) had also pushed to retain their senior Republican posts.

Republicans want to settle these committee decisions as soon as possible so that the ranking members can determine their staffs in time to combat Democrats during the rollout of their priority legislation during their first 100 hours in power.

"Anytime there is a transfer of power, you have a challenge in continuity," Buyer said, adding committees need to staff up in an attempt to stifle Democratic momentum.

Dems Split On Extent Of Ethics Changes (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — A senator and spouse spend several days in Asia, their airfare, meals and hotel bills paid for by a trade association. Former lawmakers who work as lobbyists use a taxpayer-owned gym reserved for members of Congress. Several House members catch a ride on a corporate jet, avoiding long airport lines but paying only a fraction of the flight's cost.

These are the kind of perks enjoyed by current and former members of Congress that could end under a package of ethics changes Democratic leaders intend to push when they assume control of Congress in January. But less than a month after sweeping into office on the promise of a major ethics overhaul, Democrats are divided over just how much change is needed.

Several Democrats, citing the corruption scandals that beset Congress in the past year, want tougher standards than their leaders have proposed. The major points of contention: Whether lawmakers should police themselves and how much to clamp down on earmarks, the special projects that lawmakers, often anonymously, insert into spending bills to benefit hometown or special interests.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., said there's no doubt an ethics bill will pass Congress. "The question is: Will it be as strong and comprehensive as it should be?"

Lieberman was among a small, bipartisan coalition of lawmakers who on Tuesday promised a broad array of changes. Specifically, they backed the creation of an Office of Public Integrity to launch and carry out ethics probes. That power now resides with the House and Senate ethics committees, which the lawmakers slammed as failing to act on corruption charges.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., has proposed an ethics enforcement commission with similar powers.

Getting an independent watchdog will be a "very tough battle," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a non-partisan group pushing ethics changes. But "if they don't address the ethics enforcement process, they will have failed in a major way to address the ethics problems in Congress."

Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has pledged to make changes to ethics rules the first order of business when the new Congress convenes. Under a proposal she unveiled this year, Democrats would eliminate a wide array of lobbying practices — from banning lobbyist-funded travel and gifts to barring former lawmakers-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and the members-only gym. The proposal would require greater public disclosure of some earmarks.

The stakes are high for Democrats and Pelosi, who pledged to deliver "the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history" in the wake of corruption scandals that led to investigations of several lawmakers and prison terms for Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Polls show widespread concern. In a USA TODAY/Gallup national poll taken Oct.6-8, 86% of adults said corruption in government would be "extremely" or "very important" in their votes for Congress. Only 46% of adults polled after the election (Nov. 9-12) said Democrats were likely to curb corruption. The polls had a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

In a recent memo to colleagues, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who oversaw campaign efforts for House Democrats, said failing to deliver ethics reforms "would be devastating to our standing with the public and … jeopardize some of our marginal seats."

DOJ_NMG_0102855

Emanuel and Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., are pushing for an outright ban on earmarks that would benefit lawmakers or their families or the companies and lobbying firms that employ the relatives of House members.

The existing Pelosi bill does not go that far. It requires lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks in their congressional districts and to declare in writing whether they have a financial interest in the project.

Emanuel, a member of the Democratic leadership, predicted that the final proposal would require earmarks "to have a public purpose, not a private or personal gain."

Creation of an independent body to investigate ethics is more controversial. "Members are almost paranoid about letting anyone else into the (ethics) process," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution.

Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said an independent panel is part of discussions, but said, "the ethics committee when it functions, does do its job overseeing members."

Jan Baran, a Washington lawyer and ethics expert, said he believes that ethics reform will pass in the new Congress. "The issue is how will people behave two, three, five years from now," he said.

Liberal Coalition Eyes First Hundred Hours (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

A large group of liberal organizations is planning to wage a national lobbying and public relations campaign to press for passage of the House Democrats' legislative agenda next year, taking a page from longtime corporate practices.

The Change America Now coalition, or CAN, met yesterday at AFL-CIO headquarters to outline the many methods it will use -- including the release of research papers and e-mail and phone bombardment of Congress.

The goal is to persuade on-the-fence lawmakers in more than 80 congressional districts to vote for the "Hundred Hours" agenda, a list of legislation that Democrats hope to approve in the first 100 legislative hours of the new Congress. The agenda includes an increase in the minimum wage and an effort to reduce the cost of Medicare prescription drugs.

The campaign will largely target Republican moderates and Republicans who were narrowly elected in November. The group's leaders said they hope to increase the margin of victory for each plank of the platform in the House to boost the measures' prospects in the Senate -- a much harder place for them to succeed. In addition, they said early wins will make it easier for each organization to persuade Congress later to approve other elements of their own legislative wish lists.

"Groups on the progressive side support the priorities that are represented in the Hundred Hours agenda and we want to see them enacted," said Bill Samuel, the AFL-CIO's legislative director.

Robert L. Borosage, co-director of the liberal Campaign for America's Future, said that approval of the Hundred Hours agenda would also help the public better understand what the incoming Democratic majority stands for. "We are still too undefined," he said, and the Hundred Hours agenda "begins that process" of redefinition.

The 40-member coalition's other major organizers are Americans United, USAction, and labor unions led by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, he said.

Yesterday morning, at a regular, biweekly meeting of liberal organizations called the Tuesday Group, about 100 people packed a conference room to hear the coalition's strategy. Representatives of many groups that were instrumental in electing Democrats to Congress this year were there, including the Sierra Club, the League of Conservation Voters, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America, the Center for American Progress and several women's organizations.

The effort they discussed was reminiscent of the elaborate business-backed lobbying campaign 12 years ago that pushed the "Contract With America," which was the then-Republican majority's legislative agenda. Conservative groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Christian Coalition banded together then to lobby the House to pass the GOP's 10-part program.

The meeting was also an echo of a conservatives' gathering that started in 1993 and continues to this day, hosted by Grover G. Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. Norquist's weekly "Wednesday Meeting" routinely attracts 150 people and is a forum for discussing ways to bolster conservative policies.

Hickey said the liberals' Tuesday Group was designed to counter a government "dominated by the special interests." In response, Norquist said: "So says the guy from the trial lawyers, the labor unions and the radical environmentalists. The Democratic Party is a collection of special interests."

Culture Shock On Capitol Hill: House To Work 5 Days A Week (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Forget the minimum wage. Or outsourcing jobs overseas. The labor issue most on the minds of members of Congress yesterday was their own: They will have to work five days a week starting in January.

The horror.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who will become House majority leader and is writing the schedule for the next Congress, said members should expect longer hours than the brief week they have grown accustomed to.

"I have bad news for you," Hoyer told reporters. "Those trips you had planned in January, forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January, starting with the 4th."

The reporters groaned. "I know, it's awful, isn't it?" Hoyer empathized.

For lawmakers, it is awful, compared with what they have come to expect. For much of this election year, the legislative week started late Tuesday and ended by Thursday afternoon -- and that was during the relatively few weeks the House wasn't in recess.

Next year, members of the House will be expected in the Capitol for votes each week by 6:30 p.m. Monday and will finish their business about 2 p.m. Friday, Hoyer said.

With the new calendar, the Democrats are trying to project a businesslike image when they take control of Congress in January. House and Senate Democratic leaders have announced an ambitious agenda for their first 100 hours and say they are adamant about scoring legislative victories they can trumpet in the 2008 campaigns.

Hoyer and other Democratic leaders say they are trying to repair the image of Congress, which was so anemic this year it could not meet a basic duty: to approve spending bills that fund government. By the time the gavel comes down on the 109th Congress on Friday, members will have worked a total of 103 days. That's seven days fewer than the infamous "Do-Nothing Congress" of 1948.

Hoyer said members can bid farewell to extended holidays, the kind that awarded them six weekdays to relax around Memorial Day, when most Americans get a single day off. He didn't mention the month-long August recess, the two-week April recess or the weeks off in February, March and July.

He said members need to spend more time in the Capitol to pass laws and oversee federal agencies. "We are going to meet sufficient times, so the committees can do their jobs on behalf of the American people," he said.

For lawmakers within a reasonable commute of Washington, longer weeks are not a burden -- although they are likely to cut into members' fundraising and campaigning activities. But for members from Alaska and Hawaii, the West Coast, or rural states, the new schedule will mean less time at home and more stress.

"Keeping us up here eats away at families," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who typically flies home on Thursdays and returns to Washington on Tuesdays. "Marriages suffer. The Democrats could care less about families -- that's what this says."

Time away from Washington is just as important to being an effective member of Congress as time spent in the Capitol, Kingston added. "When I'm here, people call me Mr. Congressman. When I'm home, people call me 'Jack, you stupid SOB, why did you vote that way?' It keeps me grounded."

Rep. Elton Gallegly (R-Calif.), who had intended to retire this year, only to be persuaded to run again, wondered whether the new schedule was more than symbolic. "If we're doing something truly productive, that's one thing," he said. "If it's smoke-and-mirrors hoopla, that's another."

Senate leaders have not set their schedule, but the upper chamber generally works a longer week than the House, though important votes or hearings are usually not scheduled on Mondays or Fridays.

DOJ_NMG_0102857

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), one of the architects of the lighter workweek, put the best Republican face on Hoyer's new schedule.

"They've got a lot more freshmen then we do," he said of the Democrats. "That schedule will make it incredibly difficult for those freshmen to establish themselves in their districts. So we're all for it."

The new schedule poses a headache for Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D-Fla.), who runs her 7-year-old daughter's Brownie troop meetings on Monday afternoons in Weston, Fla. "I'll have to talk to the other mothers and see if we can move it to the weekend," she said.

Setting a calendar that satisfies 435 members is impossible, said the current majority leader, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who will become minority leader in January. "Between the travel issues, the members' work schedules, the family and district issues, it was a Rubik's cube," he said.

But most Democrats, some still giddy from their election victories, seemed game.

"It's long overdue," said Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), who lives in Napa Valley and will have to leave his home at 3 a.m. on Sundays to catch a flight to Washington in time for work Mondays. "I didn't come here to turn around and go back home."

Staff writer Jonathan Weisman contributed to this report.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Bonior and Edwards

Former Rep. David E. Bonior, a one-time leader in Congress who has close ties to labor unions, has signed on to manage a future John Edwards presidential campaign.

Mr. Edwards hasn't announced a repeat of his 2004 presidential bid yet, but an Edwards adviser said last week that Mr. Bonior will manage the effort if Mr. Edwards decides to run. In the meantime, Mr. Bonior has signed on as a senior adviser to Mr. Edwards' leadership PAC, the One America Committee, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Bonior represented Detroit's northern suburbs for 26 years in the House, rising to be the No. 2 Democrat before stepping down in 2002 for an unsuccessful campaign for Michigan governor. Mr. Bonior was a leading advocate for labor unions, a constituency that Mr. Edwards has aggressively been courting.

No mercy

With Republicans on Capitol Hill trying to spend like Democrats and Democrats trying to be as tough as Republicans in the war on terror, the grand difference between the two parties may come down to a matter of scheduling, reports Charles Hurt of The Washington Times.

Republicans prefer to keep lawmakers out of Washington, since that's usually where they do all the damage, and Democrats want members chained to their desks so they can churn out innumerable pages of new federal laws.

"It is appropriate that the do-nothing Congress is ending by doing nothing," incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said yesterday, discussing this final week's slim agenda.

"I have bad news for you," the Maryland Democrat said. "Those trips you had planned in January? Forget 'em. We will be working almost every day in January."

In a roomful of reporters who have grown accustomed to short workweeks and bankers' hours under Republican rule, the groans were audible.

Then, he laid out the Democratic vision for five-day workweeks as far as the eye can see.

"Monday through Friday?" asked one stunned reporter.

"You will not be excited about it," Mr. Hoyer observed.

"You sound like the principal," complained another reporter.

"I know," Mr. Hoyer said. "It's awful, isn't it? I presumably have some authority over the schedule, and I don't like it."

Faux centrists

DOJ_NMG_0102858

"Here comes the 2008 presidential cycle, and on cue, Associated Press reporters are finding 'centrists' in the race whose voting records are NOT a 50-50 mishmash of conservative and liberal," the Media Research Center's Tim Graham writes at www.mrc.org.

"This cycle's 'centrist' contenders are Hillary Clinton (actually strongly, staunchly liberal) and Evan Bayh (liberal most of the time.)

"In a Monday dispatch, AP reporter Beth Fouhy stressed that Hillary Clinton won 'even the most conservative areas of her adopted home state of New York,' but there are drawbacks: 'Despite her centrist six-year Senate voting record, Clinton's reputation remains deeply rooted in her polarizing eight years as first lady.' "

"AP does the same for Sen. Evan Bayh ... 'The 50-year-old senator has charted a centrist's course throughout his political career, including two terms as governor and eight years in the Senate.'

"But the American Conservative Union's voting index doesn't match these assessments. Sen. Bayh's lifetime ACU rating is 21 percent conservative, so he votes the liberal position about four of every five Senate votes they've counted. Hillary Clinton has a lifetime ACU rating of 9 percent, or 91 percent liberal. In 2005, Bayh was a 20. Hillary was a 12.

"Or consult Americans with Democratic Action, the liberal vote-counters. Did they find Evan and Hillary in the center? On their 2005 tally, Hillary Clinton is one of 22 'Senate Heroes' who scored a perfect 100 percent with the liberal group. Evan Bayh scored a less-than-centrist 95."

Still spending

The Senate Budget Committee chairman yesterday chastised his party for trying to tack big-ticket spending items onto end-of-the-year legislation, even though November's election sent a clear message about the need for fiscal discipline, reports Amy Fagan of The Washington Times.

"One of the messages out of the last election was that they expected Congress to be fiscally responsible, especially Republicans," said Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican and outgoing budget panel chairman. He said he hopes Republicans can stick to responsible budgeting in these waning days of their majority rule. "If we can't have it now, when can we have it?" he told reporters in a briefing yesterday.

Specifically, Mr. Gregg is concerned that Republicans are adding a $4.8 billion disaster-relief package for farmers to the agriculture spending bill, without cutting agriculture spending in other areas -- a move he called "excessive, inappropriate" and "a payoff" to farm groups.

He also said there is talk of adding extra items to a popular package of tax-cut extensions that lawmakers are trying to approve this week. Among the items that could catch a ride on the tax-cut bill is a proposal to overhaul the program that provides health care benefits to retired coal miners, which would cost about $4 billion in extra spending, Mr. Gregg said.

Viguerie's lament

Richard A. Viguerie, author of "Conservatives Betrayed: How George W. Bush and Other Big Government Republicans Hijacked the Conservative Cause," yesterday bemoaned the resignation of John R. Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations:

"There are only a mere handful of conservatives in significant policy-making positions in the Bush Administration. The withdrawal of Ambassador Bolton means there is one less," Mr. Viguerie said. "This is very discouraging to conservatives. Instead of fighting for Ambassador Bolton's confirmation, the Bush administration has once again thrown in the towel."

Bayh's step

Sen. Evan Bayh, Indiana Democrat, announced yesterday that he has formed a presidential exploratory committee.

Mr. Bayh filed federal papers that allow him to raise money and hire staff for a White House run. He is the second Democrat to take a formal step toward a run, after Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack's official announcement of his candidacy last week.

Mr. Bayh, who has been traveling to states with early nominating contests and gauging support for a presidential run for more than a year, said he would make a final decision early next month.

'Full-scale' Sam

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, billed himself as a "full-scale conservative" yesterday as he courted activists in the state that holds the nation's first caucuses, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0102859

Mr. Brownback said the lessons Republicans should take from their November election defeats is that they face enormous trouble when the party's conservative base isn't energized.

"Our ideas weren't repudiated; our execution was," he told Linn County Republicans in a trip to Iowa. "Our base was lethargic because of too much spending and the Washington corruption cases."

Mr. Brownback filed papers Monday creating an exploratory committee allowing him to travel the country and raise money for a possible 2008 White House run.

Trio From Hill Ask GSA Head Not To Shift Audit Burden (WP)

By Scott Higham And Robert O'harrow Jr.

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Three federal lawmakers yesterday called on the new administrator of the General Services Administration to halt her plan to replace government auditors in the agency's inspector general's office with private auditors, saying in a letter that the change could lead to less oversight of contractors.

The letter to GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan followed a report in The Washington Post on Saturday that described Doan's plans to cut $5 million in spending on audits and shift responsibility for contract reviews to small, private contractors.

Doan, a former government contractor, recently compared GSA Inspector General Brian D. Miller and his staff to terrorists, according to notes of a meeting taken by GSA officials. Doan has said vendors and government workers reported that Miller's investigators and auditors exerted "undue pressure" on them.

Yesterday, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.) and Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) asked Doan to provide a description of her plans and a "detailed analysis of its potential effects" before she moves forward with any changes or budget cuts that would affect the inspector general's work.

"You seem to be reversing the commitments of your predecessor, contradicting the recommendations of GAO, and tampering with a system that works well, all to alleviate the 'stress' of corporations that have attempted to overcharge the taxpayer," the letter said.

Kudos For Those Who Do Good Works Overseas (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Back in the day, there was naught for a diplomatic spouse to do but bake and complain. But that was then: Yesterday, five State Department employees and spouses were recognized for charitable works abroad -- and two of them were men.

Every year, beside the holiday trees in the stately Benjamin Franklin Room on the department's eighth floor, Associates of the American Foreign Service Worldwide present the Secretary of State's Awards for Volunteerism Overseas, a mouthful of a prize for State employees and spouses whose pro bono goodwill benefits their host countries.

The awardees "symbolize the very best of our American diplomats and their families," said State Department Director General George M. Staples, on hand to present the awards. "They are a tribute to the generosity of the American spirit."

The AAFSW, whose "W" used to stand for "women," was founded in 1960 to advocate for better conditions for diplomatic spouses. (In a clue to those conditions, one of its publications was titled "What Do I Do Now?") Today the group sponsors educational programs, scholarships, online resources and the awards.

This year's uber-volunteers included spouses, full-timers or both.

Steven Carroll, posted to Kabul for a year, dove into Afghanistan's refugee community. After collecting clothes and money from American children for the city's orphanages, he delivered the loot in an armored car.

In Seoul, Kathy Hansen, an employed diplomatic family member, worked for a long list of schools and churches and seemed bent on providing blankets for babies. She also helped finance the adoption of Korean, Chinese and Vietnamese children.

Marian McGowan is a diplomatic spouse and a pillar of Jackie's House, a home for 36 abused, neglected and abandoned children in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic. Beyond food and supplies, McGowan and her volunteers taught the children to write, speak English and mentor the youngest among them.

A full-time embassy employee in Swaziland, where AIDS affects more than 40 percent of the population, Nelda Villines found time to visit scores of schools and hospitals, distributing food, supplies and 3,000 teddy bears made by U.S. volunteers.

Thomas Yazdgerdi, a political officer in Athens, used his time and clout to help Greece's needy immigrants, who are often subject to discrimination by in-country assistance groups. Yazdgerdi also helped renovate a multicultural day-care center and organized a benefit concert in Greece that raised $100,000 for those left homeless by Hurricane Katrina.

A Commission Made In Heaven (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Forget the Baker-Hamilton commission. I have high hopes for the Clinton-McCain Commission to Fix Social Security. Haven't heard of it? Actually, neither have Hillary Clinton and John McCain. It's my long-shot scheme for tackling the problem.

First, if not now, when? Third-rail political issues such as Social Security benefit from -- maybe even require -- divided government, to share the blame. They can't be touched in an election year. They're difficult to do during a president's first term, if he -- or she -- wants a second. So 2007 offers the last, best hope for some time.

Second, if not Social Security, then what? The political system right now is too broken, and relations between President Bush and congressional Democrats too frayed, to deal with the truly daunting entitlement issues, Medicare and Medicaid. Social Security is entitlement reform on training wheels.

Third, if not them, who? As the front-runners for their parties' presidential nominations, Sens. Clinton (D-N.Y.) and McCain (R-Ariz.) have a shared interest in getting Social Security off the presidential plate before January 2009.

Clinton and McCain have a track record of bipartisan cooperation; working together on Social Security would only serve to burnish a credential that voters seem to crave. By teaming up, they could neutralize Social Security as a general election issue -- neither could use it as a cudgel against the other. Both have expertise in this area without having burrowed into a rigid ideological framework.

Wouldn't each risk attack from rivals for the nomination? Yes, but the counter-argument is that voters will reward gutsiness and bipartisanship. So the short-term political benefits could offset -- if not outweigh -- the potential costs.

For McCain, the political peril is probably less than for Clinton, since his party hasn't made it a near article of faith that benefits can't be cut, retirement ages raised, payroll taxes diverted to private accounts, etc. He has more leeway to embrace alternatives.

For Clinton, the stakes are admittedly higher, but so is the upside. Sure, it's easy to imagine the ominous narration, "Hillary Clinton wants to slash checks for seniors," over the picture of a crying grandma. But some of Clinton's potential opponents serve in the Senate and might be swept along with the momentum of a bipartisan plan. And Clinton could use boldness on Social Security to combat her image as an overly careful, overly poll-driven calculator.

A bigger-tent commission -- Clinton-McCain-Romney-Obama? -- would be just fine, too.

So how to launch? The president should issue an order creating the commission, announce, LBJ-style, that he wants Clinton and McCain at the helm, and impose a tight deadline -- six months at most. That sounds short, but the potential fixes and trade-offs are well known, and, politically, there's little time to spare.

Then he should set up the commission in a way that's doubly tilted against him.

For one, he should forswear any preconditions, which seems to be where the administration is already heading. There's no harm to the administration in dropping its focus on private accounts funded out of payroll taxes--that's the political reality. On taxes, similarly, there's not much to fear: The president's already opened the door to increasing the ceiling on payroll taxes, and the new Democratic majority will be wary of looking like rabid tax-hikers.

More than that, Bush should give Democrats a structural advantage. In a twist on the Greenspan Social Security commission, the president would appoint five members from the executive branch or private life; the Senate majority leader would pick five from among sitting senators or private citizens; and the speaker of the House would similarly name five. But, as with the Greenspan commission, two out of each five would have to be from the opposite party. This would create a commission of eight Democrats and seven Republicans, and drive the membership in a centrist direction.

Why would the president stack the deck against himself? Because he'd be giving Democrats an offer they couldn't afford to refuse -- or be perceived as refusing. Democrats couldn't complain about being rolled by a Republican-dominated panel. Given the toxic level of distrust between the administration and congressional Democrats, it may be the only way to get action. And Bush could protect himself against Democrats Gone Wild by requiring a supermajority of the panel to agree on recommendations.

As it happens, the 25th anniversary of the executive order creating the Greenspan commission is Dec. 16. That would be a nice touch, too. And, Mr. President, senators, consider this headline that ran in The Post 16 months after the Greenspan panel was created: "President, on a Note of Bipartisanship, Signs Social Security Bill." Not a bad end to a troubled presidency -- or a bad launching pad for a new one.

Dark Ages Disclosure (WP)

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

THR EE YEARS AGO we wrote an editorial using the headline above. It decried the senseless and costly loophole under which people running for the Senate -- alone among federal political candidates and committees -- aren't required to file campaign finance reports electronically. In an age when such reports can be filed with the click of a mouse, Senate candidates submit their disclosures on paper, with weeks of delay before they are transferred to a form available and searchable on the Internet. As a result, in the final stretch of campaigns, anyone interested in learning who is bankrolling Senate candidates or how they are spending the cash has to go page by page through voluminous reports. This delay is so obviously unjustified that we expected the legal glitch to be quickly fixed.

Naive us. Three years later, the situation remains unaddressed. According to the Campaign Finance Institute, as late as the week before Election Day, in all 10 of the most closely followed Senate races, no detailed information was available online about contributions between Oct. 1 and Oct. 18, the last filing period before the election. For six candidates in those races -- Democrats Ned Lamont (Conn.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.) and Sheldon Whitehouse (R.I.), and Republicans Mike DeWine (Ohio), Rick Santorum (Pa.) and Thomas H. Kean Jr. (N.J.) -- the only financial information available was from before June 30.

It would be easy to change the rule, and the Senate should do so in the final days of the 109th Congress. More than 20 senators, of both parties, have signed on to S.1508, the Senate Campaign Disclosure Parity Act. If any senator opposes requiring electronic filing, none is willing to say so. Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who was rumored to be opposed to the change, says he is for it. Senate Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.), whose panel has jurisdiction in this area, said three years ago that it was "part of honesty in elections, I think. Make it accessible." Now what's needed is for Mr. Lott to get committee members' approval to speed the matter to the Senate floor.

To put it bluntly: Republicans, why let the new Democratic majority get credit for making this obvious fix? Do it now, while you're still in charge.

Take The Schumer Train (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

You would think the last thing Senate Republicans would want to do in their final lame-duck days this week is approve a new $682 million subsidy gift to Senator Chuck Schumer, the New York Democrat who just cleaned their electoral clocks.

No hard feelings. GOP tax writers are preparing to award Mr. Schumer this money for "transportation infrastructure projects." One of the projects to be funded: a new train from Manhattan to John F. Kennedy Airport. Why people in Oshkosh or Olympia should have to pay for this urban choochoo is a mystery.

What makes this project especially objectionable is the creative financing conjured up to pay for it. This earmark hangs like a Christmas ornament from a must-pass bill to extend certain annual tax credits. And how's this for a misnomer? The subsidy is called the "New York Liberty Zone Tax Credit." Here's how it would work: New York would receive up to $2 billion over 10 years (about $1.3 billion of which is September 11 money, for a net new subsidy of $682 million).

Of course, New York City doesn't pay federal taxes, so this bill allows the Big Apple to retain the employer share of the payroll taxes that the city collects on behalf of its public employees. And through some accounting sleight of hand, Treasury would reimburse the Social Security trust fund for the missing dollars. The result: a new $2 billion hole in the budget. Our Congressional sources say this is the first time this kind of tax credit has been provided for a city or state to pay for infrastructure pork.

Imagine the precedent this sets for Democrats preparing to take over the subsidy levers next year. Congressmen in both parties are already lining up to adopt the "New York model" for securing tax pork. Get ready for the Des Moines "Freedom Tax Credit" for wheat and corn production. The whole process is so underhanded that Senator Jim DeMint of South Carolina has declared he will hold up the tax bill if the credit isn't removed. Just what Congress needs: new forms of chicanery to raid the Treasury.

OTHER NEWS:

Where Is The Economy Headed? (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The U.S. economy can't seem to make up its mind.

It keeps showing strength and weakness, with fresh data yesterday providing still more mixed signals -- and fueling a debate over whether the housing slump is dragging the nation into a recession.

The conflicting data could be a sign that the economy is turning, with what was at first a mild growth slowdown about to give way to a harsher downturn, some analysts said. But others echoed the Federal Reserve, countering that the worst news is still coming from businesses involved in housing and automobile production while the rest of the economy is holding up.

The situation has left many investors confused and queasy; stock prices rose yesterday after falling Friday, as did the dollar.

"No question, housing is in a recession," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist for Global Insight, an economic research and forecasting firm. "The big question, and where people part ways, is how much effect is this going to have on consumer spending and business spending? . . . Yes, there are scary parts of the economy, but there are other parts that are doing okay."

The pessimists could point yesterday to the Commerce Department's report that new orders to U.S. factories fell 4.7 percent in October, the steepest decline in six years. Much of that reflected falling demand for home-building equipment and materials, as well as automakers' production cuts, analysts said. That echoed a report released Friday showing that manufacturing declined in November.

But optimists noted that the much larger service sector of the economy -- which includes health care, finance, education, travel and entertainment, accounting for 87 percent of the nation's economic output -- grew more briskly in November than in the month before, according to an index published yesterday by the Institute for Supply Management.

Stocks rose yesterday because of that report's "favorable implications for the overall economy," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist with PNC Financial Services Group.

The economy also headed into the last three months of the year in better health than previously thought, the Labor Department said yesterday, raising its estimate of productivity growth in the July-through-September period.

Growth in productivity -- output per hour of labor -- still slowed sharply from the second quarter, to a weak 0.2 percent annual rate in the third quarter, the department said. But that was higher than its earlier estimate of no growth.

The recent figures all confirm that the economy has lost momentum this year, expanding at a rapid 5.6 percent annual rate in the first three months, at a moderate 2.6 percent pace in the second quarter and at a 2.2 percent pace in the third.

Many economists, including those at the Fed, think growth will be even weaker in the last three months of the year. For example, Macroeconomic Advisers, a St. Louis forecasting firm, predicts that the economy will expand at about a 1.5 percent annual rate in the October-through-December period.

The disagreement is over what comes next.

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said last week that he foresees moderate economic growth over the next year. Analysts peg that somewhere between a 1 and a 2.6 percent pace, which would be slower than the economy's long-term average.

Bernanke sounded "a little over-optimistic" but not far off, Behravesh said.

DOJ_NMG_0102863

"I don't think there is going to be a recession next year," Behravesh said, noting that housing accounts for only about 6 percent of the economy -- enough to slow growth significantly but not stop it.

On the contrary, he said, consumers are spending more because of low 4.4 percent unemployment, decent income growth, rising stock wealth and lower fuel prices. And businesses are exporting more goods to faster-growing economies overseas.

"All the bad signals coming out have to do with housing, and to a lesser extent autos," he said. "Basically, the rest of the economy is giving out reasonably good signals."

Others foresee a darker picture next year, in which consumers pull back more sharply on spending because of rising unemployment, heavy debt and falling home prices.

"I do think in the first part of next year we'll have a recession, and it could be a difficult one," said Charles W. McMillion, chief economist at MBG Information Services, an economic consultancy.

McMillion pointed to the Labor Department's drastic lowering of its estimates of workers' wages and benefits in the spring and summer. According to the figures released yesterday, hourly compensation rose at a 2.6 percent annual rate in the third quarter, down from its earlier estimate of 3.7 percent growth. And the department said compensation fell at a 1.2 percent pace in the second quarter, a reversal of its earlier estimate of 6.6 percent growth.

To financial markets, those figures looked like good news because stronger productivity growth and weaker compensation gains mean less inflationary pressure. That bolstered expectations that the Fed will hold interest rates steady at its policymaking meeting next week, and maybe lower them next year.

But McMillion said consumers and the economy are likely to buckle in coming months. "Stagnant productivity and falling wages is not a healthy combination," he said.

Service Sector Aids Economic Outlook (WT)

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

From combined dispatches

Economic growth in the vast service sector picked up last month, while productivity growth and labor costs performed better this summer than earlier estimated, according to economic reports out yesterday.

Activity in services accelerated in November, indicating that the economy was able to shake off the effects of a deep housing slump more easily than many economists expected, according to a report from the Institute for Supply Management.

The rise in the institute's service index to 58.9 from 57.1 in October contrasted with a fall into recession territory in the organization's closely watched manufacturing index reported on Friday, and provided a positive offset to a spate of weak economic news last week.

"The reports of the economy's demise may have been premature," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors. "It still does not look as if the problems in housing and motor vehicles have spread into the general economy."

Many economists had expected the services index to decline to 55.5. Readings above 50 indicate an expansion in industries such as retailing, banking and construction.

In a reminder that manufacturing remains a question mark, the Commerce Department reported yesterday that orders to U.S. factories plunged 4.7 percent in October, the third decline in the past four months, and the biggest drop in more than six years. The manufacturing sector is experiencing the fallout from this year's slowdown in the overall economy and slumps in auto sales and home construction.

"The overall economy is nowhere near as weak as the manufacturing sector," said John Ryding, chief U.S. economist at Bear Stearns Cos. "It is worth noting that this index is not just a services index, but also includes construction. The improvement in conditions, therefore, took place despite pressures on residential construction and sales."

On another upbeat note, growth in worker productivity was better than previously reported, growing at a 0.2 percent pace rather than staying flat in the third quarter, according to the Labor Department.

Labor costs, including wages and benefits, were lower during the quarter -- rising 2.3 percent rather than 3.8 percent, as earlier reported, the department said.

DOJ_NMG_0102864

While rising wages are good news for workers, the increases could fuel unwanted inflation when they outstrip the growth in productivity, or the output per hour of work.

Economists said the productivity news is likely to ease inflation worries at the Federal Reserve, where officials had cited the Labor Department's earlier reading showing a big jump in labor costs as a reason the Fed must be vigilant against inflation.

"Based on these numbers, the Fed can rest easy about the threat of inflation," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a private forecasting firm. "The only debate now seems to be about when the Fed will cut" interest rates.

If inflation remains benign and the overall economy continues to show weakness, the central bank might move as soon as March to start cutting rates, he said.

Despite frequently voiced concerns about stubborn inflation pressures, the Fed paused in its two-year rate-raising campaign in August and has left rates unchanged since then. Most analysts expect the Fed to stay on hold at a meeting of its rate-setting committee next week. Speculation in the financial markets has centered on whether the Fed will have a change of heart and start cutting rates early next year.

The hope that yesterday's better inflation news will help quell the Fed's concerns combined with the unexpectedly strong reading on the service economy to spark a rally on Wall Street yesterday. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points to 12,332.

Labor Costs, Revised Downward, Point To Less Inflation Pressure (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

U.S. labor costs have been rising at a much slower rate this year than previously thought, suggesting the nation's tight labor market is less likely to stoke inflation in the months ahead.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that unit labor costs in the nonfarm business sector -- a measure of how much employees are paid to produce a single unit of output -- rose at an annualized rate of 2.3% in the third quarter, considerably less than its earlier estimate of 3.8%. In addition, the department said unit labor costs fell at a 2.4% rate during the second quarter, rather than growing at the originally estimated 5.4% pace.

The changes reflect a decline in employee compensation in the second quarter and a much slower rate of compensation growth in the third quarter, indicating that businesses are feeling less pressure to raise prices. That is particularly good news, many economists said, because the competitive labor market has recently emerged as the biggest driver of cost increases.

"With energy and commodity prices having receded from their peaks, labor costs now represent the most significant source of potential inflation pressures for the U.S. economy," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial Services Group.

That is especially true now, with the unemployment rate at an unusually low 4.4%, but many economists expect inflationary pressures from the labor market to weaken in the months ahead because of slower economic growth.

Yesterday's report showed that nonfarm business-sector productivity is also ebbing. Productivity, or output per hour worked, increased at an annualized rate of 0.2% in the third quarter, slightly above the initial estimate of no change but down from a 1.2% gain in the second quarter. The economy's current weak patch is largely the result of the slumping housing market and auto sector, which is also damping overall manufacturing activity. A separate report from the Commerce Department yesterday found that factory orders plunged 4.7% in October, the sharpest fall in six years.

In other areas, however, the economy is humming along. Another indication of its vigor came in a report from the Institute for Supply Management, a private group of corporate purchasing managers, that said the nonmanufacturing portion of the economy continues to expand at a rapid clip. The ISM's index of nonmanufacturing activity rose to 58.9 in November from 57.1 in October. Readings over 50 indicate expansion. The ISM said last week that its manufacturing index for November indicated the sector is contracting for the first time in more than three years.

Fed Is Hampered By Past In Effort To Sound Warning (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102865

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials -- unlike bond investors -- think the economy is a lot sounder today than at the end of 2000 and in early 2001, when the Fed abruptly reversed course and began a string of interest-rate cuts.

Yet Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke's effort to convey the message that today's conditions are different is hampered by the Fed's lack of candor back in 2000.

Fed officials, who have universally voiced concerns about inflation, are expected to keep short-term interest rates steady at 5.25% at their policy meeting next Tuesday. But bond markets have priced in a small chance of a rate cut next week and three one-quarter percentage-point cuts over the next 12 months.

Markets anticipate those cuts in part because they see parallels to 2000. A technology-stock and investment bust began to unfold in the summer of that year, yet in November the Fed still said its principal concern was inflation, not economic growth. Seven weeks later, with stock prices tumbling and businesses canceling investment plans, the Fed made the first of 13 interest-rate cuts.

Like stock prices then, housing prices today are turning down after a long run-up. But there is little sign the decline has spilled over into the rest of the economy. Stock prices are up, not down. Officials acknowledge recent data have been weak, especially for manufacturing and commercial construction, and they are expected to closely scrutinize the November jobs report, to be released Friday.

The weak data, however, haven't been corroborated by anecdotal evidence from the Fed's extensive business contacts. The Fed's recent "beige book" roundup of regional business conditions found "moderate growth" and "tight" labor markets.

Fed officials thus appear content with a forecast of moderate growth over the next few quarters, then a rebound in mid-2007. "I don't think that the data we have seen are out of line" with that forecast, Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow said Monday on CNBC.com.

The Fed has viewed the housing pullback as the principal threat to growth. The slump prompted Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn to say two months ago that the risks to growth were "skewed a bit to the downside."

Since then, as the decline in housing sales has moderated and shown little sign of damping consumer spending, officials' concerns have eased. Last week Mr. Bernanke indicated he saw the risks to growth as balanced.

In late 2000, the Fed's business contacts were getting worried, and the stock market was crumpling as profit warnings proliferated. "Everything was pointing up and, all of a sudden, everything started pointing down," recalls Edward Gramlich, a Fed governor at the time. Today, "the key thing is whether the weakness in housing -- and now autos -- feeds over into consumption at large, and as I understand it, it really hasn't."

Unemployment has been lower than expected and wage gains are picking up. That has tempered the comfort Fed officials drew from a recent moderation in inflation and inflationary psychology. At 2.7%, excluding food and energy, it is still higher than they would like. That is why they continue to say inflation is their principal concern.

Skeptics think that is bluster. "They're paid to worry about inflation, which means that until the slowdown is obvious and undeniable, they will stick to their forecasts," Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics, said in a report last week, citing the similarity to late 2000.

"The Fed has a mission to put a good spin on things," says Paul McCulley, an economist and fund manager at Pacific Investment Management Co. "They think they need to continue sounding hawkish...to burnish their anti-inflation credentials and also to temper" downward pressure on bond yields.

Transcripts of the Fed's November 2000 meeting offer grist for the skeptics. Fed officials at the time saw ample reason to shift from their assessment that higher inflation represented a greater risk to the economy than did weaker growth, to a view that the two risks were balanced. "The balance of risks has shifted quite noticeably," then-Vice Chairman Roger Ferguson said.

Mr. Kohn, then a staff adviser, said a balanced assessment of risks might well be merited, but could turn stock and bond markets frothy again. Then-Chairman Alan Greenspan agreed: "Were we to go to balance today we would almost surely end up tomorrow with financial conditions that would be too easy."

Mr. Gramlich, the former Fed governor, said the Fed "is now populated by people who are pretty humble" about their ability to verbally steer the markets.

DOJ_NMG_0102866

More so than Mr. Greenspan, Mr. Bernanke thinks it is dangerous for the Fed to slant its words to elicit a particular market reaction. Indeed, he was burned in April when markets misinterpreted his hints about a pause in interest-rate increases as complacency about inflation. That suggests he means his recent warnings on inflation to be taken at face value.

Dow Near New High As Stocks Rise Again (USAT)

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK — The Standard & Poor's 500 index scored its second-consecutive six-year high Tuesday after a report showing unexpected strength in the key services sector renewed optimism about corporate profit growth.

The benchmark S&P added 5.64 points, or 0.4%, to 1414.76 for its highest close since Nov. 7, 2000. The S&P now is up 13.3% this year. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 47.75 points, or 0.4%, to 12,331.60, which is just 11 points from a new all-time high. The Dow is up 15.1% this year. The Nasdaq composite remained the relative laggard, rising 3.99 points, or 0.2%, to 2452.38 for an 11.2% 2006 gain.

The Institute for Supply Management reported Tuesday that its index of activity in the service sector rose to 58.9 in November from 57.1 in October. Analysts were looking for a reading of 55.5. A reading above 50 indicates expansion, and November marked the 44th-consecutive month of expansion in non-manufacturing industries. The service sector accounts for about two-thirds of the nation's economic activity.

"The service sector is really what is holding the whole economy together and providing the impetus for growth," says Michael Metz, chief investment strategist at Oppenheimer & Co.

Highlights:

The beleaguered home-building sector got a lift, led by Toll Bros., which rose 96 cents to $32.87. Although the luxury-home builder reported a 44% drop in fiscal fourth-quarter earnings, it said it sees some signs of stabilization in the slumping housing sector and raised its forecast for first-quarter home deliveries. That sparked a rally in other home builders, with Hovnanian Enterprises up $1.24 to $37.39, KB Home up 75 cents to $52.17, Pulte Homes up 62 cents to $33.97, Beazer Homes up $1.19 to $46.34, Centex up 95 cents to $56.76 and NVR up $36.57 to $665.07.

•Prudential Financial advanced $2.04 to $84.28. The life insurance and investment giant said its 2007 earnings should range from $6.60 to $6.80 a share. Analysts had expected $6.64 a share, Thomson Financial says.

•Bandag jumped $5.46, or 12%, to $50.50. Tiremaker Bridgestone Americas Holding is buying Bandag, which makes retread tires, for $1.1 billion, or $50.75 a share, in cash.

•Kroger gained $1.16 to $23.49. The USA's largest traditional grocery chain posted 16% higher fiscal third-quarter earnings and said full-year profit would be higher than earlier forecasts.

Upbeat Data Lift Street's Spirits; Stocks Climb (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

After slumping late last month on rising oil prices and uncertain economic data, the Dow Jones Industrial Average is almost back to a record as economic news has improved.

Following bullish news on the service economy and a reassuring report on labor costs, the Dow industrials rose 47.75 points, or 0.39%, to 12331.60. The Dow is up 15% this year, 11 points below the record close of 12342.56 on Nov. 17.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index hit a six-year high, rising 0.4%, or 5.64 points, to 1414.76, up 13% this year, but not near a record.

The service economy grew faster than expected last month. That offset Friday's news that manufacturing output shrank for the first time in three years.

A Labor Department report showed a measure of labor-cost inflation at 2.9% for the 12 months through the third quarter, compared to a previously estimated 5.3%.

The Federal Reserve watches labor costs closely as it sets interest rates. Investors now await Friday's report on payrolls and labor costs for November. The next Fed rate meeting is next Tuesday, and policy makers are widely expected to leave rates unchanged.

"A lot of people missed the autumn rally, because it caught everyone by surprise," said Tim Smalls, head of U.S. stock trading at Greenwich, Conn., brokerage firm Execution. "There is a lot of money on the sidelines that still has to be put to work. If you are a manager and you have a lot of cash...you have a lot of explaining to do."

The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.16%, or 3.99 points, to 2452.38, up 11.2% this year. The Russell 2000 small stock index finished at another record, 797.42, up 18% this year.

Gasoline and heating-oil futures fell, which was good news for stocks linked to consumer spending.

Home builders rebounded after Toll Brothers said the housing slump may be nearing bottom.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.4%, or 0.95 point, to 238.09, a record. In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.79 billion shares, as 2,074 stocks rose and 1,216 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 5/32, or $1.56 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.448%. The 30-year bond was down 16/32 to yield 4.575%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, it traded at 114.82 yen, down from 115.33, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3326 from $1.3328.

The Sliding Dollar: Both Boon And Bane (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

An ominous indicator has moved to center stage for world financial markets: the US dollar's plunging value relative to other currencies.

How this dollar drama unfolds could end up affecting more than just the price of T-shirts at Wal-Mart or the number of German tourists visiting Yosemite National Park.

A weaker dollar, over time, could help the world economy become better balanced - with America less reliant on borrowing and Asia less dependent on exports to fuel development. But currency realignment also holds risks. It would impose some hardship on Americans, and on the many nations that sell goods to them. A sudden shift could jolt US consumers with higher prices at a time when some economists worry about a possible recession.

But down is exactly where the dollar's value has been headed of late. After a quiet summer, the greenback has fallen since mid-November by 4 percent against the euro. It is also down by lesser amounts against the Japanese yen and Chinese yuan.

"Most economists agree that in the long term the dollar has to go down," to help shrink the mammoth US trade deficit, says Axel Merk, who manages the Merk Hard Currency Fund in Palo Alto, Calif. Yet in the short run, "it's in nobody's interest in the world for the dollar to go down."

The current slide may or may not persist. But when the dollar falls relative to other currencies, it tends to make US exports cheaper and, thus, more attractive on world markets. And it makes foreign imports more expensive to American consumers.

That doesn't mean the dollar's value is a magic fix for the US trade deficit, which has reached unprecedented proportions in the past few years. But many economists see it as part of the answer to this dangerous imbalance in global trade.

The dollar's recent weakness continues a pattern that began early in 2002. Why now and will it continue?

Currency watchers see a range of factors propelling the dollar now and possibly in the months ahead. Among them:

• Interest rates are shifting. The European Central Bank is expected to raise its benchmark interest rate on Thursday, boosting what investors can earn in the euro. European economies seem to be strengthening even as US bond yields have fallen on signs of weakening in the US economy.

• Inflation threats linger. Currencies tend to lose value when a central bank fails to tame inflation. Some experts worry that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates next year - in a bid to prevent a recession - before the job of squelching easy monetary conditions is really done.

• Politics has an effect. A newly elected Democratic Congress could lean toward protectionism or higher taxes, either of which could dampen foreign interest in dollars. Perhaps more important is the situation in Iraq. A loss of US prestige as a military power can also affect the dollar.

• The yuan has edged up. China has allowed its currency to rise a bit this year. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke will visit China this month, and will push for still more currency flexibility. But some analysts say a major shift may be unlikely before of 2008, when Beijing hosts the summer Olympics.

• China is diversifying. With some $1 trillion in foreign reserves, Beijing has said it won't put as much of its reserves into dollars as in the past.

"Foreign exchange traders are speculating at what point are Asian nations going to stop accumulating US assets," says Charles Engel, an economist who studies currency issues at the University of Wisconsin in Madison.

A weaker dollar would affect the purchasing power of Americans when they buy goods or services from other countries. The shift wouldn't be noticed at the supermarket as much as it would be at stores like Target or Best Buy.

"It would mean those things that are so unbelievably cheap at Wal-Mart would be a little bit more expensive," Dr. Engel says. "The flip side of that is that workers ... might move back toward some sort of export industries. That adjustment's going to happen over time." Digging out of a deficit

To some degree, the trade deficit and the buoyant dollar in recent years are signs of US economic strength. Imports often surge in an expanding economy.

Still, many economists say that at some point - and sooner might be better than later - the trade deficit needs to fall.

America's deficit in the current account, a broad measure of cross-border commerce and payments, has surged to more than $800 billion a year - an amount equal to about 7 percent of the gross domestic product. That's up from 1.7 percent of GDP a decade ago.

There's no precedent for a major economy to maintain this level of imbalance. In effect, the US is borrowing more than $2 billion a day to finance its spending on imports. The higher the imbalance goes, the greater the risk of a hard adjustment, if foreigners decide they can earn better returns by taking their dollars elsewhere.

Exchange rates are one piece of a larger puzzle. Another key factor is that the US has an unusually low rate of savings, thanks to federal deficits and consumer borrowing. The trade deficit mirrors this.

Trade barriers in other nations are another factor.

Still, a lower dollar could play a role in resolving the imbalance.

"If China did its part," by allowing the yuan to rise, "the dollar would also fall against most Asian currencies," says Peter Morici, a University of Maryland economist.

Falling imports would push up the US savings rate, he says.

Martin Feldstein, a Harvard University economist, has pointed out that the late 1980s offer precedent for a currency- driven easing of the trade deficit. Then, as the dollar fell, the trade gap closed without fanning inflation or causing a recession.

In a March speech, he said that America should have a "competitive" (lower) dollar abroad alongside a "strong" dollar at home - a currency whose purchasing power is not eroded by domestic inflation.

When The Dollar Talks Back (NYT)

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Talking up the dollar is a tradition among government officials, who always want to prevent an exchange-rate swing from accelerating into a dollar plunge — an economic nightmare that would be marked by spikes in prices and interest rates. As the dollar fell over the past two weeks, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. played his role, saying that “a strong dollar is clearly in our nation’s best interest.” And Ben Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, gave a speech in which he was cautiously optimistic about economic growth and signaled that he would not cut interest rates anytime soon.

Growth and relatively high rates — if they came to pass — would be a good combination for the dollar. But as of yesterday, the dollar hadn’t moved up much from its recent lows against other major currencies. Investors remain largely focused on economic weakness in the United States and gathering strength in Europe — which portend a weaker dollar, no matter what anyone says.

A weaker currency is inevitable for a country as indebted as the United States is. During the Bush years, deficits have mushroomed — in the federal budget and in trade. Anything that affects foreign investors' willingness to finance enormous deficits pushes the dollar down — including better investment opportunities elsewhere, as there are now.

The great unknowables are the timing and steepness of a sustained dollar decline. Over the past few years, investors who bet on a weakening dollar have lost money. But the current swoon is a reminder that no nation, even the United States, can borrow forever without facing up to economic consequences.

The government has been assuming — correctly, so far — that the United States is too big to fail. Administration officials seem confident that the Chinese, in particular, will continue to finance the nation's deficits, because doing so helps their exports. They also assume that China and other countries won't sell off chunks of their huge dollar holdings, lest they drive the dollar down, and with it, the value of their remaining dollar-based assets.

That's more like a standoff than stability, and it puts way too much of the nation's well being in the hands of foreign central bankers. But it's the best the Bush crowd has had to offer, because true stability in global finance is grounded in fiscal responsibility at home, something the administration lacks.

Global balance requires cooperation. When Mr. Paulson travels to China this month, he will no doubt seek ways to adjust American and Chinese currencies in an orderly fashion. But there is no substitute for getting one's own financial house in order.

Race For Fla. 13th Heads To House (RC)

By John Mcardle

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

It could be well into the 110th Congress before a Member from Florida's 13th district is seated by the House — and the next several weeks could prove to be explosive as the fight plays out in the courts and on Capitol Hill.

The Democratic candidate in the highly contentious race, bank executive Christine Jennings, is in Washington, D.C., this week, meeting with party leaders and drumming up financial support as she continues to dispute the results that appeared to hand auto dealer Vern Buchanan (R) a 369-vote victory.

Although Jennings already has filed suit in a Florida circuit court seeking a revote, she said in an interview Tuesday that she also intends to contest the result with the House Administration Committee — which has oversight over federal elections — by the Dec. 20 deadline. Jennings and her attorneys already have met with Democratic staff members from the committee to discuss the filing process.

"I would not want to pass up on that opportunity," Jennings said, adding that she still held out hope that the Florida courts might order a revote for the entire 13th district or just in Sarasota County, where Jennings insists malfunctions with the electronic voting machines produced 18,000 undervotes — and changed the outcome of the election.

Filing an official protest with the House Administration Committee will automatically make the Jennings/Buchanan case one of the first indicators of just how partisan the 110th Congress will be, and observers won't even have to wait until the new year to begin to see the fissures.

Here's why: The House of Representatives as a whole is responsible for seating its own membership. Buchanan supporters argue that since he holds a certificate from the Florida Elections Canvassing Commission showing that he won the race, he should be installed as the Representative of Florida's 13th district on Jan. 4, when the 110th Congress convenes.

But in her lawsuit, Jennings has asked the court to order that state officials decertify Buchanan's victory, and Republicans are concerned that the incoming Democratic House leadership might not seat anyone until the House Administration Committee finishes its review and issues a recommendation on the matter.

It is not unprecedented for neither candidate to be seated by the House until a contested election is resolved. Perhaps the most notable example in recent years is the infamous 1984 race between the late Democratic Rep. Frank McCloskey and Republican Richard McIntyre in Indiana's 8th district — where it took until the following May to swear in a Member for that seat. McCloskey eventually was seated by a Democratic House.

DOJ_NMG_0102870

It's unclear yet whether Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is planning to fill the seat or leave it vacant until Jennings' appeals have run their course.

One House leadership aide said Tuesday that "we're continuing to watch this situation very closely, but of course we have some time ahead of us before we need to really make decisions on this. Obviously the court case that is developing may not be resolved before" Jan. 4.

The Florida dispute could get widespread attention because it involves electronic voting machines, which have come under heavy fire from many good government groups and clean elections advocates.

On Tuesday, Buchanan's spokeswoman, Sally Tibbets, called on Jennings "to put the best interests of the people ahead of her own political ambitions and do the right thing for the people of Florida's 13th Congressional district and to concede. And we would also call on the U.S. House of Representatives to put partisan politics aside and seat Vern Buchanan, who has been certified by the state of Florida as the Congressman. That's what democracy is all about and anything else would totally disrespect the will of the voters of Florida's 13th Congressional district."

The eventual winner will replace departing Rep. Katherine Harris (R) — who, ironically, as Florida secretary of state in 2000, was a major player in the disputed presidential election.

But as both sides speculate as to what will happen on Jan. 4, the process for determining the eventual winner after the Jennings' formal protest is filed with the House also could be controversial.

The House Administration Committee will receive Jennings' challenge at the tail end of the Republican-controlled 109th Congress and the outgoing majority could immediately begin the investigation or hold hearings on the case.

Traditionally when an election contest is filed, a panel of two majority and one minority committee members is put together to review the case, including reports gathered by both Democratic and Republican committee observers who are sent to districts whenever contests seem likely. That panel makes a recommendation to the full committee on how to proceed, and that recommendation is voted on and, if passed, sent to the floor of the House and treated like any other piece of legislation.

But House Administration spokeswoman Salley Collins said Tuesday that the committee will not make any decisions on how it will proceed with its investigation until Jennings' paperwork is filed. When asked if the committee would be holding hearings after Congress adjourns, she said it is "not out of the realm of possibility."

However, as House Administration Democratic Staff Director George Shevlin pointed out, "should she file, no formal action affecting the outcome of the contest could be taken until the next Congress is seated."

So while the House office lottery pool ended weeks ago, Room 1516 of the Longworth House Office Building — which was set aside for the winner of the Florida contest — is currently vacant, and appears likely to remain that way for a while longer.

Jennings Ignores Setbacks, Calls For Revote In Florida (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Democrat Christine Jennings was in Washington over the last two days renewing her call for a revote in her race against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), as government and independent reviews failed to support her case.

Jennings said she would do everything she could to see the legal challenge through. She set up shop at Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee headquarters and was to meet with lawmakers including Reps. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) and Rush Holt (D-N.J.). She was also asking for financial support and continuing to push her case to the news media.

Jennings's visit came as state officials continued their audit of the touch-screen voting machines in Sarasota County, where an abnormally high number of ballots cast were "undervotes," meaning they failed to register votes in the congressional race for the 13th District.

The audit has yet to produce any evidence of machine errors, and a review by a local newspaper published Tuesday points to ballot design as the leading cause of the undervotes.

The undervotes numbered about 18,000 in Sarasota County, or 13 percent. That rate is several times higher than the district's other counties, suggesting something skewed the results on Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0102871

Jennings's camp says the voting machines malfunctioned and failed to record the votes. It has filed suit to obtain the source codes for the voting machines and is offering hundreds of witnesses who say they experienced problems as they were trying to vote for her.

Members of her team have expressed discontent with the state's recount, which gave Buchanan a 369-vote win, and now with the audit, and they say the review needs to be independent and include the source codes.

Jennings won Sarasota County 53-47, which suggests that the 18,000 ballots could well swing the election.

"Our experts have to be capable of getting the hardware and the software so that they can tear it apart — just literally tear it apart," Jennings said. "All I'm concerned about, at this point, is that our voters get an answer and that I get an answer as to what really happened with those machines."

Jennings said Tuesday that the witnesses include a former governor of Maine.

On Tuesday, the state was reviewing videotape of tests conducted on Friday in which two discrepancies occurred in other races, but not the House race. The machines worked properly during the test, though, and the problems were expected to be attributed to human error.

The Jennings team said that this diagnosis was premature and has been critical of how the tests were conducted, saying they did not mimic actual voting conditions.

"We've gone from rubberstamp recount to preordained audit, and now with those events behind us, it's time to get to some forensic testing that's meaningful, by outside experts," Jennings lawyer Kendall Coffey said.

Yesterday, a court date was set for Dec. 15, though it's too early to tell when a trial might begin. Buchanan is set to be sworn in with the rest of the freshman class on Jan. 3.

Jennings's case was also undercut by a review of every Sarasota County ballot conducted by investigative reporters at the Sarasota Herald-Tribune and published Tuesday. The review concluded that the format of the ballot probably contributed to the large undervote, and a number of election experts are now also saying ballot design was probably the leading factor.

The Herald-Tribune review found that three other counties experienced similar undervotes in the two-candidate attorney general race. The attorney general race was on the same page as the gubernatorial race in those counties, just like the two-candidate House race was in Sarasota County.

The gubernatorial race featured seven options and therefore dominated the screen in the four counties, which all used the same touch screens. The four cases all led to undervotes of more than 10 percent and account for four of the five highest undervotes in federal and statewide races in Florida, according to the Herald-Tribune.

A poorly designed ballot would not be sufficient for a revote, but some experts say the discrepancy is so big that it might not be the only factor.

Jennings lawyer Sam Hirsch said it could contribute to a machine malfunction by having too many options on one page. The screens that included Jennings's race had more options than any he has seen, he said.

"It's quite possible that, like with anything else that's computer-based, if you press it to its maximum capacity, you're more likely to trigger some kind of glitch or bug," Hirsch said.

Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said the mounting evidence continues to discount Jennings's assertions.

"Christine Jennings has built her entire legal case on the premise that the machines malfunctioned," Tibbetts said. "So she has no case. Her case has been shattered."

It's Time For The House To Pick Up The Pieces In Florida's 13th District (RC)

By Richard L. Hasen

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

Remember the infamous "butterfly ballot" of Palm Beach County, Fla., in the 2000 presidential election? Back then, poor ballot design appeared to have caused many supporters of Democrat Al Gore to vote for conservative third-party candidate Pat Buchanan for president, effectively allowing George Bush to win Florida's electoral votes and the presidency. The courts said there was nothing that could have been done about the problems with the ballot even though there was strong evidence that more Florida voters came to their polling places intending to vote for Gore than for Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0102872

The elections last month brought us the 2006 version of the butterfly ballot. This time, it appears that poor ballot design or machine malfunctions with electronic voting machines caused thousands of voters to skip the race for Florida's 13th Congressional district, leading to a 369-vote victory by the Republican candidate over the Democratic one. Once again the matter is in court, and once again the courts are not likely to give a remedy.

But this time there's another option. The House can — and should — declare the seat vacant, requiring the seat to be filled by a special election.

First, a bit of background. In the 13th, Congressional district lines don't coincide with county lines, so voters in all or parts of five Florida counties voted either for Republican Vern Buchanan or Democrat Christine Jennings. There was an unusually high number of "undervotes" — that is, an absence of a recorded vote in the race for this seat — with the vast majority coming from Sarasota County.

About 13 percent of Sarasota County votes cast using electronic touch-screen voting machines showed no vote in Florida's 13th contest. This rate was much higher than the undervote rate among Sarasota County voters who voted using absentee ballots, and it was much higher than the undervote rate in the other four counties in that district — including one, Charlotte County, that uses the same type of electronic voting machines that Sarasota uses.

What accounts for the high undervote rate in Sarasota County, in a hard-fought Congressional race in a swing district? Machine malfunction remains a possibility, but based on the evidence available thus far, the most likely culprit appears to be poor ballot design. In Sarasota County — but not in Charlotte County — the 13th district race appeared on the second electronic "page" of the electronic ballot, right at the top of the page above a larger heading for state races. A number of voters appeared to have missed the race because of its placement on the page.

A recent academic analysis by Laurin Frisina, Michael Herron, James Honaker and Jeffrey Lewis notes that in Charlotte County, the undervote rate in the state attorney general race was huge. In Charlotte — but not in Sarasota — the attorney general race was paired with another contest on the same electronic ballot page, mirroring the placement of the House race on the Sarasota County ballot. Fortunately for Floridians, the race for attorney general was not close.

A separate analysis recently completed by the Sarasota Herald-Tribune bolsters the poor ballot design hypothesis. Looking at every ballot cast in the county, the newspaper found that the people you'd most expect to vote in the House race — loyal party voters who voted Republican or Democrat throughout the ballot — were the ones most likely to have skipped voting in the race.

If it turns out that Florida courts concluded that poor ballot design caused the high undervote rate in the Congressional race, it is unlikely that there will be a judicial remedy. Overturning an election in the courts is tough, absent proof of fraud or proof that legal votes were not counted.

But there is another option. The Constitution provides that "Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members ... ." The House has resolved disputed elections before. For two reasons, the House should declare the seat vacant, triggering a special election.

First, the House is not bound by the restrictive rules for ordering new elections that courts are. Assuming that the problem was poor ballot design, why should voters be victims of the design incompetence of election administrators? The fair thing to do — even if it is not legally compelled — is to hold a new election where everyone in the district gets to vote.

This case is unlike the butterfly ballot situation, where it would have been unfair to hold an election for a national office — president — in only one county in one state. A side benefit will be that the controversy will focus attention on problems with election administration, and get Congress and the country thinking more about the problems with how we administer our elections.

This course is not without risks. In 1984, the House, then controlled by the Democrats, waded into the bitter contest between incumbent Rep. Frank McCloskey (D-Ind.) and his Republican challenger, Rick McIntyre. The decision by the majority to seat McCloskey, which prompted widespread disgust within the House Republican Conference, is now cited as a contributing cause in the widening partisan divide in Congress.

In addition, some argue that it would be bad precedent to let the House make this decision on extralegal grounds.

But just like the House makes a political judgment as to what constitutes grounds for impeachment, it can make decisions about new elections on a political basis as well. A Democratic House's decision to grant a revote in these circumstances is a lot less likely to contribute to partisanship in Congress than was the Republican House's decision to impeach then-President Bill Clinton.

More importantly, such political judgments are self-limiting. If the Democratic House started overturning election results for no good reason, voters would see such moves as illegitimate and vote the Democrats out of office.

We cannot rerun the 2000 election in Palm Beach, but the House can provide some justice to this year's voters in Sarasota County without triggering a national crisis.

The Election Is In The Mail (NYT)

By Ruth Goldway

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Washington

LAST Election Day, voters encountered myriad difficulties, from the unexplained glitch that temporarily halted Montana's vote count to the 18,300 undervotes in Florida's 13th Congressional District, to long lines, bad weather, inadequately trained workers, delayed or missing absentee ballots and complicated new identity forms. There was, however, one state where all went well: Oregon, where everyone votes by mail.

Since Oregon adopted Vote by Mail as its sole voting option in 1998, the state's turnout has increased, concerns about fraud have decreased, a complete paper trail exists for every election, recounts are non-controvertible and both major political parties have gained voters. Moreover, in doing away with voting machines, polling booths, precinct captains and election workers, the state estimates that it saves up to 40 percent over the cost of a traditional election.

Vote by Mail could offer real advantages if it were adopted nationwide. Voters would not need to take time off from work, find transportation, find the right polling station, get babysitters or rush through reading complicated ballot initiatives. The country's 35,000 post offices could provide information, distribute and collect voting materials and issue inexpensive residency and address identifications for voting purposes.

Perhaps most important, given the concerns about voting machine security, mail ballots cannot be hacked. Tampering or interfering with mail is a federal crime, and the United States Postal Service has its own law enforcement arm, which works closely with a variety of enforcement authorities including the F.B.I. Trained election clerks can take the time to check signatures without delaying or discouraging voters. And the advantages of a paper trail outshine the glitter of black box electronic gadgetry.

States that have adopted measures like "no excuse necessary" absentee ballots find that the public is eager to avail itself of the opportunity to vote by mail. As many as 30 percent of voters didn't use the polls in November. In Washington State, where 34 of 39 counties vote entirely by mail, 70 percent of November's votes were cast by mail; in California, the number is near 40 percent.

The Postal Service has set up a Vote by Mail preparation Web site and a traveling workshop. But out of 750,000 employees, it has only a handful who work part-time on mail balloting issues. The 110th Congress should direct it to expand these efforts. Senators Ron Wyden, John Kerry and Barack Obama recently sponsored a bill to grant funds to states that adopt Vote by Mail. That legislation should also give the Postal Service money to coordinate a national program.

For a small fraction of the sums spent on unreliable voting machines, the Postal Service could work with state and local governments to design standard ballots and develop processes for sorting and delivering them (like those that already exist for overseas military personnel). It could coordinate its own address database with the database of registered voters, set postmark deadlines and devise language prompting voters to affix correct postage.

Already, in order to help businesses that send out big mailings, the Postal Service uses bar-code scanning to inexpensively track large volumes of mail from origin to destination. With minor but careful modifications, this technology can be adapted for use with ballots — allowing voters to check on their location and status by entering a tracking number on the Internet or by phone.

Public confidence in the accuracy of vote counting is at an all-time low. The Election Assistance Commission estimated that as many as 850,000 votes were not counted in the 2004 elections, and a recent report warned that electronic voting machines cannot be made secure. Fortunately, a remarkably sophisticated and effective technology exists for solving these problems, and it is “old-fashioned” mail.

The founders conceived of a national postal service as a force to “bind our nation together.” Other technologies may now spread the news and help families stay in touch, but the Postal Service should be called upon to meet this latest challenge to our democracy. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Iowa Governor: Smart Campaign Can Beat Clinton Juggernaut In '08 (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

Tom Vilsack, soon to be ex-governor of Iowa, is not on many voters' radar screen as a possible next president. Even Iowans, who elected him twice to run their state, placed him fourth in a June poll rating possible Democratic candidates.

As he finishes the announcement phase of his candidacy for the 2008 race - including a Monitor breakfast Tuesday with reporters - he knows he's a long shot. He says so. But he has an answer to the inevitable question: How does an obscure Midwestern governor get past the Hillary Rodham Clinton juggernaut and now "Obama-mania," as the junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, also considers a run?

"You have to work longer, and you have to work smarter, and that's what we intend to do," Governor Vilsack told the group Tuesday, his wife at his side.

There's nothing flashy about Vilsack, a Pittsburgher by birth who came to Iowa to meet his then-fiancée's family and who now considers Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, his second hometown. When asked about Obama-style charisma, he countered with his own version: "There is a quiet charisma," he said, a charisma that causes voters to say "he's authentic and real and has done well."

Vilsack also notes that among the dozen or so other Democrats who may run for president, only two are candidates from west of the Mississippi River and are governors: himself and Bill Richardson of New Mexico. In 2004, Democratic nominee John Kerry did not win any Plains or Mountain West states, including Iowa and New Mexico. Most recent presidents have been governors first - positioning themselves as outsiders and as chief executives. Vilsack compared himself with former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner (D), who was succeeded last year by another Democrat - a rare feat in the South.

"My record as governor certainly matches Governor Warner's, and we did not raise taxes; we actually have cut taxes every year I've been governor," he said. "We not only elected a Democratic governor, which will be the longest period of time we've had a Democratic governor in consecutive years in the history of our state, we also as a result of efforts of the last four years elected a [Democratic] House and Senate - the first time that combination has occurred in 42 years.... We have turned a red state to blue."

A signature issue for Vilsack will be energy security. He plans to focus on conservation, renewable fuels, and using traditional materials in ways that are "cleaner and greener." He says energy and conservation can unite the country, bringing together right and left.

Vilsack Kicks Off '08 Run Touting Energy Security (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack pitched energy independence as a path to security, jobs and health Tuesday, as a rival presidential prospect from the Midwest filed papers to raise money for the Democratic nomination.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh said he is moving toward a 2008 race because America needs to "get back on the path to greatness." The former two-term governor will be in Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio and New Hampshire this week.

Vilsack, a two-term governor who helped elect a Democratic successor last month, declared his candidacy on Thursday. He is one of several Democrats staking their cases on executive experience, appeal beyond the usual Democratic states and voters, or both.

DOJ_NMG_0102875

At a lunch with journalists from USA TODAY and Gannett News Service, Vilsack struck themes meant to help him stand out in a group that includes Bayh, son of former senator Birch Bayh; former North Carolina senator John Edwards; and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a former Energy secretary.

Vilsack described his "interesting" childhood as an orphan adopted by a woman who was an alcoholic. She used to disappear into the attic for weeks to drink, he said, and he'd hear the liquor bottles hit the floor above his bedroom.

"You don't have the notion that tomorrow is necessarily going to be brighter than today," he said. "I wouldn't want youngsters to go through what I went through."

Vilsack said energy security is a cause "with extraordinary opportunity to unite this country." Benefits from conservation and new energy sources, he said, would include a more innovative economy; fewer cases of asthma; reduced reliance on hostile sources of foreign oil; a smaller trade deficit; and a chance to "reclaim the moral high ground" on global warming.

In Iowa, Vilsack said, tax credits have led to increased sales of ethanol, new ethanol production facilities and new jobs. He said Iowa would be the first state to have a biorefinery when it opens in 2009. He also said two manufacturers of turbines and blades for wind power have decided to locate in Iowa.

It's unclear how Vilsack's bid will affects the Iowa caucuses, which launch the nominating season. Other Democrats skipped them when Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin ran in 1992.

Bayh isn't ceding Iowa to anyone. He's been there 10 times this year, most recently on Monday. He's also competing hard for money. He has $10.7 million he can transfer from his Senate account to his new exploratory committee.

Vilsack Back Of Pack, But On Track (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said he doesn't fear any of his fellow Democrats considering a run for president in 2008 and is happy to run as an underdog, even in his home state's important caucus.

"I respect everyone who is running," Mr. Vilsack said. "but I don't fear anyone."

Last week, he became the first to officially announce his candidacy for the Democrats' 2008 presidential nomination.

In a meeting with reporters in Washington yesterday, however, the governor most frequently returned to criticism of Sen. John McCain and the Arizona Republican's call for increasing troop levels in Iraq.

"I don't believe he's exercised particularly good judgment," Mr. Vilsack said.

Mr. Vilsack was in Washington to work on his presidential campaign and meet with reporters. Afterward, he traveled to New York to attend a campaign fundraiser.

The two-term governor, who is retiring from his post in January, also questioned Mr. McCain's credentials as a White House contender. "He has never been a governor. He's never had to make specific decisions."

A poll released yesterday by Rasmussen Reports shows Mr. McCain leading Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, in a potential White House match-up, 48 percent to 44 percent. Most polls show Mr. Vilsack near the back of the pack of potential Democratic candidates.

"I've always been the underdog," he said.

When asked what plan for Iraq he'd favor as commander in chief, Mr. Vilsack said U.S. forces should redeploy from Baghdad and the more contentious southern regions of the country to the northern region, which has experienced less violence.

"We've given them this opportunity," he said, citing the ouster of Saddam Hussein. "It's a little bit of tough love."

In response to concerns that a redeployment would embolden insurgent and terrorist forces, Mr. Vilsack said, "If there's a bloodbath, how much different is that from the situation today?"

Later, he bristled when asked if, in hindsight, he still would have supported removing Saddam from power. "Tell me why this is important?" he asked. "I was reading three newspapers and watching [local TV] news. I don't know that I had sufficient information and knowledge to make that decision."

DOJ_NMG_0102876

Mr. Vilsack estimates he will need to raise between $20 million and $40 million in order to compete with Mrs. Clinton and other Democrats in the primaries. He also rejected suggestions that a primary victory in his home state would have less than its usual significance.

"Whoever wins Iowa wins Iowa," he said. "I expect to win Iowa."

Mr. Vilsack also said that he would run on a record of success and competence he thinks will be important to voters. "We've turned a red state blue," he said of his eight years in office.

Mr. Vilsack described his tenure as that of a centrist executive with a record that included tax cuts and improved employment numbers. He said that record, along with his connections to rural America, make him an appealing candidate for western and "small town" voters.

Hillary Clinton's Early Moves (WP)

By Dan Balz And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) is taking a series of concrete steps toward a likely campaign for president in 2008, settling on key members of her campaign team, recruiting potential new additions to her staff, and calling Democratic activists in states with early primaries and caucuses.

No final decision on running is expected before the end of the year, according to sources knowledgeable about her thinking, as Clinton works methodically through a checklist of preparatory steps. But she and her inner circle are already ramping up for what could be a history-making bid for the White House.

The latest move is the choice of longtime adviser Patti Solis Doyle as campaign manager. That follows the recent recruitment of three seasoned political operatives who, if she runs, would play key roles on what is now a rapidly expanding Clinton campaign organization.

The three are Jonathan Mantz, who has been working for New Jersey Gov. Jon S. Corzine (D), as finance director; Phil Singer, who was communications director for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, as a communications strategist; and Karen Hicks, who ran former Vermont governor Howard Dean's New Hampshire operation in 2004, to oversee organizing, particularly in the early states.

Clinton is operating on a model she used before she decided to run for the Senate in 2000. "If you want to understand the process she is going through now, you need only look at the process she went through in 1999," said Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson. "In that race, she reached out to elected officials, to potential donors [and] to policy experts and had lengthy serious meetings about whether she should run, the issues before the country, [and] what a campaign would look like."

In this case, her first step was to secure her New York political base, reaching out to the state's elected officials, including Gov.-elect Eliot L. Spitzer, labor leaders and prominent African Americans and Hispanics. Most of that activity took place last week.

This week's schedule includes phone calls to Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina, the four states with the earliest contests in 2008. Other prospective candidates have made numerous trips to the early states, but Clinton avoided such travel during her reelection campaign this year -- even forbidding her advisers to begin discussions around the country on a possible campaign.

"She's obviously very knowledgeable already," said JoDee Winterhof, a former chief of staff of Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin (D), who spoke with Clinton yesterday. "We had a good talk about how to run a campaign there. . . . She understands that this will take a significant amount of hard work and campaigning and getting to know Iowans more up close and personal."

Aides expect that, in addition to the phone calls, Clinton will hold a series of meetings in Washington with state activists and others as she nears a final decision. This morning she is scheduled to have breakfast with Harkin in Washington. Harkin is publicly committed to supporting the candidacy of Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D), but he said he and other Democrats in the state want the process there to be "fair and open."

Clinton has also spoken with former senator Bob Kerrey (D-Neb.), who ran against her husband, Bill Clinton, for the Democratic nomination in 1992. Kerrey is now president of the New School, a university in New York. He would not discuss the nature of that conversation.

Some Clinton advisers view the activities of other prospective Democratic candidates, particularly the mushrooming interest around Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, as a spur to the New York senator to accelerate her timetable. Others say she will not be hurried into a decision until she has completed her soundings and preparations. "She's going to do this at her own pace, and what anyone else does is not going to affect her decision-making," said Lorraine Voles, her Senate communications director.

But her presidential campaign preparations will be done on a far more compressed timetable than her decision to run for the Senate, made when she was first lady and living in the White House.

"It was a much longer process in 1999," said one Democratic strategist. "There she was not at all sure-of-foot politically. She had the carpetbagger aspect to deal with. She had no understanding of the intricacies of New York politics. So it took her a much longer time. Here there's not the luxury of a lot of time. This is a very fast-moving situation."

Clinton advisers also recognize that they must move swiftly to recruit new staff members, in part because of competition from other candidates for operatives to manage key states, to fill communications assignments and to provide the support and assistance necessary to manage an enterprise the size of a presidential campaign. This "talent primary" is seen by her advisers as critically important to her success.

The second early challenge is fundraising. Clinton spent much of the past two years using her Senate reelection campaign to build a national fundraising infrastructure to support such a candidacy. Through mid-October, Clinton had spent $36 million on her reelection race, which she went on to win with 67 percent of the vote. A large portion of those expenditures went into an extensive direct-mail program aimed at beefing up Clinton's small-dollar donor lists.

Clinton advisers are also beginning to prepare for her first travels to states such as Iowa and New Hampshire as a prospective candidate, although there is no timetable for such appearances.

Jerry Crawford, a prominent Iowa Democrat and Vilsack supporter, said yesterday that he and Clinton traded voice-mail messages during the past two days. He said that she and her staff have been "very respectful" toward Vilsack and his candidacy. But he added: "It's clear she's looking to come to Iowa, and it seems clear she's giving serious consideration competing in Iowa."

Speculation Rife Over Hillary Bid (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Speculation about the presidential plans of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton has reached a fevered pitch this week as newspapers and Web sites scramble to be the first with the big headline that the former first lady will run.

"I'm In," blared the front page of yesterday's New York Post. "Hill 'really going' for prez run."

The Des Moines Register, always a close observer of presidential nominating contests, went microscopic with its own "exclusive" on its Web site Monday: "Hillary Clinton begins calling Iowa Democrats."

Throughout the weekend, the Drudge Report had rolling exclamation-punctuated headlines: "She is thinking about it," "She Is" and "Hello, Iowa."

Certainly, said a spokeswoman for Mrs. Clinton, the New York senator is actively weighing whether to run for president in 2008.

"After her election, she said she was going to look at this," Lorraine Voles, Mrs. Clinton's communications director, said yesterday. "As part of that process, she has been making some phone calls."

After calling friends and supporters around New York, she also called a handful of key Democrats in Iowa, which will host the first caucuses of the Democratic primary in 13 months. She has not, however, made plans to travel to Iowa, Ms. Voles said.

Mrs. Clinton's moves come after several other Democrats have sent signals in recent days that they are either running for the nomination or seriously considering it.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack last week announced that he would run. Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh filed papers yesterday to officially create a presidential exploratory committee.

DOJ_NMG_0102878

"I will talk to my family over the holidays and make a final decision and an announcement after the first of the year," Mr. Bayh said.

And former vice presidential nominee John Edwards continues to heavily court Iowa voters and hire political staff.

In June, a Des Moines Register poll found that among likely caucusgoers, Mr. Edwards led the pack of likely candidates with 30 percent. Mrs. Clinton trailed slightly with 26 percent. Sen. John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat who was the 2004 nominee, took third with 12 percent, and Mr. Vilsack won 10 percent.

In addition to reaching out to Democrats in New York and Iowa, Mrs. Clinton also has hired some new political staff recently. She's brought on board Phil Singer, who is just off a major victory, working for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC). Mrs. Clinton also has hired Karen Hicks, who served as Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean's New Hampshire field organizer when he ran for the Democratic nomination in 2004. Also, she's picked up national finance director Jonathan Mantz, a well-regarded operative who has worked for the DSCC and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

But, as she has throughout her six years on Capitol Hill, Mrs. Clinton isn't taking anyone in her adopted home state for granted. Among those she called this week was Rep. Joseph Crowley, New York Democrat.

"I don't think she ever outright said it, but there's no doubt in my mind that she's going to run," he said. "It was a very exciting and exhilarating conversation. I don't know how often it happens in a lifetime when someone calls you up and says, 'I want you to know I'm doing this and I want your support.' "

Hillary Can Win But Mustn't (HILL)

By Dick Morris

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Now that Hillary has dropped the coy pretense of indecision that she used to justify her reelection to a Senate seat she no longer wants and has told friends that she plans to run for president, two questions present themselves: Can she win? And what kind of a president would she be?

She definitely can win … and probably will. She is uniquely able to expand the electorate to bring in millions of women, mostly single, who will vote overwhelmingly for a female Democrat. The feminization of poverty, long decried by the left, will finally lead unmarried women to show up at the polling place and vote their short-term economic interest and vindicate their gender bias. In 2000, only 19 million single women voted. By 2004, their turnout rose to 27 million. With Hillary in the race, the single-female vote will probably go up to its proper ratio of the adult population — 33 million votes.

Can white men outvote single women? Despite the intensity with which white men tend to oppose Hillary, they can't vote twice.

The enthusiasm that will grip many Americans — women in particular — at the cultural implications of a woman president will probably sweep through the primaries and cause many to overlook Hillary's flaws and dismiss her defects. The generic of a woman candidate will prove so attractive that millions of voters will overcome their objections to the specific person who is running.

Her mastery of the establishment of the Democratic Party, her vast lead among ex-officio delegates — many of whom have received campaign contributions from her coffers — and the celebrity draw of her ex-president husband will prove hard for a mere mortal to overcome.

But should she win? No way!

Those who know both Hillary and Bill well and are willing to speak frankly in public realize the fundamental differences between the two and grasp how his abilities are the counterpoints to her defects.

He is intensely creative, constantly turning issues over in his mind seeking new solutions. She rarely has a new idea but specializes in advocacy — the rote recitation of talking points.

He has an instinctual feel for people and an uncanny ability to read a room and know what everyone in it is thinking. She is obtuse in her understanding of people and ham-handed in her approach.

DOJ_NMG_0102879

He cares deeply about being loved. She seeks popularity as a means to the goal of getting elected but otherwise marches to the beat of her inner, liberal drummer.

He distrusts ideology, and his innate perfectionism finds all belief systems flawed. She swallows the ideological line of the guru du jour hook, line and sinker. During the healthcare years, it was Ira Magaziner who pushed her buttons. When she decided to back the Iraq War, it was the generals who paraded before her committee. She is vulnerable to a cultish adoration of the guys with all the answers.

He lets the give and take of politics wash off his back. A critic is a potential convert whom he hopes to charm over to his side. She has a rigidly dichotomized view of friends and enemies, demanding total loyalty and public silence from the former and maintaining a ruthless determination to destroy the latter. She is a Democratic Nixon to those whom she perceives as her enemies.

He is a moderate by instinct, seeking incremental change. She devotedly and deeply believes in a European-style socialism in which government takes much more of our national income and offers a far wider array of services and benefits.

He'll raise taxes when he has to. She'll increase them just to redistribute income.

He's most like Eisenhower, Kennedy and Bush Sr. — feeling his way, acting with caution, and skeptical of all advice. She is more like LBJ, Nixon or Bush Jr. — determined to charge ahead and do what she thinks needs to be done, the torpedoes be damned.

And finally, he knows who he is and, except for his private shortcomings, is not ashamed to let it show. She constantly seeks to reinvent herself and rigidly maintains an almost totally inaccurate image in public of what she is really like in private. He has little discipline. Hers is iron. His caution is innate. Hers is a learned response to what happens when people see who she really is.

He made a very good domestic-policy president. She would be a disaster at home and abroad.

Mom's A Maverick, Too (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

The most popular guest at Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) bustling media-and-money holiday party Monday night wound up in the hospital. Roberta McCain, the Senator's 94-year-old mother, fell as she was walking out of the star-studded bash at the Corcoran Gallery of Art and injured her hip.

After driving herself (as usual) to the party and hobnobbing for two hours with her fans in the media and supporters and guests of her son, the fiercely independent Mrs. McCain took a tumble on the front steps of the Corcoran as she was walking to her car.

Luckily, some friends who had just gotten in their car spotted the elegant lady in red and rushed to her aid. They drove her to the Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., where doctors discovered she had a "hairline fracture below the joint," according to a senior McCain aide.

At press time, the slight fracture did not look like it would require surgery, the McCain aide told us. It was unclear when Mrs. McCain would be released from the hospital, where she spent Monday and Tuesday nights.

We hear the Senator — as much as he could ever possibly "make" his spitfire mom do anything — is going to strongly encourage her to come spend a few weeks in Arizona with him and his wife, Cindy.

We wish him luck. Because, if this is any indication of who's the boss in that mother-son relationship, Mrs. McCain firmly told the Senator and would-be president to "turn around and go home" during a phone conversation as he headed up to the hospital after hearing the news and leaving his party early.

And yes, you guessed it, he followed Mom's orders.

More Straight Talk. McCain's bash, paid for by his Straight Talk America political action committee, sure looked like a dry run for potential future White House Christmas parties.

Complete with an orchestra, flashbulb-splashed red carpets, a receiving line, catered gourmet food and two full open bars — and conspicuously located across the street from the Old Executive Office Building — the party drew an A-list of the media and politicos. Guests instinctively formed a receiving line to greet McCain and get a photo. (Even McCain's mother stood in the long line with others until CNN's Judy Woodruff politely said, "Mrs. McCain, you don't have to stand in this line!")

Notable primary- and caucus-state Senators who attended the bash: John Sununu (R-N.H.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who reiterated his devotion to McCain's probable presidential bid while Sununu continued to play coy.

McCain's party at the Corcoran conveniently fell on the same night as the White House Congressional holiday party, which, of course, drew plenty of star power from 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., where, by the way, defeated House Resources Chairman Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) and ousted Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) were seen dancing with their wives to Kool & the Gang's "Celebration."

Nothing that zany at McCain's party. Just GOP Sens. Trent Lott (Miss.), Richard Burr (N.C.), Saxby Chambliss (Ga.) and Mel Martinez (Fla.) working a crowd that included former GOP Sens. Phil Gramm (Texas) and Peter Fitzgerald (Ill.).

Other Members included hair-of-their-chinny-chin-chinners Reps. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, and Christopher Shays (Conn.). The only Democrat we saw: Rep. Mark Udall of Colorado. Outgoing Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman was there, as was Homeland Security Adviser Frances Townsend, among many, many others.

The Royal Rep. Sabo. In one of those times when it pays to have a really cool middle name, retiring Rep. Martin Olav Sabo (D-Minn.) last night was slated to be tapped Commander of the Royal Norwegian Order of Merit.

The coronation was appointed by His Majesty King Harald V of Norway, though the king himself was not expected to attend last night's ceremony at the residence of Norwegian Ambassador Knut Vollebaek and his wife, Ellen.

The order came as a complete surprise for Sabo, who was expecting only to attend a dinner at the ambassador's house. He received the honor for his "outstanding work for Norwegian-American relations over many years."

Sabo, whose parents both immigrated to the United States from Norway, co-founded the Friends of Norway Caucus in the House, which now has more than 50 members. "Sabo" actually means "farm by the sea" in Norwegian.

Members who were expected to attend the ceremony last night included Sens. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) and Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.), as well as Reps. Rick Larsen (D-Wash.), James Oberstar (D-Minn.), David Obey (D-Wis.), Dale Kildee (D-Mich.) and Hal Rogers (R-Ky.).

Expected on the menu Tuesday night: What else? Lutefisk.

Cry Baby. As Tom Kahn acquires the word "majority" in his title after spending 11 years as minority staff director of the House Budget Committee, his whole world changes with him. He doesn't just have a new job, he has a new baby to boot.

Benjamin Eugene Kahn was born late on Nov. 21, weighing 8 pounds, 11 ounces. Baby Ben is the first child for Kahn and his wife, Susana Sanchez, an economist at the World Bank.

You might think a new father isn't getting much rest. But so far, Kahn says he's been sleeping like a baby. "I wake up every two hours and I cry!"

Anticorruption Whistle-blower Takes Alaska's Top Job (CSM)

By Yereth Rosen

Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

Sarah Palin has toppled two giants.

The former mayor of Wasilla, a rapidly growing bedroom burg north of Anchorage, crushed Gov. Frank Murkowski in the Republican gubernatorial primary. Then in the general election she defeated former Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles, a political veteran who was seeking a return to the office he held for two terms.

Monday at her swearing-in in Fairbanks, she simultaneously became Alaska's first female governor, Alaska's youngest governor, and the state's only beauty-queen-turned-chief-executive.

Not bad for a suburban mother of four with a relatively thin résumé that critics claimed marked her as a lightweight. Not only that, she won during an election in which Republicans in general lost big, including at governors' mansions. The party dropped six states, leaving Republicans in control of just 22 governor's seats. Governor Palin is one of three female Republicans to be running a state.

Her victory stems partly from the fact that her campaign bore little connection to the rest of the US. "It was a revolt within the Republican Party against the leadership of the party and the sitting governor," says Gerald McBeath, a political scientist at the University of Alaska in Fairbanks.

A one-time "Miss Wasilla" and a former high school basketball star, Palin turned her relative lack of political experience into an asset. She presented, according to campaign slogans, a "fresh face" offering "new energy for Alaska." That resonated with an electorate that was in a decidedly antiestablishment, anti-incumbent mood.

"This is a good, healthy position Alaskans are in to have a person who's truly an independent. Perhaps we've lacked that in the past," said Palin in an interview.

She is a self-described "hard-core conservative" who opposes abortion and gay marriage, looks favorably on teaching creationism in public schools, and considers the Republican platform "the right agenda for Alaska." Nonetheless, Palin says she sees her victory as part of the national antiestablishment wave that resulted in Democratic control of Congress. She has pledged to run a nonpartisan administration, but sees herself as being on a housecleaning mission, with her own party as a target.

"I am convinced that Alaskans want positive change, and I've taken that to mean in the party itself," she says. Tougher on Big Oil

High on her priority list is a plan to take a tougher line with the oil industry, which she says has been "making mind-boggling profits" from Alaska's resources.

"The oil companies, the executives, are doing exactly what they're supposed to do. You take as much as possible and leave as little as possible behind," she says. The governor needs to ensure that the citizens get as much benefit as possible, "which includes more than just looking out for the bottom line."

Also a top priority, she says, is restoring a sense of ethics to a state where citizens are weary of government scandals.

Palin gained much of her prominence as a whistle-blower. After she was appointed by Governor Murkowski to the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission, she started bucking the Republican Party leadership over ethics lapses. She blew the whistle on state GOP Chairman Randy Ruedrich when he was a fellow oil and gas commissioner. In 2003, he was forced to resign his regulatory post and pay a record $12,000 fine. She and a Democratic state lawmaker filed an ethics complaint against the state attorney general, Gregg Renkes, who resigned under fire.

"The Randy Ruedrich thing was a huge deal. I think that's when her popularity really started to increase," says Ivan Moore, an Anchorage-based pollster who generally works for Democrats.

Although she campaigned for Murkowski in 2002, she became his consistent critic after he was elected. She was outspoken about the financial deal he negotiated with the three major oil producers for a $20 billion natural-gas pipeline. She and others derided the deal - never ratified by the legislature - as a giveaway to the oil industry.

Palin has paid a price for her outspokenness. Mr. Ruedrich, still party chairman, seldom talks to her, and the state party gave her no money during the general election. Criticized as a 'lightweight'

During the campaign, opponents criticized her for being vague on the issues, and one even took a jab at her intelligence. "I don't hear an answer to my question, so I'm going to repeat it to you, and I'll say it slower," independent Andrew Halcro told her during one debate.

Palin says she has faced the "lightweight" charge before. She was greeted with similar skepticism when, at 32, she was elected mayor of Wasilla. During her tenure, she sometimes worked with an infant daughter asleep under her desk in a car seat.

But voters this year welcomed her outsider status as a former "hockey mom" who spent part of each summer working as a commercial fisherman in Bristol Bay. That stood in sharp contrast to both Murkowski, who served as a US senator for 22 years before becoming governor, and Mr. Knowles, who served two terms in Palin's new job.

A Public Servant To The Last (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102882

In 1961, Ed McGaffigan Jr. was a seventh-grader from Boston watching the inauguration on television when a president told him to ask what he could do for his country.

The son of an Irish immigrant laborer, McGaffigan had a ready answer, as did many of his generation: He could work for his country.

That inspired a three-decade career that included stints at the State Department, the White House, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, Capitol Hill and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, where last month McGaffigan became the agency's longest-serving commissioner.

McGaffigan, who turns 58 on Friday, would normally have many more years of service ahead. Instead, he is fighting an illness that threatens to vanquish him, and he is taking on one last assignment: closing his career in a way that inspires others to consider public service.

"I do what I do out of a deep sense of appreciation for the opportunities that this country gives people like my father and me," he said. "I'm proud to have been there, and proud to serve with a bunch of people as dedicated as I am.

"I hope there's another generation."

One recent rainy morning, McGaffigan, a physicist with thick gray hair and a runner's build, took his place at the front of the NRC's conference room for a celebration of his career. A line of masking tape on the carpet showed him where to stand, and he placed the toes of his shoes precisely on it.

There were jokes, gifts and tributes. "He can quote the most obscure regulations and give exact details on how they were written," said fellow commissioner Pete Lyons. He presented McGaffigan, a serial marathoner, with a specially produced audiobook to listen to while he runs: a recitation of 10 CFR 3240, "tests required for tritium-powered auto lock illuminators," a reg so obscure it stumped even McGaffigan.

Then it was McGaffigan's turn. "As long as I'm here," he said, "I'm going to be dedicated to making you all improve."

He wept a little. But he did not take his shoes off the tape.

McGaffigan was the first in his family to attend college, earning a physics degree, with honors, from Harvard, and master's degrees from the California Institute of Technology and Harvard's Kennedy School of Government. Since his education was underwritten by taxpayers, he decided, he said, to give them the benefit of the technical expertise they paid for.

While at Cal Tech, he took the foreign service exam, and in 1976 he joined the State Department. During that time, he served in the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, overseeing international scientific programs, and worked for two years in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, reporting on science, technology and atomic energy.

"I'm sort of an omnivore when it comes to scientific knowledge," he said. "That gave me an advantage."

In 1982, he married Peggy Weeks, whom he met through a friend. Through his former boss at State, Kennedy School professor Joseph Nye, he met Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.), and for the next 14 years he advised the senator in his work on the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The McGaffigans had a son, Edward, in 1984, and a daughter, Margaret, two years later. Soon after, Peggy McGaffigan developed Huntington's disease, a degenerative disease of the nervous system. Bingaman reduced McGaffigan's workload, giving him time to care for his wife and children.

"He was always very organized, always making lists," said Margaret, who goes by Meggy. Grocery lists, family appointments, the annotated Christmas shopping list his children found -- for a decade, his reams of routine have kept his household on task.

Meggy McGaffigan, a physics student, has begun an internship at the NRC, where, at least for a time, she'll work alongside her father.

"He's always told me and my brother that we can do what we want" as a career, she said. But it has been her father's dedication to public service "that kind of makes you wonder if that's something that we want to do."

Her father hopes other young idealists follow his path.

"With Kennedy, serving government was a noble cause," he said. "Now Republicans and Democrats alike bash government when it serves their purpose.

DOJ_NMG_0102883

"We are going to need a massive influx of young people. The answer is not contracts." Outsourcing the work of government technicians, he said, means "there are agencies where they can't do the calculations themselves any more. "

When McGaffigan was appointed to the NRC in 1996, his government experience helped the commission unravel a tangle of poor policies "one by one."

Today, he says, the NRC is "much more efficient, much more timely, more fair I believe and more transparent." At the height of this effort, in 1999, McGaffigan was diagnosed with melanoma and underwent extensive surgery. The following year, Peggy McGaffigan died. The day after her funeral, Ed McGaffigan was testifying on the Hill. "What we do is we go on," he said. "It's part of the duty thing."

Throughout his illness, McGaffigan has rarely spent more than a few days off the job.

"The odds are very, very stacked against me," he said. "But I'm going to remain commissioner as long as I'm of use."

Jeff Sharkey, McGaffigan's chief of staff, calls his boss "one of my heroes."

"He invests his entire character in this mission," he said, pausing to compose himself. "You want to do your very best for him."

A few weeks ago, McGaffigan asked his staff to help him write his obituary.

Filled with detailed instructions and proud anecdotes, "it shows what's important to him," Sharkey said. "He continues to be someone who shows others the way, . . . how to deal with things honorably, with grace and with dignity."

Today, Ed McGaffigan and his daughter will drive together to work. He's showing her the ropes, because too soon, Meggy McGaffigan will be working there alone.

"It's one of those things that goes unsaid," she said. Anyway, she knows what her father would tell her.

"Just go on to work like any other day," she said. "Just go on."

Potential Employees Express Lukewarm Interest In Working For The Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Many people the government wants as employees are interested in working for Uncle Sam, but they don't see the government as being as innovative and creative as the private sector, according to a Gallup survey released yesterday.

While survey respondents gave the government high marks on job security and compensation, only 3 percent said they see the government as more innovative and creative than the private sector, only 5 percent think it is better at recruiting the best and brightest, and only 6 percent viewed the government as providing a more competitive work environment.

The survey focused on young Americans from 18 to 29, known as Generation Y; professionals in such fields as engineering, law and the social sciences; and mid-career managers who work for nonprofit groups and in the private sector.

"The study makes a strong case that there is a significant disconnect to what targeted workers value in a job and the perception of what government offers compared to the private sector," said Patricia McGinnis, president of the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government.

It is the latest in a series of efforts aimed at helping the government cope with a wave of baby-boom retirements predicted to set off a "war for talent" with the private sector. The government is particularly vulnerable because substantial numbers of federal employees are projected to retire in 2008 and 2009 and because many young Americans do not view the government as their employer of first choice.

Respondents said they understood the duties of many federal agencies but that those agencies didn't necessarily strike them as interesting places to work.

For example, most said they knew the "key responsibility" of the U.S. Postal Service, Internal Revenue Service and Social Security Administration, but that did not translate into interest. However, respondents found the Defense Department, NASA and the CIA interesting and were clear on their missions. Two agencies, the State Department and the National Science Foundation, got mixed results -- respondents said that they were interesting places to work but that they had relatively little awareness about their key responsibilities.

DOJ_NMG_0102884

F. Warren Wright, a managing partner at the Gallup Organization, and Darby Miller Steiger, a senior research director for Gallup, presented the survey results at a breakfast forum sponsored by the Council for Excellence in Government and The Washington Post. The forum's audience included several dozen federal officials, including Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, who said she planned to bring the survey to the attention of top federal management officials.

The findings were based on responses from 2,596 participants from Sept. 20 to Oct. 2. The council and Gallup plan to partner on more efforts to collect data and views on federal workforce issues, Wright said.

The survey offered some reassurance that the government should be able to tap into Generation Y. Thirty-four percent of Gen Y respondents reported an interest in working for the government, which Wright called "very positive." Steiger said the response suggested that perhaps as many as 15 million young Americans might have an interest in a federal career, more than enough to fill openings in the federal workforce.

Gen Y respondents said they value workplaces that provide intellectual stimulation and opportunities for growth and advancement. But 77 percent said the private sector does a better job of providing an innovative and creative workplace; 58 percent said it does better at hiring the best and brightest. Fifty-five percent said the private sector pays better than the government.

The survey also targeted a segment of the population that McGinnis dubbed "Government-Go-Gets" because their occupations are vital to the future federal workforce. This group consisted of scientists, engineers and computer science professionals and people who work in law, public policy and the social services.

Thirty percent of the Gov-Go-Gets said they have an interest in working for the government, another encouraging response given that there will be "global competition" to hire from this group, Wright said.

Mary Cheney And Partner Are About To Be Moms (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Mary Cheney, the vice president's openly gay daughter, is pregnant. She and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, are "ecstatic" about the baby, due in late spring, said a source close to the couple.

It's a baby boom for grandparents Dick and Lynne Cheney: Their older daughter, Elizabeth, went on leave as deputy assistant secretary of state before having her fifth child in July. "The vice president and Mrs. Cheney are looking forward with eager anticipation to the arrival of their sixth grandchild," spokesman Lea Anne McBride said last night.

Cheney, 37, was a key aide to her father during the 2004 reelection campaign and now is vice president for consumer advocacy at AOL. Poe, 45, a former park ranger, is renovating their Great Falls home.

News of the pregnancy will undoubtedly reignite the debate about gay marriage. During the campaign, Mary Cheney was criticized by gay activists for not being more publicly supportive of same-sex marriage. Her father said people "ought to be free to enter into any kind of relationship they want to" but deferred to the president's policy supporting a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriages. Cheney herself called the proposed amendment "a gross affront to gays and lesbians everywhere" in her book, "Now It's My Turn: A Daughter's Chronicle of Political Life," which was published in May.

Cheney has described her relationship with Poe -- whom she took to last year's White House dinner honoring Prince Charles and Camilla-- as a marriage. The two met in 1988 while playing ice hockey and began dating four years later. They moved from Colorado to Virginia a year ago to be closer to Cheney's family. In an interview with the Post six months ago, when asked if she and Poe wanted children, Cheney said that was a "conversation I think I should have with Heather first."

In November, Virginia voters passed a state constitutional amendment banning gay marriage and civil unions; state law is unclear on whether Poe could have full legal rights as a parent of Cheney's child. The circumstances of the pregnancy will remain private, said the source close to the couple. This is the first child for both.

Baltimore's Channel 13, Preempted by Channel Faux

Poor Michael Richards. Seems people are willing to believe anything about him these days!

On at least two of its Monday evening news broadcasts, Baltimore's Channel 13 reported that the disgraced "Seinfeld" comic had apologized for yet another racial uproar, when he showed up in blackface at a celebrity roast for Whoopi Goldberg.

DOJ_NMG_0102885

What, you didn't hear about that one? Yee-e-e-ah, well, see, that's probably because it's not true. A WJZ staffer ripped the story off the Web -- without realizing that the source, DatelineHollywood.com, is a purely satirical site, which invented the completely bogus item as a riff on Richards's real-life racist outburst at an L.A. comedy club last month.

"This was an error in judgment by one of our producers who did not follow our established policy," said station spokeswoman Liz Chuday. "She failed to verify a story from a publication we were not familiar with before it aired." The station caught the error in time to issue a correction by the 11 p.m. broadcast.

The producer missed some pretty obvious tipoffs-- like the line about Richards pouring Aunt Jemima pancake syrup over Goldberg's head. Also: The links to other "articles," including " Kid Rock Seeks Physical Custody of Pamela Anderson's Twins" and " Rupert Murdoch Found Dead Next to Bloody Glove."

"Get out!" laughed Dateline: Hollywood creator Ben Fritz when we told him his fake news made the real news. The former political writer -- a recent transplant from Adams Morgan to L.A. -- said this wasn't the first time the site's satire cut too close to the bone.

"Last year we had an article about how Pat Robertson said Katrina happened because they picked Ellen DeGeneres to host the Emmys."

No, of course he never said that, but "a lot of people thought that was real."

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

? Laura Bush doing some Christmas shopping at Brooks Brothers Saturday morning. The first lady and a handful of pals dropped by the Connecticut Avenue store, where she picked up (spoiler alert, Mr. President!) cashmere sweaters and socks -- just before D.C.'s tax-free shopping week came to a close.

? John McCain scarfing down a two-pound lobster. The former Navy pilot attended the Army-Navy game in Philly Saturday, then celebrated Navy's 26-14 victory at the Old Original Bookbinder's restaurant. Impressive, but still well short of the four-pound crustacean that GOP rival George Pataki tackled at the Palm earlier this fall.

? David Gregory buying a cartful of Jell-O pudding snacks in the Cleveland Park Giant on Sunday. The NBC White House correspondent's 4-year-old son knocked out a tooth on the playground, and his doting dad was loading up soft-food treats.

U.S. Offers North Korea Aid For Dropping Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And David E. Sanger

New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The United States has offered a detailed package of economic and energy assistance in exchange for North Korea's giving up nuclear weapons and technology, American officials said Tuesday.

But the offer, made last week during two days of intense talks in Beijing, would hinge on North Korea's agreeing to begin dismantling some of the equipment it is using to expand its nuclear arsenal, even before returning to negotiations.

It is unclear whether North Korea will accept the offer, which is more specific — in both the details and the timing — than a vaguely worded statement of principles that the North signed in September 2005, a year before its first nuclear test.

The combination of incentives and demands was the focal point of three-way meetings on Nov. 28 and 29 involving Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill; North Korea's vice foreign minister, Kim Kye-gwan; and Chinese officials at the Diaoyutai State Guesthouse in Beijing. The incentives offered by the United States include food aid from the United States, Japan and South Korea, a senior administration official said.

The offer is significant because the administration has resisted making clear to North Korea exactly what kind of aid it would receive if it agreed to begin taking apart facilities like the plutonium reprocessing facility that turns spent fuel into weapons, and to provide a list of all its nuclear facilities. Hawks in the administration, particularly in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, have long opposed what they call "rewarding" North Korea for its nuclear test.

But State Department officials have argued that while the argument has gone on in Washington, the North has produced fuel for six or more weapons. They say the only successful strategy will be one that results in the beginning of dismantlement.

The incentives package also includes a pledge by the United States to work with North Korea toward finding a way to end the financial restrictions placed last year on a Macao bank, Banco Delta Asia, that was a main hub of the North's international financial transactions. The Bush administration accused Banco Delta Asia of helping North Korea to launder money from drug smuggling and other illicit activities and to pass counterfeit $100 bills manufactured by the North's government.

While the United States remains unwilling to lift the sanctions until the counterfeiting issue is resolved, a senior administration official said American officials had told the North Koreans they would work with them on the issue. "We would help them to help themselves," the official said. "We would expect them to come forward with what they know, and we'd work through the problem."

Describing the North Koreans' response to the entire package of incentives and demands, the official, who was in the room during the exchanges in Beijing, said: "They listened intently. They were clearly in a listening and probing mode, and they said they were glad to be hearing this from us."

The Beijing discussions took place in advance of planned six-country talks on the nuclear program. Diplomats from the other five countries — the United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — are wary that the off-again, on-again talks risk irrelevancy; they began in 2003 and have yet to produce anything beyond the agreement in principle of dismantlement for eventual aid.

No date has been set for the official talks.

North Korea boycotted the six-party talks last year after the United States cracked down on Banco Delta Asia, and on Oct. 9, Pyongyang conducted a nuclear test. On Oct. 31, North Korea agreed to return to the six-party talks.

Since then, though, American officials have balked at scheduling a meeting until first receiving a commitment from the North to start dismantling the nuclear program.

World Powers Fail To Reach Iran Accord (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, December 6, 2006

Six world powers made "substantive progress" but failed to reach an accord Tuesday on a U.N. resolution to punish Iran for defying demands to halt its nuclear program, the French Foreign Ministry said after talks in Paris.

Tehran made a new threat of retaliation if the powers opted for sanctions.

"We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions targeting proliferation-sensitive activities. There remain several outstanding issues, upon which we will reflect over the coming days," the French ministry said in a statement. "We are now close to a conclusion of this process."

The talks brought together diplomats from the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — the permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — as well as Germany and a representative of EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

After months of diplomatic wrangling, the United States and France had hoped Tuesday's talks would produce a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for defying an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. Western powers accuse Iran of seeking nuclear bombs, while Tehran insists it only wants nuclear energy.

The five permanent U.N. Security Council members plus Germany remained split over key questions of visa bans and asset freezes for Iranians linked to nuclear development, which Russia is resisting, according to a top European diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

The discussions now move to the United Nations in New York. The Americans and Europeans are pushing for a resolution by the end of the year.

"We are coming up to the time (when) the credibility of the U.N. is at stake," U.S. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington before the Paris talks.

DOJ_NMG_0102887

Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed Tuesday to stick by the nuclear program and issued a new threat to downgrade relations with the 25-nation EU if European negotiators opted for tough U.N. sanctions. He gave no details on how ties might be downgraded. The EU is Iran's biggest trading partner.

Illustrating the divisions that have tangled the negotiations, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that imposing wide-ranging sanctions would be irresponsible.

"We believe that to impose these kind of sanctions would be ... disproportionate to the real situation. We will achieve the opposite results," Lavrov said in Brussels. "We believe this is wrong. We will work in a more responsible way."

Still, the high-ranking European diplomat said the Russians made some concessions at Tuesday's talks. The Russians agreed to a measure prohibiting financial transfers to "problematic" Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs, the diplomat said.

Russia still opposes the broader asset freeze that the European players — Britain, France and Germany — proposed in a draft U.N. resolution presented in October, the diplomat said.

And the question of travel bans for those involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs remains "blocked," he said. The Europeans and Americans support the bans and Russia opposes them.

The Russians also remain resistant to a measure expanding the powers of the International Atomic Energy Agency to monitor Iran's nuclear program, considering that a "provocation" to Iran, the diplomat said.

The draft resolution would exempt a nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr in Iran, but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor. Russia wants to remove any mention of Bushehr.

Washington's patience appears to be wearing thin.

When asked earlier Tuesday when he expected Russia and China to join the others in supporting the resolution, the American participant in the discussions, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, replied: "This afternoon would be a good time."

No Deal On Iran Sanctions At Paris Talks (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

Six world powers meeting in Paris said they had failed to agree what sanctions to impose over Iran's refusal to halt sensitive nuclear work, as diplomats said that Russia was blocking a deal.

Top diplomats from the five veto-wielding UN Security Council members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- plus Germany and a European Union envoy, took part in the talks.

"We made substantive progress on the scope of the sanctions, targeting proliferation sensitive activities," the French foreign ministry, which hosted the meeting, said in a statement afterwards.

"We are now close to a conclusion of this process," it added, but said there were still "several outstanding issues".

"The next step will be in New York," it said, in a reference to the headquarters of the United Nations, without specifying when the next round of talks would take place.

The six powers are trying to agree what economic sanctions to impose on Iran for ignoring a UN deadline of August 31 to stop enriching uranium -- which outside powers fear could be used to make nuclear weapons.

Moscow and Beijing -- who have strong economic interests in Iran -- have tried to water down a draft UN Security Council resolution drawn up by France, Britain and Germany, while Washington wants to beef the text up.

The European draft would bar trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and impose financial and travel restrictions on persons and agencies involved.

According to diplomats in Paris, Russia -- though willing to back the trade ban -- is still opposed to sanctions being applied to individuals.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said earlier Tuesday that Moscow would support a ban on shipments of sensitive goods but said broader sanctions would be counter-productive.

DOJ_NMG_0102888

"We believe it is necessary to approve the proposal on forbidding deliveries of technology, material and services in the field of uranium enrichment, chemical processing of radioactive fuel, and heavy-water technology to Iran from abroad," he was quoted as saying by Ria Novosti news agency.

He criticised "our Western partners" for supporting the adoption of wide-reaching sanctions that are "not proportionate" to the monitoring capacity of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"Such a wholesale approach to banning cooperation with Iran in various spheres will only exacerbate the situation," he said.

The meeting in the French capital came after Tehran warned it would take any attempt to thwart its nuclear programme as an "act of hostility".

In Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Europe that international action over Iran's nuclear programme could endanger relations with Tehran.

"If you (Europeans) continue making efforts to halt the progress of the Iranian nuclear programme and if you take any step against the Iranian nation's rights, either in propaganda or international bodies, the Islamic republic will consider this an act of hostility," Ahmadinejad said in a speech.

"And if you continue with this, the Iranian nation will revise the direction of its path and its plans related to you," he said.

The six powers suspect Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian power generation programme -- which Tehran strongly denies.

On Sunday, Israel approved the creation of a new ministry for strategic affairs, mainly to deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Iran Tells Arabs To Oust U.S. (WT/AP)

By Jim Krane

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- Iran's top national security official urged Arabs yesterday to expel the U.S. military from bases in the region and instead join Tehran in a regional security alliance.

The offer was a strong sign of Iran's rising assertiveness in its contest with the United States for influence in the region.

Persian Gulf countries, suspicious of Iran's intentions, are unlikely to respond to the call and push out the U.S. military or end U.S. security deals they view as offering them an umbrella of protection, many here said.

But smaller countries, such as Kuwait, do have to tread a fine line of not antagonizing either Washington or Tehran. Some Gulf countries refused to participate in recent U.S. Navy maneuvers in the Gulf so as not to offend Iran.

Iran's top national security official, Ali Larijani, apparently aimed to allay Arab concerns and raise suspicion about U.S. intentions in his speech yesterday. He told Arab business leaders and political analysts that Washington is indifferent to their interests and will cast them aside when they are no longer useful.

"The security and stability of the region needs to be attained and we should do it inside the region, not through bringing in foreign forces," Mr. Larijani said. "We should stand on our own feet."

Such words are a direct rejection by Iran of the "notion that it can be contained," said Vali Nasr, an Iran specialist with the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations, who attended the conference.

Speakers at the Arab Strategy Forum said they think Iran's rising clout came as a direct result of the faltering U.S. policy in Iraq that has put Iran's Shi'ite allies in control of the government in Baghdad.

Mr. Larijani's proposal outlines what analysts here describe as an attempt to split the Arab world into two camps: a U.S.-Israeli-Arab coalition that seeks to contain Iran and an anti-American, anti-Israeli alliance led by Iran.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called for wiping Israel off the map and expressed doubts about the Holocaust. Yesterday, Iran's foreign ministry said it will hold a two-day international conference next week on the Holocaust to examine the event without any "preconceived ideas."

Most Arab governments remain firm U.S. allies, but Persian Iran's tough stance against Israel and the West has broad grass-roots appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0102889

Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and other Sunni-dominated countries have expressed misgivings about the growing influence of Iran's Shi'ite-dominated government, which in the 1980s sought to export its Islamic revolution and topple neighboring governments.

"Nobody is asking the Americans to pack up and leave," said Abdulkhaleq Abdulla, a Dubai-based political analyst. "There are vital American interests here, and the smaller Arab countries need protection."

Mr. Larijani expressed annoyance at Arab fears about Iranian intentions, saying Iran and its Sunni-dominated neighbors have more in common with each other than with the United States or Israel.

He assured Arab leaders that Iran seeks "peaceful coexistence" and could replace the security umbrella of U.S. bases in the region.

Iran Invites Scholars To Assess Holocaust As History Or Fiction (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 5 — The Iranian authorities, who have frequently accused the Jews of distorting history to legitimize Israel, announced plans on Tuesday for an international conference on the Holocaust.

They said the conference, to be held in Tehran next Monday and Tuesday, would include more than 60 scholars from 30 countries and would examine a range of issues, including whether the gas chambers were actually used.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, stirred outrage in the West last year when he stated on several occasions that the Holocaust, in which six million Jews perished at the hands of the Nazis, was either greatly exaggerated or an outright myth. He also called more than once for Israel to be wiped off the map.

Deputy Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mohammadi said at a news conference here that the seminar flowed from Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments.

Beyond questioning the Holocaust, Mr. Ahmadinejad has said the Jews have used it as a propaganda tool to promote Israel's interests. Since several European countries make Holocaust denial a crime, he says scholars there are not free to do honest research on the subject.

Mr. Mohammadi said the conference would "provide the opportunity for scholars from both sides to give their papers in freedom and without preconceived ideas." He refused to give the names of the 67 scholars invited to attend the seminar out of fear that their countries would prohibit them from coming.

The conference does not mean that Iran "denies the crimes of Hitler," he added. "Since we are not accused and responsible for the Holocaust, we are an impartial judge."

The Foreign Ministry is sponsoring the event though its Institute for Political and International Studies, whose Web site says, "The word 'Holocaust,' which entered the political literature during the Second World War, turned into one of the most important propaganda tools used to politically justify the support for the Jewish People in the 20th century."

It invited participants to submit their papers on a range of nearly 30 subjects including the nature of anti-Semitism, Jews in Iran and Islam, Zionism, gas chambers, freedom of speech and how the law treats those who deny the Holocaust.

Mr. Mohammadi dismissed the notion that the seminar could promote anti-Semitism, saying anti-Semitism was a Western phenomenon. The proof for that, he said, was Iran's community of 25,000 Jews.

The announcement came as foreign ministers of the permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — Britain, France, China, Russia and the United States — plus Germany met in France to discuss possible sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its nuclear program.

The United Nations had demanded that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment program by Aug. 31. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Military May Not Be Able To Halt Protests (WT/AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102890

BEIRUT -- Shi'ite Muslims yesterday buried a man killed in street clashes in a Sunni Muslim neighborhood as Lebanon's army commander warned that the military may not be able to contain further protests linked to the country's tense political standoff.

Army commander Gen. Michel Suleiman urged politicians to compromise, according to comments quoted in several Beirut newspapers.

After another night of unrest in the capital, Prime Minister Fuad Siniora warned the situation could get out of control.

"No one can impose control on the streets, and this has been proven," he told hundreds of supporters who converged throughout the day on his office complex, which was ringed by barbed wire, combat troops and riot police.

Outside, thousands of opposition protesters were gathered near Mr. Siniora's offices and in several other downtown squares in yet another evening of rallies aimed at bringing down the government. Many have been camped out near the prime minister's headquarters since Friday.

In a new tactic last night, they aimed two powerful floodlights at the government complex. Troops installed more barbed wire and other fortifications.

Lebanon's political confrontation breaks down along dangerous sectarian lines. The U.S.-backed government is supported largely by Sunnis, while the opposition -- led by the pro-Syrian Hezbollah -- has wide support among Shi'ites. Lebanon's Christians are split between the two camps. Hezbollah is demanding the formation of a new government giving it and its allies a larger share of power.

The standoff shows no sign of waning despite calls from the two sides for dialogue to resolve their differences. The Arab League secretary general has visited to try to help, as did Jordan's foreign minister. Egypt's Beirut envoy also has been making the rounds.

After several days of trading accusations in the media, rival Lebanese leaders opened direct channels. A Sunni scholar in the opposition went to the government headquarters to discuss ideas on resolving the crisis, and the government gave him its own proposals, including the possible expansion of the current Cabinet to satisfy opposition demands, Youth and Sports Minister Ahmed Fatfat told reporters.

Shi'ite leaders tried to put the lid on the boiling sectarian tension and prevent revenge attacks after the killing of 21-year-old Shi'ite protester Ahmed Mahmoud, who was shot while walking Sunday with other protesters through the Sunni neighborhood of Qasqas. Twenty-one persons were wounded in the violence.

In a Shi'ite district not far from the shooting scene, Mr. Mahmoud's comrades from the Shi'ite Amal party and relatives took turns carrying his coffin. About 2,000 people, many holding Lebanese and green Amal flags, marched behind. A band played martial music. Some of the Shi'ites beat their heads with their hands in a traditional sign of mourning.

The funeral march made its way to the Rawdat al-Shahidein cemetery, where a senior Shi'ite cleric led the prayer over the coffin amid wails of relatives and calls of "God is great."

With Street Protests, Hezbollah Gambles In Quest For Dominance (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 5 -- Hezbollah has entered territory uncharted in its 24-year history as armed militia, social welfare group and nascent political party, effectively seeking an unprecedented, decisive say in Lebanese politics to protect what it sees as its interests from foes at home and abroad.

The month-long political crisis that has roiled Lebanon, hurtling it dangerously close to the precipice of civil war, marks a revealing shift for the Shiite Muslim movement that for years, at least rhetorically, tried to stay above politics, entering the cabinet for the first time in 2005.

Now, by mobilizing its rank and file and pouring them into downtown Beirut to topple the government, the movement has framed that pursuit for political power in the same martial language of this summer's war with Israel.

The imagery is often blunt: "Just as I promised you victory in the past, I promise you victory once again," goes a recording by Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah played over and over, igniting cheers each time. Banners on tents, housing thousands of supporters camped out in front of the government headquarters, display the slogan: "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming."

"Everything is at stake for Hezbollah," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb, an analyst on Hezbollah and a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment Middle East Center in Beirut. "There is no way that Hezbollah would back down."

"They're putting this political struggle on a par with the military struggle to show how significant it is strategically," she added. "It's basically an existential struggle for Hezbollah. It's an extension of its war with Israel."

The protests that began last week continued Tuesday, part carnival, part show of force. The crisis has myriad dimensions: notably a contest over ideology toward Israel and a battle over whose patrons -- the United States and France on the government's side, Syria and Iran on Hezbollah's -- will have a greater say here.

And the protests are rife with irony. In pursuit of its political aims, Hezbollah has employed tactics praised by the Bush administration when mass demonstrations took place after the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005 helped end Syria's 29-year military presence in the country.

In the street today is a somewhat unlikely coalition of Shiites loyal to Hezbollah and to the allied Amal movement, and Christian supporters of Michel Aoun, an influential former general. The protests themselves represent an unprecedented attempt at popular pressure by Islamic movements that often act, or are forced to act, clandestinely in the Middle East.

But there remains a relentless logic to today's demonstrations: an attempt by Hezbollah to resolve in its favor the political uncertainty that has reigned since the Syrian withdrawal from a country in which two camps contest nearly every aspect of Lebanese political life. At stake, almost everyone agrees, is the direction of the state.

"This is not about one more cabinet minister or one less for either them or us. It is a battle equally important for them and for us," said Samir Geagea, veteran of a civil war militia who supports Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government.

Nayla Moawad, the minister of social affairs, was more direct. "This is a coup d'etat," she said.

"A balance of power within the government will be a guarantee for both sides," countered Amin Sherri, a Hezbollah member of parliament. "Before they were giving us a choice between bad and worse. We don't want to go on like this."

"We don't want to be merely witnesses to decision-making on important issues," he added.

Since Hezbollah's creation with Iranian patronage in the wake of the 1982 Israeli invasion, the group has often operated in different environments. During the civil war that ended in 1990, there were no rules. Afterward, Syria, long the kingmaker here, protected Hezbollah's interests, as well as determined the country's foreign policy. After the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon in 2000, Hezbollah's popularity swelled, its militia credited with what most in Lebanon considered a victory.

But in the tumult and uncertainty of Lebanese politics today, once unasked questions are up for grabs: whether Hezbollah can keep its arms; its ties to Syria and Iran; the country's posture toward Israel and the United States; and the balance of power among Sunnis, Shiites and divided Christians. Underlying them is another question, sharpened by the contention of Hezbollah's foes that it started the latest war with Israel: Who has the right to make war and peace in Lebanon?

"The state, before the assassination of Hariri, was used to protect and embrace Hezbollah. The whole state served to protect it. And now this state has ended. So Hezbollah is looking for an internal role, to enter the political equation, and its entry into politics represents a huge upheaval," said Hazem al-Amin, an analyst of Shiite politics and writer for al-Hayat newspaper.

"Hezbollah wants to try its political training on us," he added.

Hezbollah's transformation over the years marks one of the most striking transformations of any Islamic organization in the Middle East. In its early years, it was notorious for imposing draconian restrictions in southern Lebanon -- banning mixed sunbathing and women's swimsuits at beaches, closing coffee shops, and prohibiting parties and dancing. Since then, it has evolved from a shadowy organization blamed for two attacks on the U.S. Embassy and the 1983 bombing of the Marine barracks here, killing 241 soldiers, into a sprawling movement that fields a crack militia, serves in parliament and delivers welfare -- from education to compensation for war damages -- for its Shiite constituency, Lebanon's largest community.

Through that evolution, the movement has adapted itself at turning points in Lebanon's history. It took part in parliamentary elections in 1992 after the civil war. After the Syrian withdrawal, it entered the cabinet for the first time. As pressure built for its disarmament, as called for by U.N. Resolution 1559, it struck its alliance with Aoun a year ago. Each turn can be read as defensive: protecting its weapons, preventing Lebanon from growing too close to the United States, and promoting the ambitions of the Shiite community, long disenfranchised and still sometimes perceived as second class.

But the protests underway mark a far less certain tactic for Hezbollah than past decisions to participate in parliament or the cabinet. The stakes are higher -- bringing down the government -- and the outcome for a group that prides itself on deliberation, caution and prudence is by no means certain. The implications for its Shiite constituency are similarly ambiguous. A debate remains in Lebanon over what precisely Hezbollah wants and how much the rest of Lebanon is willing to give.

"They sort of painted themselves in a corner, and it's very difficult to back out now," said Timur Goksel, a former spokesman and adviser to the U.N. peacekeeping force here. That strategy entailed risk in Lebanon's notoriously mercurial, even cynical politics, he said. "At the moment, they are spending a lot of the capital they made out of this summer's war. Getting involved in local politics can erode the party's popularity very quickly."

In some ways, he added, "fighting Israel is much easier."

In the protests themselves, canvas tents sprawling across downtown during the day, engulfed by crowds at night, Hezbollah has played down any sectarian ambitions. Rather, it has promoted the protests as a campaign for "national unity." "One, united," banners read at the protest and on the movement's television station, al-Manar. On a recent night, a Hezbollah guard discouraged a couple from bringing a Hezbollah banner to the stage. "Please, only Lebanese flags tonight," he said.

Another dominant theme is resistance to American influence in Lebanon. That message appeals to its constituency, bitter over U.S. support for Israel in this summer's war, and underlines the almost existential threat that Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, perceives in a government too closely allied with the United States and its ambitions in the region.

"Hezbollah was extremely anxious where the country was heading. It seemed to be heading straight into the U.S. orbit. It was turning into a satellite state," said Saad-Ghorayeb, the analyst. "If they back down now, they will have effectively given up on Lebanon. That would mean Lebanon falls to their enemy, the United States and Israel."

Banners condemn Jeffrey D. Feltman, the U.S. ambassador in Lebanon, who is often a target of Nasrallah's speeches. "The government of Feltman," one slogan reads, "We'll bring it down." A homemade billboard was set up near Hussein Ismail, a 15-year-old protester from the southern town of Kafra. Under a picture of Siniora and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, it read, "Congratulations to the bride and groom." Another pictured the two shaking hands. "Peace with the enemies," it read.

"This is a struggle with a government that is not Lebanese but rather American," he said. "We want a Lebanese government that doesn't take its decisions from the Americans and the Zionists."

Behind Ismail was another poster of Nasrallah. "He promised a victory, and a victory is coming, just like he said."

Textbooks In Israel To Designate West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 5 -- Maps in future Israeli public school textbooks will show the boundary that existed between Israel and the West Bank before the 1967 Middle East war, Israel's education minister announced Tuesday. The move drew sharp protest from lawmakers, settler groups and religious leaders who claim the West Bank as part of the Jewish state.

The minister, Yuli Tamir, is a member of the Labor Party and a founder of the advocacy group Peace Now, which opposes Jewish settlement in the occupied territories. Palestinians envision a future state in the West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem, all of which Israel occupied in 1967.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has stated that Israel should evacuate parts of the West Bank so as to define its borders around land with a solid Jewish majority. He has said that several large Israeli settlement blocs in the West Bank would be included as part of Israel in any final peace deal.

The Israeli government has frequently criticized the Palestinians and neighboring Arab states for using maps in classrooms that do not define the state of Israel, now 58 years old. The maps generally mark it as "Palestine."

Israel's policy of not marking the West Bank began soon after it captured the territory from Jordan in the 1967 war. Most school maps now evoke Jewish history by labeling the territory by the Biblical terms "Judea and Samaria."

DOJ_NMG_0102893

In defending her order in interviews with Israeli reporters Tuesday, Tamir noted the difficulty in pressuring Arab countries to mark Israel on maps when the Jewish state does not designate the West Bank as a separate entity on its own maps. She told Israel's Army Radio that "if we don't show these borders, we will turn out very confused children."

"You cannot expect children to understand history if portions are excised from school texts," said Tamir, a professor of political philosophy at Tel Aviv University.

The order drew angry reactions from legislators affiliated with parties that claim the West Bank as part of "greater Israel," an area that they generally define as stretching from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River.

Roughly 250,000 Jewish settlers live in the West Bank beyond Israeli-annexed East Jerusalem, amid approximately 2.5 million Palestinians.

"In general, I'm not against giving all the information there is to students," said Shaul Goldstein, head of the Gush Etzion settlement bloc south of Jerusalem. "On the other hand, it's obvious she is doing this for political reasons, to educate our youth that 'this land is not ours.' "

Israel Radio reported that a group of conservative rabbis issued a religious decree prohibiting the use of any textbooks whose maps show the "Green Line," the 1949 armistice line separating Israel and the West Bank.

Ronit Tirosh, a legislator from Olmert's centrist Kadima party and a former director general of the Education Ministry, told reporters Tuesday that Tamir "cannot decide for Israeli pupils what is part of Israel and what isn't." Israeli officials estimate it will take more than a year for new maps to reach Israeli classrooms if the policy proceeds.

Olmert, whose governing coalition includes Labor as its largest member, said after meeting with Tamir that "there is no reason not to mark the Green Line and where the borders of the country were in 1967," according to the Ynetnews Web site.

"But there is a duty to present the fact that the government's stance and the consensus in the country rule out returning to the 1967 borders," Olmert added.

Palestinian-al Qaeda Plans (WT)

By Louis Rene Beres And Clare M. Lopez

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Most Palestinian communities across the world were jubilant on September 11, 2001. This past June, these very same communities expressed outrage at the successful American assassination of terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. For them, the murderous mastermind of al Qaeda in Iraq had been a great hero. Dead, he was now a "martyr."

But the Palestinian link to al Qaeda has become more than mere sympathy and friendship. Al Qaeda has now set its sights on Israel and on an incremental takeover of the Palestinian cause. This is the next phase of its campaign to dominate the Muslim world and re-establish an Islamic Caliphate.

In the wake of Israel's withdrawal from Gaza in August 2005, and Hezbollah's war with Israel in July 2006, al Qaeda perceives a unique opportunity. With chaos gripping both the Palestinian Authority and the Lebanese political scene, al Qaeda has precisely the opening it needs to counter Iran's radical Shi'ite expansionism and to acquire a necessary foothold in the region. Its direct entry into the Arab-Israeli conflict could produce major instabilities and war.

A common hatred of the United States and Israel facilitates networks of tactical cooperation between Palestinians and al Qaeda. These alignments have functioned for some time in Gaza, the West Bank, Jordan and Lebanon. Shadowy connections exist among clandestine cells that now stretch from the Sinai, across the border into Gaza, and on up to the refugee camps in Lebanon. They involve information sharing, weaponry, safe houses and scientific expertise. The overriding purpose of these alignments is future terror attacks against both Israel and the United States. These planned operations could include chemical, biological or even nuclear technologies.

None of this should be a surprise. Immediately after September 11, not only Hamas approached al Qaeda, but so too did Yasser Arafat's own forces. Fatah, formed as Mr. Arafat's personal movement to dominate the PLO, had openly embraced "martyrdom operations" against Israeli women and children as the al-Aqsa Intifada first unfolded in 2001. Although Palestinian terrorists hardly needed al Qaeda to prod them to commit further acts of cruelty, the example of September 11 seemed to offer them both comfort and resolve. For its part, al Qaeda has been more than pleased that its Palestinian collaborators now cite frequently to the sacred Hadith: "Oh, Allah, annihilate the Jews and their supporters."

The glorification of killing for Islam has infiltrated previously secular Palestinian terror groups by way of Iranian-influenced Hezbollah, just as it has affected al Qaeda. In addition to the usual sanctification of "suicide bombing," both also approve of certain religion-based killings within the Islamic community. Both term Muslims who allegedly collaborate with the United States murtaddun (apostates) and both prescribe the sentence of murtadd harbi; to wit, the "ally with Satan" is condemned with a fatwa that pronounces a death sentence. The pertinent Koranic verse is this: "The punishment of those who wage war against Allah and His Prophet and strive to make mischief in the land, is only this -- that they should be murdered or crucified, or their hands and feet should be cut off on opposing sides." There is no difference here between man and woman: "It is permissible to shed the blood of a woman who is a heretic [harbiyya] even if her fighting is limited to singing."

Despite these factors that first allowed al Qaeda to obtain a foothold within the Palestinian cause -- a cause that had been ignored by Osama bin Laden before his 1998 Declaration of War Against Crusaders and Jews -- such an alliance is not necessarily "natural." Nor are Palestinian groups such as Hamas automatically inclined to welcome al Qaeda's growing presence in the territories. In addition to tensions that exist between Sunni offshoots of the Muslim Brotherhood (such as Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad) and the Iranian Shi'ite proxy group Hezbollah, the international jihad mission of al Qaeda goes far beyond the essentially nationalist, territorial objectives of local groups that have been fighting Israel for decades.

Historically, al Qaeda has sought various security vacuums from which to operate -- e.g., Afghanistan, Somalia, Iraq and Pakistan's wild border region. It now seeks the Palestinian Territories. As far back as December 2002, al Qaeda first announced the establishment of the Islamic Al-Maida Organization in Palestine. This announcement declared "a vow of allegiance to the Emir of the Mujahedeen, the leader Osama bin Laden, by means of whom Allah strengthened the Nation of Islam." Calling for an end to regimes that "serve only the murderous Jews and the Great Satan," the announcement ended with a plea to "our brothers in Islam in Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia to attack the American interests and the heretical institutions of apostasy... Death to the Jews and Zionism; death to America; strength to Allah, Allah is great, and victory to Islam."

It was Israel's 2005 withdrawal from Gaza that provided the first real opportunity for al Qaeda operatives to cross over newly opened border crossings from Sinai. Then, Iran's unleashing of its Lebanese Hezbollah proxy against Israel in the summer of 2006 alerted al Qaeda that a resurgent radical Shi'ism meant to stake its own claim to the Palestinian campaign against Israel. While Hamas' January 2006 electoral victory signaled the demise of Fatah, that terror group was not willing to go down without a fight. Hamas is not Fatah's only enemy, however, as a noose of hatred draws more tightly around Israel. In September, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas lost his top intelligence officer and four bodyguards in a shooting ambush claimed brazenly by al Qaeda.

All sides now openly admit to al Qaeda's expanding presence. In Sinai, a mixed Bedouin-Palestinian wing of al Qaeda operates under the name "al Qaeda Organization in the Land of the Nile." In Gaza, a group calling itself "al Qaeda Organization in the Border Districts" has surfaced. In October 2005, Israel's military intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. Aharon Zeevi-Parkash, called al Qaeda's growing interest in Israel "a real threat." Retired Brig. Gen. Danny Arditi, who heads the counterterrorism department of the Israeli National Security Council, confirmed to Army Radio that al Qaeda had infiltrated Gaza from the southern Egyptian border after Israel's disengagement. In a September 2005 interview, Hamas spokesman Mahmoud al-Zahar confirmed the infiltration of al Qaeda members into Gaza, noting not only a physical infiltration, but claiming the existence of contacts from Gaza with al Qaeda centers in other countries. The wary working relationship between Hamas and al Qaeda notwithstanding, the Muslim Brotherhood has launched a propaganda campaign against al Qaeda throughout the Arab world. Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah is frankly antagonistic to al Qaeda's spreading influence in Lebanon, and has acknowledged al Qaeda's involvement there by terming it a "dangerous and unacceptable" situation.

Al Qaeda now operates secretly in the West Bank (Judea/Samaria) and openly in Gaza at the express invitation of Hamas. Relations with Fatah have deteriorated since Mr. Arafat first imported Hezbollah fighters to assist with terror attacks against Israel. Hezbollah and Iranian Revolutionary Guards have, in turn, helped to train a variety of Middle Eastern terrorists. Early on, Mr. Arafat had gathered together a diverse collection of Iranian Revolutionary Guards, Hezbollah, Popular Front-General Command and various Iraqi military intelligence units (Palestinian terrorists had always been extremely close to Saddam Hussein, even sending Palestinian Liberation Army units to help torture Kuwaitis in 1991). Also included were the pro-Iraqi Arab Liberation Front, and, since April 2002, al Qaeda.

Significantly, this same crosscut of Islamist terrorist groups presently exists in the United States -- although here they function "only" as fund-raising, propaganda, recruitment and sleeper-cell operatives. Al Qaeda's hatred of the United States has very little to do with American support for Israel. If Israel ceased to exist, its enmity for this country would continue unabated. This is because the United States is seen as the superpower leader of liberal democracy, wielding the ability to check al Qaeda's dream of a new global Caliphate. The unforgivable "sin" of American ties to "apostates and criminals" who rule in such Muslim countries as Egypt, the Emirates, Jordan, Kuwait, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia elicits the same implacable wrath as American support for Israel because both linkages weave a network of opposition to al Qaeda expansion.

Joint Palestinian-al Qaeda teams are planning coordinated mega-terror strikes against Israel and America. Simultaneously, a fight is taking shape among the major ideological factions of radical Islam. It follows that both Israel and the United States should immediately cease any and all assistance to the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority. Above all, it is time for Washington to stop sending American tax dollars to support archenemies of the United States.

Pakistani Says Concessions Could Produce Kashmir Pact (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

NEW DELHI, Dec. 5 — The Pakistani president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said in an Indian television program broadcast Tuesday that Islamabad could accept a solution to the festering dispute over Kashmir if New Delhi were to agree to greater autonomy and gradual demilitarization in the Indian-controlled swath of the territory.

“Inherently, both sides have to give up their positions,” he said in an interview with NDTV, a private television channel, according to a partial transcript of the interview on the station’s Web site.

General Musharraf’s comments are not entirely new. He has floated the idea of a Kashmir solution that makes borders “irrelevant” and gives the people of Kashmir self-rule, even as it keeps the two sides of Kashmir under the official territorial control of the two countries.

The remarks do signal, however, that even as official peace talks yield virtually no breakthroughs, the areas of disagreement between the rivals could well be shrinking.

Amitabh Matoo, the vice chancellor of the University of Jammu and a longtime observer of India-Pakistan negotiations, said General Musharraf’s comments had reflected “new flexibility in Pakistan’s Kashmir policy.”

“Clearly the back channels, which are active, have considerable space now to work with and arrive at, hopefully, a reconciliation of the two positions,” he said.

On what to do with the de facto border, the Line of Control, which divides the Indian- and Pakistani-controlled parts of Kashmir, no longer is there a sharp gulf in opinion. Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India has also hinted at the notion of a soft border, one that would allow families to continue to cross with little hindrance, even as he has repeatedly articulated the traditional Indian line. In short, the map of India, which includes Kashmir, would not be redrawn.

Nor is there major disagreement over the idea of greater self-rule by Kashmiris on both sides. The sticky part is how to do it.

General Musharraf called for what the NDTV transcript called “a joint supervision mechanism” across the Line of Control. India is unlikely to accept anything like a joint Kashmiri provincial administration, on the grounds that it would dilute Indian claims over its portion of the province.

According to one person familiar with the proceedings of the closed-door talks, who was not authorized to speak publicly on the matter, India could be open to a “joint institutional mechanism” to regulate certain interstate issues like transportation, water and environmental management.

DOJ_NMG_0102896

As for demilitarization, General Musharraf has repeatedly called on New Delhi to reduce the number of troops from its side of Kashmir, a demand that has met with an Indian retort to reduce the anti-Indian militant violence from across the border.

Hasan-Askari Rizvi, an independent political analyst in Lahore, saw both domestic and international motivation behind General Musharraf's comments. At home, Mr. Rizvi said, General Musharraf faces elections next year and would want to present himself as the architect of a new India-Pakistan accord.

"If India rejects his ideas straight away, Musharraf can show to the international community, especially the U.S., that India's inflexibility is the major obstacle to conflict resolution between the two countries," he said.

Kashmir is their principal point of disagreement, the heart of two of the three wars fought since their violent synchronized births in 1947.

Pakistan has insisted on a plebiscite to allow Kashmiris to choose between joining India or Pakistan.

At least on Kashmir's future, there is one area of agreement. "We are against independence," General Musharraf said. So too, he pointed out, is India.

India Nuclear Bill To Be On President's Desk This Week: Frist (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

US Senate leader Bill Frist assured India's Prime Minister Manmohan Singh that a major US-India nuclear energy bill is on track for completion this week.

"I spoke today by telephone with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh regarding the pending legislation to authorize civil nuclear cooperation between the United States and India," Frist said.

"I assured Prime Minister Singh that one of my top priorities for the remainder of this Congress is to enact this legislation, and I told him I am confident that we will be able to complete congressional action on it this week," he said.

The Republican senator, in his final week in Congress after choosing not to stand for reelection, praised the groundbreaking US-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation bill, separate versions of which were approved in House and Senate.

Frist said negotiators from the two houses are at work merging the legislation into one streamlined bill, and expect to be able to send the bill to President George W. Bush this week for signing.

"The enactment of this legislation will lead to a much more friendly and robust relationship between the United States and India. I told him we share that objective and are working hard to produce legislation that would help our two nations achieve it," Frist said.

The Republican leader said that Singh expressed reservations about several provisions in the bills that are problematic for the Indian government because they depart from the understanding he reached with Bush in July 2005.

Frist said he assured the Indian leader that his concerns would be dealt with, saying that he has named himself to be one of the negotiators on the bill "in order to be able to participate personally in the process of refining the legislation."

Gedi: Somalia Troops Prepared For War (AP)

By Chris Tomlinson

AP, December 6, 2006

Somalia's troops are ready for an imminent and inevitable war with the Islamic militia that has taken over much of the country and surrounded the internationally backed government, the country's prime minister said.

Somali Prime Minister Ali Gedi told The Associated Press he believed the most radical leaders within the Islamic movement were in control and would not take peace talks seriously. The Islamic movement has overrun much of Somalia, including the capital, in recent months, increasingly sidelining the weak government and vowing to bring Islamic law to the whole country.

The radicals within the movement "are the decision makers now," Gedi said in the interview late Monday. "Those who believe that the situation in Somalia will be solved through dialogue and talks are wrong."

But he said his government will continue to take part in all peace efforts while preparing to defend itself against attacks by the Council of Islamic Courts, as the movement that has taken over most of southern Somalia is known.

DOJ_NMG_0102897

"We have already mobilized our forces, we have trained a few thousand troops, they are ready," Gedi said during a visit to Ethiopia's capital. Ethiopia has backed Gedi's government, angering the Islamic movement which sees it as interference from Somalia's traditional rival.

Somali's rainy season is coming to an end and roads will be passable again for military vehicles in the next two weeks, he added.

The United States has said the Islamic movement has links to al-Qaida, an accusation Islamic leaders have repeatedly denied.

Gedi said the Islamic forces included more than 3,000 foreign fighters, echoing similar statements made by a U.N. panel investigating violations of an arms embargo that has been in place since 1992, when the last effective central government in Somalia collapsed.

Gedi's government is the 14th attempt to restore the rule of law in Somalia. But his parliament and Cabinet, made up of former warlords and civic leaders, has struggled to expand out of Baidoa, a key town 150 miles northwest of Mogadishu.

From within this power vacuum, a disparate group of Islamic leaders have banded together to create the Council of Islamic Courts, driving out warlords and installing clerical rule in the areas it now controls.

The militia declared itself in control of the southern town of Dinsor on Saturday, a seizure that effectively surrounds the weak, transitional government in its fortified base in Baidoa.

The international community has sponsored several rounds of peace talks to bring Gedi's government and the courts together. Gedi pointed out that after each round of talks, the Islamic courts returned to Mogadishu and dispatched troops to capture additional territory, despite promises to stop their expansion.

Ethiopia, a largely Christian country that fears the possible rise of Islamic fundamentalism on its borders, has acknowledged sending military advisers to Baidoa and has trained Somali troops to protect the government.

Gedi said several thousand Somali troops recently trained and equipped in Ethiopia had arrived and would able to defend Baidoa. The government has so far intentionally avoided any direct confrontation with the Islamic courts.

A confidential U.N. report recently obtained by The Associated Press said there were up to 8,000 Ethiopian troops in the country supporting the government. Ethiopia's parliament has authorized military action if attacked by the Islamic movement, which has declared holy war on Ethiopia over its troop incursions.

The U.N. report said Ethiopia's regional rival, Eritrea, had 2,000 troops in the country backing the Islamic movement, raising the specter of Eritrea and Ethiopia fighting a proxy war in Somalia.

On Friday, the United States introduced a U.N. resolution to partially lift the arms embargo on Somalia to allow for regional peacekeepers.

U.S. officials say that by providing the government with peacekeepers, the Islamic courts will have a greater incentive to pursue peace talks, rather than a military solution.

Gedi said his government needs international support in order to survive against what he calls the terrorist forces within the Islamic courts. He said the draft resolution should allow any country to provide troops to protect his government.

He said recent suicide bombings in Baidoa were contrary to Somali culture and proof that foreign fighters had come to Somalia.

"Suicide bombings was transferred to Somalia from elsewhere," Gedi said. "It will not stop in Somalia, it will spread out."

The United States has issued a travel advisory for Somalia's neighbors Kenya and Ethiopia, warning that extremists in Somalia could launch suicide attacks in those countries.

Rebels Threaten To Withdraw Peace Deal (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, December 6, 2006

The only Darfur rebel group to sign a peace agreement with the government threatened Tuesday to pull out from the deal if Khartoum-backed militias continue to attack civilians in the troubled region.

DOJ_NMG_0102898

The ultimatum from Minni Minawi, head of the main branch of the Sudan Liberation Movement, came a day after the pro-government janjaweed paramilitary looted the central market in El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur, and clashed with SLM fighters, killing at least two.

The United Nations evacuated staff and international aid workers from El Fasher "as a result of increased janjaweed presence in the town and armed movements in the area," said Radhia Achouri, the spokeswoman for the U.N. mission in Sudan.

African Union peacekeepers warned that El Fasher could be attacked within the next day, saying they had reports that a coalition of rebel groups planned to launch an offensive to drive the janjaweed out of the town.

The AU force in Darfur said its headquarters — located in El Fasher — "could be a target" of the possible rebel attack.

The Khartoum government is accused of unleashing the janjaweed militias, made up of Arab nomads, to help put down ethnic African Darfur rebels who rose up in 2003. The janjaweed are blamed in widespread atrocities against civilians.

More than 200,000 people have been killed in Darfur and another 2.5 million have been driven from their homes. Violence has only increased since the government and the SLM signed the Darfur Peace Agreement in May, which other rebel groups refused to accept.

"The government must disarm and neutralize the janjaweed by the end of this month," Minawi told The Associated Press. "Otherwise a bridge will be crossed, and no one knows what will happen," he said.

He did not say what steps the SLM would take if the government did not meet the deadline, but his spokesman suggested the group could pull out of the Darfur peace deal — a step that could lead to the collapse of the fragile agreement on which the United Nations and others have pinned hopes for bringing peace to the region.

The African Union warned that the National Redemption Front, a coalition of rebels who rejected the peace accord, was reportedly planning an assault on El Fasher along with other factions including some of Minawi's men.

Khartoum has opposed a U.N.-brokered deal for a joint mission of some 20,000 U.N. and African peacekeepers to deploy in Darfur.

The government denies backing the janjaweed, but agreed to disarm them as part of the Darfur peace accord. Observers however, say Khartoum instead reinforced the militia.

Top U.N. officials say janjaweed backed by the army have recently increased their attacks throughout Darfur and are specifically targeting civilians, including children.

Russia Won't OK Extradition In Spy Case (AP)

By Vladimir Isachenkov

AP, December 6, 2006

The top prosecutor said Tuesday that Moscow will not extradite possible Russian suspects to Britain in the poisoning of the former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko and warned that British detectives would not be allowed to carry out interrogations in Russia.

Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika said that under Russian law, a Russian citizen who is accused of committing a crime abroad must face trial at home. "If they want to arrest citizens of the Russian Federation, it would be impossible because of the Russian Constitution," he told reporters.

Litvinenko, 43, died Nov. 23 in London, and toxicologists found the radioactive isotope polonium-210 in his body. On his deathbed, Litvinenko blamed President Vladimir Putin for the poisoning. The Kremlin has vehemently denied the accusations.

Putin met Tuesday with Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema, who had pledged to press Moscow about Litvinenko's poisoning, but neither man mentioned the case in their public remarks.

Chaika said his office would fully cooperate with a team of Scotland Yard investigators who arrived in Moscow on Monday to collect information on Litvinenko's death.

However, he said that all figures in the case would be questioned by Russian prosecutors in the presence of the visiting British officers. "It is we who are doing all the interrogating. They only attend that, it cannot be otherwise" in Russia, Chaika said.

The prosecutor also confirmed that Andrei Lugovoi, a former Russian agent who met with Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1 — the day Litvinenko fell ill — has been hospitalized.

DOJ_NMG_0102899

Chaika said the British officers could be allowed to visit Lugovoi and listen to his interrogation by Russian prosecutors, if doctors permit it.

"He's being treated in a hospital," the prosecutor said. "Everything will depend on the doctors' opinion. If doctors allow a conversation with him, he will be questioned."

Lugovoi told the ITAR-Tass news agency that he was undergoing tests for possible radiation contamination, and the results would be ready in a few days.

He said he was prepared to answer the British investigators' questions.

"I intend to fully satisfy their interest and am waiting for an invitation from the law enforcement organs," he was quoted as saying. "Once I give all the necessary testimony to the law enforcement organs, I intend to publicly put an end to (speculation) about my supposed involvement in this story."

Lugovoi went to London in the month before Litvinenko's death and met with Litvinenko four times, according to Russian media. He said Litvinenko had contacted him about a year ago with some business proposals, and that they had met intermittently in London since then.

Chaika refused to say how many people British investigators hoped would be questioned in the case.

He said Mikhail Trepashkin, a former security service officer who is serving a four-year prison sentence for divulging state secrets, was not part of the initial British request and that British investigators would not be allowed to talk to him.

Trepashkin has claimed in a letter that he had warned Litvinenko several years ago about a government-sponsored death squad that intended to kill him and other Kremlin opponents.

Chaika dismissed the allegation, adding, "we aren't obliged to react to any stupidity."

He also shrugged off questions about the possible questioning of officials from the Federal Security Service, a KGB successor agency which some observers have accused of involvement in Litvinenko's death.

"Why should FSB officials be questioned? Why not question everyone here?" Chaika said, using the Russian acronym for the agency.

He also rejected allegations that the polonium-210 that poisoned Litvinenko could have been smuggled from Russia.

"It couldn't happen here," he said, adding that two Russian plants mentioned in the British media as possible sources of the polonium-210 do not produce it.

"It's all sheer nonsense," Chaika said of the allegations.

The case has strained already tense relations between Russia and Britain, which infuriated the Kremlin by giving asylum to Russian tycoon and Kremlin critic Boris Berezovsky, Chechen rebel envoy Akhmed Zakayev and Litvinenko, a former Federal Security Service officer.

Chaika dismissed suggestions that Russia could trade suspects in Litvinenko's murder for Berezovsky and Zakayev. He said British authorities, who have rejected Russian requests for their extradition, eventually would have to change their decision.

Russia Restricts U.K. Inquiry Of Spy Poisoning, Adding To Tensions (WSJ)

By Alan Cullison And Guy Chazan In Moscow And Carrick Mollenkamp In London

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Scotland Yard's effort to solve the mysterious poisoning of a former Russian spy has added to mounting political tensions between Russia and the West, as Moscow placed limits on the international investigation.

Alexandar Litvinenko, a critic of the Kremlin, died Nov. 23 in London after ingesting a radioactive substance, polonium 210, triggering a massive investigation. Britain's home secretary, John Reid, recently said the probe would lead wherever necessary for the case to be solved.

But a day after investigators from London's Metropolitan Police, as Scotland Yard is formally known, arrived in Moscow to pursue their probe, Yuri Chaika, Russia's prosecutor general, set clear limits on their reach.

He said only Russian police would be able to question suspects, though British police can listen. He said no Russian could be brought to the United Kingdom for questioning or trial since the two countries have no extradition treaty. He ruled out questioning leaders at the FSB, Russia's state security service. "Why question the FSB leadership?" Mr. Chaika said. "We'll end up having to question everyone in Russia."

Mr. Litvinenko and his backers attributed the poisoning to his criticisms of the Kremlin. The Kremlin denies involvement.

British police haven't named any suspects. A person familiar with the probe said Scotland Yard won't be able to directly charge that any responsibility lies in Russia. Instead, the police are likely to seek softer information such as travel details to piece together Mr. Litvinenko's movements before he fell ill on Nov. 1. A Scotland Yard spokeswoman declined to comment.

Another former Russian spy British officials were keen to interview has been hospitalized in Moscow to be tested for possible radioactive contamination. The ex-spy, Andrei Lugovoi, was one of two people who met with Mr. Litvinenko Nov. 1 at a London hotel bar. Mr. Lugovoi said in an interview yesterday that he had told Scotland Yard he intended to cooperate. But Mr. Chaika said Mr. Lugovoi could now only be interviewed with permission from his doctors.

The Kremlin has provided assurances that it plans to cooperate with the British. The U.K. Foreign and Commonwealth Office said Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett met with her Russian counterpart Friday and that the Russian authorities pledged cooperation.

Still, Russia's response to Mr. Litvinenko's death is raising concerns. "It is my view...that the Russian side also must make its contribution" in clearing up the case, said German Chancellor Angela Merkel. And French President Jacques Chirac, meeting with Ms. Merkel in Germany, said Russia "must provide perfectly transparent cooperation."

Russia's relations with the West have cooled dramatically in the past several years as the Kremlin has become more assertive abroad and Western criticism of Kremlin domestic policies has sharpened. In one high-profile sign of friction, Moscow has continually frustrated Washington's efforts to impose tighter sanctions on Iran to curb that country's nuclear program.

Russia's efforts to convert its vast oil and gas resources into political capital have raised tensions and spurred European governments to look for alternative fuel sources. The Kremlin's efforts to pressure neighboring governments it views as unfriendly and support those it sees as allies have provoked harsh reactions in Europe and the U.S.

Italy's foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema, said after meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday that he had received assurances that Russia was "open to cooperating" with British authorities and with prosecutors in Rome, who also are probing the activities of Mario Scaramella. Mr. Scaramella, an Italian security consultant who has tested positive for traces of polonium 210, lunched with Mr. Litvinenko the day he fell ill. Mr. D'Alema said Mr. Putin warned him that the case shouldn't be "politicized."

The U.K. also is home to some of Mr. Putin's fiercest critics and Russia has shown increasing frustration about Britain's reluctance to return some to Russia, including Russian businessman Boris Berezovsky, whom the Russian government alleges has committed financial crimes.

Indeed, Russia's state-run television began its prime-time newscast last night by saying that Russia had amassed enough evidence against British transplants Mr. Berezovsky and Akhmed Zakayev, an alleged terrorist, to prosecute them, but that Britain wouldn't extradite them to Russia. The newscast didn't specify their alleged crimes.

British Police Begin Investigating Poisoning Case In Moscow (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 5 — As the British police investigating the poisoning of a former Russian spy began forensic work in Moscow on Tuesday, Russia's prosecutor general laid down strict ground rules and said no Russians would be extradited to Britain to stand trial, signaling the tension the case has created between the countries.

Beyond that, Scotland Yard investigators may not have an opportunity to question a key witness, a former K.G.B. agent who had tea with the poisoned man, Alexander V. Litvinenko, on the day he became sick, because that former agent has checked into a hospital for radiation tests himself.

"This will depend on his doctors," Yuri Y. Chaika, the prosecutor general, said at a news conference. "If the doctors say that they can talk to him, then I think he will be questioned."

DOJ_NMG_0102901

The British authorities are investigating what has been classified as a "suspicious death," not a murder. So far they have not identified any suspects they want extradited.

For Russian law enforcement, the investigation has been a delicate one because President Vladimir V. Putin was blamed for the poisoning by Mr. Litvinenko on his deathbed in London, according to his family. The Kremlin spokesman has called the allegations nonsense.

The Russian authorities are striking a balance between cooperation and criticism of the investigation, which is causing a strain in relations between Russia and Britain.

In a sign of the widening scandal in Europe, Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany and President Jacques Chirac of France, meeting in Mettlach, Germany, urged Russia on Tuesday to cooperate with the British investigators, who arrived in Moscow on Monday.

"It is my view that everything must be done, that the Russian side also must make its contribution, that clearing this up be supported," Mrs. Merkel was quoted by The Associated Press as saying.

The British forensic team will be allowed to be present while the Russian police question other witnesses, Mr. Chaika said, but they will have no formal authority to compel witnesses to meet with them.

"We will do the interviewing and they can only be present during the questioning," Mr. Chaika said. "Of course, they can ask us for permission to conduct interviews, which we may or may not grant."

A spokesman for the British Embassy said he could not discuss the ground rules for the investigation.

The crucial witness, Andrei K. Lugovoi, is a retired spy who owns a private security company and a brewery that makes mead, or honey wine, and other traditional Russian beverages. He met with Mr. Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1.

Mr. Lugovoi said Friday that he had been cleared of any traces of radiation, telling the newspaper Kommersant that he was "absolutely clean," but he returned for repeat tests late Sunday, his lawyer said, just before the British investigators arrived. He denied any involvement in the poisoning, in a radio interview in Moscow on Nov. 24, and has met once with British Embassy officials.

Mr. Lugovoi said Tuesday that the British team had not called him this week. "My secretary called Scotland Yard and left all my contact numbers," he said, according to the Interfax news agency. "So far I haven't had any calls from anyone."

Russia's early refusal to extradite suspects is in keeping with a wider extradition problem between the countries, as Britain has resisted Russia's efforts to extradite a billionaire fugitive, Boris A. Berezovsky.

Also, Russia will not cooperate in tracing the origins of the radioactive polonium 210, Mr. Chaika said. Russia exports the metal, but it is also made in other countries. "A criminal case has been opened in Britain," Mr. Chaika said. "Let them determine the origin of this polonium." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Moscow Restricts British Police Investigating Ex-Spy's Death (WP)

By Peter Finn And Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 5 -- British detectives visiting Russia to investigate the poisoning death of a former Russian intelligence officer in London will face broad restrictions in their work here, a senior Russian official said Tuesday.

Prosecutor General Yury Chaika said his subordinates, not the British, would conduct any interrogations. He ruled out the extradition of possible suspects who are Russian citizens and said British investigators could not meet an imprisoned lawyer and former officer in the FSB, a successor agency of the KGB, who claims to have vital information.

A key witness checked into a hospital Tuesday, raising questions about when, and whether, investigators from Scotland Yard would be able to see him.

Some British politicians quickly criticized the restrictions. "If they don't allow access, the world at large will wonder, why not?" lawmaker David Davis, a leading member of the opposition Conservative Party, said in an interview. But he cautioned that it was too early to know exactly how much cooperation British investigators would get.

At a news conference in Moscow, Chaika smacked down any notion that the British police could go wherever their investigation leads them, as British Home Secretary John Reid put it in London on Sunday. Even allowing for the normal sensitivities in any country about allowing foreign police on home turf, Chaika was unequivocal in mapping out the secondary function of his British counterparts.

"They may participate with our consent, and we might also withhold our consent," said Chaika, whose position is equivalent to that of attorney general.

Several British detectives flew into Moscow on Monday night to probe any Russian connection to the Nov. 1 poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko with polonium-210. The radioactive isotope brought on the former domestic security officer's death Nov. 23 after a slow and gruesome deterioration in his condition.

Litvinenko, 43, was part of a London circle of Russian exiles fiercely critical of Russian President Vladimir Putin. In a deathbed statement, Litvinenko accused the Kremlin of ordering his killing, a charge that authorities here labeled baseless and absurd.

Among those the British had planned to interview is Andrei Lugovoy, a Russian entrepreneur and former KGB officer who met with Litvinenko in a bar at the Millennium Hotel in London the day of the poisoning.

Lugovoy spoke to officials at the British Embassy in Moscow and denied any involvement in the poisoning. His attorney, Andrei Romashov, said he was tested last week for radiation contamination and got a clean bill of health at a Moscow clinic. But the Russian newspaper Kommersant, quoting the attorney, said Lugovoy had checked into a hospital with his wife and three children, who were with him in London, for fresh tests.

"I cannot say if he's ready to meet with the British investigators," Romashov said.

British police are also interested in meeting with Dmitry Kovtun, a business consultant, and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, who heads an association of security agencies. Both men also met Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel with Lugovoy.

The British also want to meet with Mikhail Trepashkin, a former FSB officer who is serving a four-year sentence on charges of divulging state secrets. Trepashkin, like Litvinenko, had investigated a series of apartment bombings in Russia in 1999 that were among the triggers for a second war between Russian forces and separatists in the southern republic of Chechnya.

Trepashkin accused his former colleagues in the security services of organizing the bombings. Human rights groups including Amnesty International have expressed concern that he was prosecuted to stop his unsanctioned inquiry.

Trepashkin's lawyers released a letter in which the prisoner asserted that the FSB had created a list of people, including Litvinenko, who should be assassinated, and he requested a meeting with the British, saying he had relevant information about the case.

A spokesman for the Russian prison system told the Russian news agency Interfax that such a meeting would not happen. "The Federal Penitentiary Service will not allow a person convicted for divulging state secrets to remain a source of information for representatives of foreign special services," the spokesman said.

Chaika ridiculed the idea. "Seven hundred thousand people are prisoners as Trepashkin is, let's interrogate 400,000 of them, what if they tell something," he said.

A prison administrator filed a request with a Russian court Tuesday asking that Trepashkin be transferred to a more secure prison, Interfax reported.

Lynne Featherstone, a member of the British Parliament who said Litvinenko was one of her constituents, said there is so much speculation in the case that Russia should fully cooperate to "lift the cloud."

"Nothing is solved by leaving it in the dark," she said.

Chaika also said any suspects would be tried in Russia. Extradition has long been a touchy subject between London and Moscow. British courts have refused to hand over Boris Berezovsky, an exiled Russian tycoon who clashed with Putin, and Akhmed Zakayev, a Chechen separatist who received asylum in Britain. Both men were close associates of Litvinenko.

"The British side will sooner or later be forced to extradite them, because every day there is more and more evidence that they have committed crimes," Chaika said. "This is actually a case where there are political motives for their non-extradition."

Chris Bryant, a Labor Party member of the British Parliament, said in an interview that "I think there is a feeling in Russia that we are behaving outrageously" by not extraditing Berezovsky and others wanted by Russia, but that a judge had ruled those prosecutions were politically motivated.

Key Suspect In Poisoning Case Is Hospitalized (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

MOSCOW — Russia's chief prosecutor said Tuesday that a key potential suspect in the poisoning death of dissident former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko has been hospitalized, and that British investigators would be allowed to see him only if doctors grant approval.

Prosecutor General Yuri Chaika also said that Russia's constitution forbids extradition of citizens, and that if any Russian suspects are identified in the case, they would not be sent to Britain and could only be tried in Russia. Despite earlier top-level pledges of Russian cooperation, he indicated that British investigators may face formidable obstacles in pursuing leads in Russia.

Felllow former KGB agent Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Litvinenko in London on the day he is believed to have been radioactively poisoned, had previously expressed willingness to speak to investigators. On Tuesday, however, a man answering Lugovoy's cellphone said that it was not clear "whether and when he will be able to talk" to investigators or how long he would stay in the hospital. The man, who identified himself as an aide named Alexander, said he was not authorized to comment on the nature of Lugovoy's hospitalization. Chaika said he believed Lugovoy was "undergoing medical treatment" but said nothing about the nature of his illness.

In a statement written shortly before his death Nov. 23, Litvinenko blamed Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his poisoning, a charge the Kremlin has angrily dismissed. Litvinenko also told friends he believed that Lugovoy might have been the person who poisoned him.

Chaika, speaking at a news conference, said that the questioning of witnesses and potential suspects would be carried out by Russians in the presence of British investigators, who arrived here Monday. He left it unclear whether the British would be allowed to ask any questions.

"They will not interrogate anyone," he said early in the news conference. Later he appeared to modify that statement with an indication that British investigators might be allowed to ask some questions, with permission, on a case-by-case basis.

"We interrogate and they are present. They interrogate in our presence," he said. "We should perform those investigative actions and they can take part in this with our permission. We may even deny them the right to take part. But we will do this together with them. We want them to take part."

The prosecutor's office has not launched an investigation of its own into the case, and will simply assist the British, Chaika said.

An Italian security consultant, Mario Scaramella, also met Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the probable day of his poisoning with radioactive polonium-210. Scaramella, who authorities say also has a "significant quantity" of polomium-210 in his body, has said he asked to meet Litvinenko after receiving an e-mail suggesting that people who were behind the recent unsolved slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya were preparing to strike against Litvinenko and himself.

Officials in London said they recognized that Russia is one of several nations that adoes not extradite its citizens for criminal prosecutions. A spokesman for the Home Office, who spoke under standard condition of anonymity, said that should a Russian citizen commit an offense in Britain, there are procedures for trying the case in Russia.

British Home Secretary John Reid, speaking Monday in Brussels, Belgium, said the investigation "will proceed as normal, whatever the diplomatic or ... wider considerations."

The Kremlin has pledged to cooperate in the investigation, he said. But analysts said Chaika's comments did not seem to indicate there would be full cooperation.

"The main message Chaika sent to the world today is that there are powerful forces within the Russian political elite which are not interested in an objective investigation of the Litvinenko murder and are not interested in allowing the people who may well be implicated in that crime, like Andrei Lugovoy, for instance, to say something to the British investigators that they shouldn't," said Stanislav Belkovsky, president of the National Strategy Institute, a Moscow think tank.

Valery Fyodorov, director of the All-Russian Center for Public Opinion Study, said that "the last thing the Russian authorities want now is to look like accomplices in that crime."

DOJ_NMG_0102904

"Matters of image are very important for Russia and President Putin, and of course he is willing to help dispel the current gross suspicions in the West," he said. "I think that if Scotland Yard representatives happen to claim that they haven't been given due support here in Russia, that may result in the Russian authorities giving Russian law enforcement an additional push and shove."

Belkovsky said that some British and Italian newspapers have reported that documents Scaramella gave Litvinenko identified Igor Vlasov, 46, as an assassin who had come to London to kill people identified as "enemies of the Russian people."

Vlasov's current whereabouts are unknown and there is some question whether such a person exists.

Vlasov, according to the reports, was a former Russian special services officer who speaks excellent Portuguese.

The Soviet Union had a major presence in the former Portuguese colony of Angola during the 1980s.

Putin's deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, 46, who is seen as leader of the hard-line Kremlin faction called the siloviki, or "powerful ones," comes from a KGB background and also speaks Portuguese, Belkovsky said.

"I don't believe in this as a pure coincidence," he said. If Igor Vlasov is a real person and has something to do with the case, it is possible that "coming from the same background and age groups, Sechin and Vlasov may have served together in Angola and they may still have some firm ties," he said.

It is also possible, he said, that "someone is interested in implicating Sechin.

Prime Minister: Kiev No Pawn Of Russia Or West (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Ukraine will reject any effort to be used as a pawn in any struggle for influence between Russia and the West, Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych said yesterday at the end of a two-day visit to Washington.

But Mr. Yanukovych, whom many in Washington fear is tilting away from the pro-Western reform alliance that spearheaded Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, said his four-month-old government will not lobby strongly for membership in NATO in the face of weak popular support for the trans-Atlantic alliance inside Ukraine.

"Nobody is trying to push anyone anywhere" on NATO, Mr. Yanukovych said, speaking through an interpreter to a small group of reporters at a breakfast briefing. "People have to understand the benefits of this or any other security system."

The prime minister raised fresh doubts about his commitment to NATO when he declined to sign a nonbinding "membership action plan" on a September visit to Brussels. A poll released in Kiev yesterday said that about 75 percent of Ukrainians think Mr. Yanukovych is more likely to protect Russian business interests or those of his home region in eastern Ukraine over the interests of "average Ukrainian citizens."

President Viktor Yushchenko, the hero of the Orange Revolution, has strongly pushed a pro-NATO and pro-Western foreign-policy line. But he was forced to accept Mr. Yanukovych as prime minister after elections this year gave his defeated rival in the 2004 presidential campaign the biggest single bloc in parliament.

Mr. Yanukovych held low-key talks with Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his visit, his first to the United States since taking office in August. Topics in the talks included Ukraine's World Trade Organization bid, energy security and domestic reforms in Ukraine.

Mr. Yanukovych told reporters his government was a vast improvement over the faction-ridden team installed by Mr. Yushchenko immediately after the Orange Revolution.

"Beautiful slogans should always be followed by actions," he said. The new unified government "allows for a foreign and domestic policy where we can be 100 percent sure of implementation."

But the infighting clearly goes on in Kiev.

Mr. Yushchenko yesterday voided a parliamentary vote to fire Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk, a chief architect of his pro-Western foreign agenda. Mr. Yanukovych's allies hold virtually all of the other Cabinet posts, but Mr. Yushchenko argued the country's constitution gave him final say on foreign policy.

Mr. Yanukovych declined to criticize recent anti-democratic moves by Russian President Vladimir Putin, noting that Russia is Ukraine's biggest trading partner and the critical supplier of its energy needs.

DOJ_NMG_0102905

"President Putin defends the interests of Russia. The way he does -- the Russian people can assess that," Mr. Yanukovych said.

"The most important thing is that Ukraine should not be allied with Russia against the United States and the European Union or vice versa," he said. "We are not going to conduct such a policy."

Europe Is Giving Global Economy A Surprise Boost Amid U.S. Lull (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

BERLIN -- Europe's economy is firing on all cylinders after years of feeble growth, helping to sustain global expansion as the U.S. economy slows and surprising many economists who doubted the Continent could muster enough demand to break its reliance on exports.

Europe's economic recovery was ignited by rising exports, but it is now spreading to investment, job creation and consumer spending. While some countries around Europe's edges have performed well for years, including the United Kingdom and the Nordic countries, prolonged stagnation in its heartland -- the 12-nation euro currency area dominated by Germany, France and Italy -- earned Europe a reputation rivaling Japan's as the world's economic laggard.

Euro-zone gross domestic product is on course to grow by 2.7% this year, unspectacular by recent U.S. standards but a big improvement on the 1.4% growth the euro zone averaged the previous five years. Even though a U.S. slowdown, a strengthening euro and looming tax increases in Germany could brake euro-zone growth next year, most forecasters still expect an expansion of around 2%. By Europe's lackluster standards, that's nothing short of a comeback -- and is good news for exporters and investors from the U.S. and Asia.

"There is no new miracle in Europe. This recovery is overdue," says Jean-Philippe Cotis, chief economist at the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a Paris-based think tank. The long slowdown led anxious Europeans to save their incomes, Mr. Cotis says, creating pent-up demand that is now being unleashed as confidence gradually returns.

Europe's rebound still has flaws, which bolster arguments that structural changes are needed to realize any lasting gains. Much of the improvement this year has occurred in Germany, which is helping to buoy its neighbors after taking some painful steps, while many companies in France and Italy still struggle to cope with fierce global competition. Changes to labor laws and welfare systems prescribed by economists are low on government agendas because free-market measures remain unpopular.

But governments, companies and unions have made enough organic change to restore some of the Continent's lost dynamism. And better growth in the $10 trillion euro-zone economy means better growth in the 25-nation European Union, whose $14 trillion economy is about the same size as the U.S.'s and accounts for 30% of world GDP. (Twelve of the 25 EU nations use the euro.)

Europe's revival is reflected in the rising value of its currency, the euro, which at $1.33 is close to its highest level ever against the dollar -- $1.36 -- touched at the end of 2004. That partly reflects dollar weakness against many other currencies, but it is also because currency markets believe the European Central Bank in Frankfurt will continue raising interest rates against a backdrop of solid growth.

Germany, for years the sick man of Europe, has led the revival, reclaiming its place as the region's growth engine. Painful measures to boost efficiency and productivity put German companies -- especially makers of machine tools and other industrial equipment -- in a strong position to exploit the recent boom in global trade. While other euro-zone industries haven't restructured in the same way, they have also enjoyed rising exports amid the fastest pace of global growth in more than 30 years.

Rising corporate profits and a new optimism have led European companies to invest at home again, especially in Germany, where strenuous cost cutting has done much to compensate for high labor costs and stiff payroll taxes.

"It's fun to be an industrial entrepreneur in Germany at this time," says Jurgen Grossmann, owner of steel group Georgsmarienhutte. "The world wants our products. We have record order intakes. There is a renaissance in tangible goods."

Many German companies have found leeway in Germany's labor laws to improve productivity, and have been rewarded with rising profits. Machine-tool maker Trumpf Group, near Stuttgart, is typical of the thousands of midsize family-owned companies that make up the backbone of the world's third-largest national economy. After stagnant or falling sales earlier in the decade, Trumpf negotiated deals with its work force that allowed an extension of the workweek to near 40 hours from 35, with extra pay partly dependent on company profits, in exchange for job guarantees.

At the same time, Trumpf's export sales to fast-growing economies in Asia and Eastern Europe have rocketed. The firm is adding 450 workers to its 6,500 staff this year. Trumpf's investment spending is up 75% this year -- most of it in Germany, including a new laser factory.

"Our decision to invest in Germany rather than abroad hinged on the agreements with our workers. A 35-hour week is a joke. You can't compete internationally with that," says Nicola Leibinger-Kammüller, Trumpf's chief executive.

Total investment in Germany is set to grow by 5.8% this year, according to the OECD, up from 1% last year and declines in the four previous years. Revived investment has helped bring Germany's chronic unemployment below four million in November, from more than five million in January.

Germany still has a high jobless rate of 9.6%, and many formerly jobless people have found only low-paid, temporary or part-time work. But rising employment has allowed a modest recovery in consumer spending, which is expected to grow by around 0.8% this year after stagnating or shrinking since 2001.

Across the euro area, unemployment has fallen to 7.7%, according to the European Commission's standardized measure, from a peak exceeding 9% in 2004. Surveys show consumer confidence is increasing as fear of unemployment recedes.

The winners from higher investment in German industry include services providers with customers in the booming manufacturing sector. Frankfurt-based Commerzbank AG has recovered from years of heavy losses, bad loans and asset writedowns. After losing €2.3 billion ($3.06 billion) in 2003, it posted net profit of €1.2 billion in the first nine months of this year, and is even hiring 700 new customer advisers after laying off more than 7,000 employees in recent years.

SAP AG, Germany's largest software company, is also hiring. But it's doing so cautiously because German labor laws make it expensive to cut the work force when the business cycle dips. "Whenever you hire in an inflexible environment, you want to make sure you can keep these people for 10 or 20 years," says Chief Executive Henning Kagermann.

Investment is also improving in other European countries, but less markedly than in Germany. Companies in Italy, France and Spain haven't cut costs or jobs or raised productivity as aggressively as their German counterparts. Labor costs in Germany have fallen by nearly 1% a year on average since 2000, but have risen by nearly 4% a year in Italy in the same period, according to the European Commission, the EU's executive arm.

In Germany, the severity of the downturn and joblessness led to far-reaching concessions by unions on work rules. But unions in other euro-zone nations have resisted similar demands from employers.

"Some of the changes German industry has made -- for example, longer working periods -- are not realistic in Italy" in light of stiff union opposition, says Ernesto Greco, chief executive of Italian furniture maker Natuzzi SpA. It has built factories in Brazil, China and Romania recently, while trimming costs in Italy to cope with rising global competition.

Yet companies from other euro-zone nations are also exporting more, in part because Germany's $2.8 trillion economy is buying more goods from the rest of Europe as it grows.

"The recovery in Germany is lifting Italy and helping France," says Mr. Cotis, the OECD economist. In both countries, stronger exports are helping companies to raise investment.

Rising trade among European countries has helped to compensate for slower growth in exports to the rest of the world this year, allowing the euro zone to sustain its recovery even though the U.S. economy is slowing. "It's looking increasingly like Europe hasn't caught a cold from the U.S. sneezing," says Neville Hill, European economist at Credit Suisse in London. That's a break with the past when, if the U.S. economy caught a cold, Europe usually caught something worse.

Consumer spending hasn't improved as strongly as investment, but even here there are signs of improvement. Euro-zone consumption rose by 0.6% during the third quarter, helped by strong spending in Germany. In a sign of the retail market's gradual recovery, Europe's biggest retailer, Carrefour SA of France, recently announced a 7% rise in third-quarter sales, including more than 5% growth in France, where its megastores have struggled against fierce competition from discount chains in recent years.

But the robust outlook could still crumble if the euro rises further against the dollar into next year. The currency's appreciation is beginning to revive bad memories of 2003 and 2004, when a surging euro snuffed out embryonic upturns in the euro-zone economy.

"The impact was very bad in all industries competing with products made in the dollar area. My feeling is we will have a hard time in front of us," says Andrea Tomat, president of Italian sport-shoe maker Lotto Sport Italia SpA.

Other risks to Europe's revival include planned tax increases in Germany and Italy, whose governments are trying to rein in budget deficits to comply with EU fiscal rules. Germany's plan to raise its value-added tax -- equivalent to U.S. sales tax -- by three percentage points to 19% in January is causing particular worry, given the fragile confidence of German consumers. Most economists believe the increase will cause only a temporary drop in spending, but some point to the case of Japan, where a VAT rise in 1997 prolonged its economic stagnation.

Many economists caution against euphoria about Europe's improved growth. "It's an OK performance compared with the past few years, but nothing is firing tremendously," says Jean-Francois Mercier, an economist at Citigroup in London. "The problems haven't gone away, including structural rigidities and caution by many businesses which prefer to invest offshore rather than at home."

Europe's recovery is also uneven. While German industry is looking strong, consumer spending is still only growing weakly. In France, consumer spending has helped underpin GDP growth, but companies have been losing global market share while investment is growing more slowly than in past upturns.

Thanks to its continuing structural problems, the euro zone is able to sustain a growth rate of only around 2% a year without stoking inflation, the OECD estimates. The U.S. economy can sustain closer to 3%. More-flexible labor rules, more competition in markets for goods and services, and an overhaul of pension and health-care systems would help the euro zone to sustain faster growth, making it easier to cope with the future strains of an aging and eventually shrinking population.

"The case for structural reforms in Europe remains strong," says Mr. Cotis.

Immigration Fuels U.K. Growth (WSJ)

By Andrew Peaple

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

LONDON -- An influx of immigrant labor after the European Union expanded in 2004 has fueled a surge in the U.K. economy and is expected to prompt the government to announce today that growth this year will be faster than expected.

Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, presenting his latest report to Parliament on the economy and public finances, will raise the growth forecast for gross domestic product to around 2.75%, from the 2.25% forecast in March, people familiar with the report say.

Mr. Brown last week said the faster growth trend was due at least in part to the wave of immigration that has washed over Britain. The government estimates that 600,000 people have moved to the U.K. from Central and Eastern Europe since the EU grew by 10 countries two years ago.

More than two-thirds have found jobs, increasing Britain's work force by 1.5% and adding new momentum to a U.K. economy already strengthened by a wave of privatization and deregulation in the 1980s and 1990s. The Centre for Economic and Business Research says migrant workers add £54 billion ($107 billion) a year to output, or around 5% of GDP.

Economists say the new output and domestic buying power have raised the country's economic "speed limit" -- the pace at which it can grow without generating inflation.

"This immigration has been a supply shock on a scale that I don't think we've seen in our history, and we don't have a good handle on its scale and the consequences," Confederation of British Industry Director-General Richard Lambert said in a recent interview.

Other EU countries, including Ireland and Sweden, have been similarly jolted by immigration flows, though not to the extent seen in Britain, which is equipped with a heavily service-based economy and liberal labor laws that help it absorb more jobs.

Spain's per-capita output would have fallen over the past decade, instead of rising 2.6% a year, without a population increase of two million due to immigration, says Andrew Milligan, head of global strategy at Standard Life Investments.

The ability to forecast extra revenue is a boon for any finance minister. For Mr. Brown, who is hoping to succeed Prime Minister Tony Blair next year, it is even more valuable. Extra immigration-related tax revenue could give him a deeper war chest for spending increases ahead of the next general election, due by 2010.

Indeed, Mr. Brown is expected to add to that war chest in Parliament today, people familiar with the matter say. They say he will raise taxes for airline passengers and motorists this week in a bid to show his environmental credentials ahead of the election.

The air-passenger tax is set to double, with the tax on an economy flight to Europe rising to £10 from £5, while the duty on a business or first-class flight will rise to £20 a person from £10, the people say. The size of the fuel-tax increase -- which will be the first since 2003 -- hasn't been decided, those people say.

Peter Spencer, chief adviser of economic-forecasting group the Ernst & Young ITEM Club, calculates that the U.K. treasury has received an extra £12 billion to £18 billion in tax revenue since 1998 from the influx of workers. And an upgrade to future output estimates means the chancellor can safely forecast higher tax revenue. A number of economists think the scale of immigration means potential economic growth could be as high as 3% to 3.25% a year.

The increase in the working population also has consequences for the Bank of England, as it considers whether to continue raising interest rates next year.

"A faster-growing labor force potentially raises the amount the economy can produce," said Rachel Lomax, the central bank's deputy governor, in a speech last week. "Rather like raising the economy's speed limit, it implies that it can grow faster without hitting supply constraints and generating inflationary pressure -- that may be the situation right now."

But immigration also comes at a social cost, driving up housing prices in London and other urban areas while also restraining wage growth in the services sector, which is good for inflation, but potentially frustrating for Britain's work force.

Recognizing those concerns, the British government is looking at ways to better manage the inflow. When Bulgaria and Romania join the EU next month the government will allow workers from those countries only gradual access to the labor market, limiting entrants to 20,000 a year.

While some economists see this as a bad move, given the boost to growth immigration has given so far, others see the pause as justified to take stock.

"GDP per head also matters. The fact that overall GDP is rising is not in itself something that generates new wealth," says the Confederation of British Industry's Mr. Lambert, who is a former member of the Bank of England's rate-setting monetary-policy committee.

Fiji Under State Of Emergency After Government Is Toppled (WP/AP)

By Ray Lilley

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

SUVA, Fiji, Dec. 6 -- Fiji's military commander declared a state of emergency Wednesday, a day after he overthrew the elected government and brought international sanctions and censure that began to isolate the South Pacific country.

It was the nation's fourth coup in 20 years. Radio network Legend quoted a military statement saying that armed forces would set up checkpoints around Suva, the capital, as part of the state of emergency.

"As of 6 o'clock this evening, the military has taken over the government, has executive authority and the running of this country," Commodore Frank Bainimarama, the armed forces chief credited with resolving Fiji's last coup, said Tuesday in a nationally broadcast statement.

Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase, who insists he is still Fiji's legitimate leader, flew Wednesday from the capital to his home village on the remote, northeastern Lau Islands, said Pene Nonu, his private secretary.

The takeover, like the previous three coups, has its roots in the ethnic divide between the descendants of ancient Melanesian warrior tribes and those of Indian laborers brought by former colonial power Britain to work in sugar plantations.

In his declaration, Bainimarama justified seizing power to prevent legislation that favored indigenous Fijians, contending that the measures "would undermine the constitution and deny many citizens their rights."

Bainimarama said he had assumed some powers of the president and was using them to dismiss the prime minister.

The nation's last coup, in 2000, was led by indigenous nationalists who overthrew the country's first ethnic Indian prime minister. Bainimarama was widely regarded as a national hero after he stepped in, brokered a resolution without bloodshed and restored democracy, hand-picking Qarase, a former banker, to lead an interim government.

DOJ_NMG_0102909

He also promised amnesty to coup participants but later reneged, and the ringleaders were arrested, tried and imprisoned for treason.

Bainimarama named Jona Senilagakali, a military medic with no political experience, as caretaker prime minister and said a full interim government would be appointed next week to see the country through elections that would restore democracy.

Rising Interest In Nuclear Power Brings New Life To Uranium Mining (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

ARANDIS, Namibia -- This sandy little company town, with its tree-lined streets and concrete homes set amid a vast, forbidding desert, had all the signs of terminal decline just a few years back. Both banks closed. The only gas station shut off its pumps. And employable young men, realizing the bleak future of the giant uranium mine that gave Arandis life, began drifting away.

But something unexpected happened on the way to the funeral for Arandis: The nuclear industry, stagnant for two decades, reversed its fortunes at a time of rising oil prices and growing realization that burning fossil fuel caused global climate change. Nuclear went from being seen as a dirty source of energy to a comparatively clean, efficient one.

From that shift in perception, mainly in the minds of Westerners thousands of miles away, the fate of this remote African town went from doom to boom.

"The future was very dark," said the energetic mayor of Arandis, Daniel Muhuura, who like hundreds of residents here has spent his entire professional life working for Roessing Uranium Mine. "Now the future is very bright."

Dramatic turnarounds have happened across the continent as a quest for mineral riches, similar to the one that helped fuel the 19th century's "Scramble for Africa," has become a hot economic story of the decade. Decisions in boardrooms around the world have sent prices soaring for copper in Zambia, coltan in Congo and oil in Angola, Nigeria and Sudan.

From rising demand for these commodities, sub-Saharan Africa's economic growth has hit rates not seen in three decades.

Perhaps no renaissance, however, has matched that of the uranium industry's.

Roessing Uranium Mine opened in 1976 during nuclear power's heyday. But the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and Chernobyl in 1986 caused a profound political backlash that nearly halted new reactor construction. Uncertainty about how to handle the dangerous radioactive waste created by nuclear power plants also contributed to its unpopularity.

By 2001, the price for uranium oxide had fallen to about $7 a pound, one-sixth of its peak. Two years later, facing massive losses, Roessing announced plans to close.

Under that plan, the mine was to cease operations in 2007 after having dug 1 billion tons of rock out of a jagged, bleached landscape often compared to the surface of the moon. Instead, oil prices soared and global warming became the stuff of newspaper headlines and Hollywood movies. Interest in building new nuclear reactors grew, and the price of uranium oxide rose to $62.50 a pound.

Roessing, which recently made its first delivery to an increasingly energy-hungry China, has decided to continue mining until at least 2016, mine officials say.

They expect to end this year with Roessing's first substantial profit, and tax bill to the Namibian government, in five years.

And the mine, whose workforce dropped from 3,800 in the 1970s to 860 last year, has begun hiring again.

"It is definitely a dramatic change," said company spokesman Rehabeam Hoveka. "It is good news for Arandis. It is good news for Namibia, too."

A second uranium mine, meanwhile, is slated to open nearby soon. Three others within 60 miles are in various stages of development. So where Arandis was once going to be a mining town without a mine, soon there could be five in the area.

The boom in uranium mining has caused grumbling from the tourism industry, which fears the loss of pristine landscapes, and environmentalists, who fear damage to the fragile biodiversity of the Namib, regarded as the driest and oldest desert in the world. Some environmentalists also are concerned about the renewed growth of an industry they still regard as dangerous despite industry claims of safety improvements since the Chernobyl disaster.

"They cannot tell us that they are safer than before," said Bertchen Kohrs, head of Earthlife Namibia, speaking from Windhoek, the capital. "It starts here with mining uranium, the whole cycle starts. Who says that some day we won't have to take back the nuclear waste here in Namibia?"

Roessing mine is a massive, dun-colored canyon two miles long, nearly a mile wide and more than 1,000 feet deep. From its lip, the giant dump trucks that haul uranium ore from the mine floor look like children's toys.

Several crushing machines pulverize the rock into sand, then powerful acids extract the traces of uranium. The end product, after processing, is a fine gray powder that leaves the mine in steel drums weighing 900 pounds. Mine officials say each holds as much potential energy as 40,000 barrels of oil.

All of Roessing's uranium oxide is used by civilian reactors, mine officials say, and is exported only to countries approved by the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The government of Iran owns 15 percent of Roessing, a legacy of early investment in the 1960s by the shah there. Mine officials say no shipment of uranium has ever been made to Iran, and the country has no right to the mine's product. Roessing's majority owner is Rio Tinto, a global mining conglomerate.

Officials in Arandis say they hope to use the unexpected revival of the mine to secure the future of their town, which already has, by African standards, an enviable infrastructure, including paved roads, a soccer stadium, a library, streetlights and steady sources of electricity and clean water. Two small clothing factories and a technical college provide some jobs not directly affiliated with the mine.

The banks have not resumed operations, but one recently opened a cash machine in Arandis, and work on a new gas station is to begin this month, said Muhuura, the mayor. With population on the rise again, the town recently made a deal with a builder to construct 50 homes.

The mine also has donated one of its dump trucks to Arandis, where it sits massively, with giant rubber wheels twice the height of most men, in the center of town. It is the first piece of what town officials hope is an eventual mining museum, part of the plan to help the town survive the next big downturn in uranium demand, whenever it comes.

"We want to turn around to show the world that this town will never be a ghost town," Muhuura said.

China's Sunshine Boys (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

So here's a little news quiz: Guess who's the seventh-richest man in China today, with a fortune estimated by Forbes magazine at $1.43 billion?

Answer: Shi Zhengrong. Now guess what he does. Real estate? No. Banking? No. Manufacturing for Wal-Mart? No. Construction? No.

Mr. Shi is China's leading maker of silicon photovoltaic solar cells, which convert sunlight into electricity. Yes, the seventh-richest man in China is a green entrepreneur! It should only happen in America.

Mr. Shi thinks, as I do, that renewable clean power — wind, solar, bio-fuels — is going to be the growth industry of the 21st century, and he wants to make sure that China and his company, Suntech Power Holdings, are the leaders. Only 43 years old and full of energy himself, Mr. Shi hopes to do for solar energy what China did for tennis shoes: drive down the cost so that millions of people who could not afford solar photovoltaic panels will be able to do so.

As an environmentalist, I wish him well. As an American, I worry that if we don't start doing everything we can to develop our own clean power, we're going to miss out on the green industrial revolution. Today, most of our hybrid cars are imported from Japan. Tomorrow, if Mr. Shi has his way, most of our solar panels will come from China.

What Mr. Shi understands is that China is going to have to go green. Its rivers and air are becoming so polluted it has no choice. In fact, as he and I spoke in his 66th-floor office in Shanghai, the air was so dirty you could barely make out the skyscrapers down the street. America, alas, still seems to think it has a choice in going green. So while China will be compelled to move into this industry, U.S. companies may or may not, depending on whether states, or Washington, require power providers to generate energy from renewables.

For years our brain-dead Congress thought it was helping our power companies and manufacturers by not imposing tough energy-efficiency standards on them. In fact, it was just helping some of them commit suicide. Congress's idiotic decision not to impose higher mileage standards on U.S. carmakers helped Detroit miss the market and almost go bankrupt. China already has higher mileage standards for its autos than we do.

"People at all levels in China have become more aware of this environment issue and alternative energy," said Mr. Shi. "Five years ago when I started the company people said: 'Why do we need solar? We have a surplus of coal-powered electricity.' Now it is different; now people realize that solar has a bright future. But it is still too expensive."

Mr. Shi founded Suntech in Wuxi, China, near Shanghai, after earning a Ph.D. in engineering in Australia in 1992. As The Wall Street Journal put it in a recent profile, Suntech combines "first world technology and developing world prices" — so effectively it has become one of the world's four top solar manufacturers, along with Sharp and Kyocera of Japan and BP.

The key, Mr. Shi explained to me, is that he uses more low-cost Chinese labor, rather than high-tech machines, to make his solar modules and handle the fragile silicon, and he takes advantage of the subsidies offered by different Chinese provinces dying for him to open a Suntech factory in their region.

Roughly 90 percent of his business today is abroad. But as he brings the price down, the China market will open up, and he expects to use that to gain much greater scale and drive the price of his solar modules down further.

"If we have a market here, we feel confident we will be a cost leader," he says. "Now we are at around $4 per watt. In 10 years time, I'm pretty sure we will be below $2 per watt," which would make solar competitive and scalable.

Thanks to Suntech's success, "now there is a rush of [Chinese] business people entering this sector, even though we still don't have a market here," added Mr. Shi. "Many government people now say, 'This is an industry!' " To help, the Chinese government just passed a law mandating that China get 10 percent of its energy from renewables, like solar, by 2020.

China is setting high standards for renewables, but is still weak on enforcement. America is better at enforcement, but still weak on setting high standards. We need to get our act together, because eventually China will bring its enforcement in line with its regulations — or it won't breathe. And when that happens, China's emerging green power entrepreneurs could clean our clock in the clean power business.

Oh, well, you can always buy a share. Suntech is already listed on the New York Stock Exchange. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Out In The Cold (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

THE SKIING ISN'T ideal in Big Sky, Mont., thanks to a lack of snowfall, but temperatures are cold enough to support the man-made variety. It seems to be equally frosty inside a resort conference room where South Korean and American representatives are trying to cement the United States' biggest trade deal since the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Underway is the fifth round of talks on a bilateral pact supported by President Bush and South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun. The stakes for both countries are high and go beyond mere economics — though the economies of both nations would benefit from a pact. A failure would further strain already frayed relations between the U.S. and South Korea and could push Seoul nearer to China's political and trade orbit.

Despite such considerations, there doesn't seem to be much urgency in Montana. This was supposed to be the final round of talks, but with agreement lacking on even relatively easy issues in earlier rounds, they are expected to continue next year. With Bush's fast-track trade authority expiring in July, a deal needs to be finished by March to allow time for congressional review. Yet on Tuesday, there was still no sign of progress.

There are a number of contentious matters on the table, including South Korea's restrictions on U.S. beef and rice and U.S. anti-dumping rules that South Koreans say have unfairly punished their high-tech manufacturers. Probably the biggest snag is automobiles: South Korea puts heavy tariffs and taxes on imports and imposes safety and environmental regulations that make it difficult for foreign automakers to compete.

These clearly have to go, but that's not enough for Detroit. U.S. automakers are demanding that cuts to U.S. tariffs on South Korean vehicles be tied to measurable gains in market share for U.S. cars in South Korea. They don't just want a level playing field — they want sales guarantees. It's an absurd notion that, distressingly, is embraced by Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is likely to chair the House Ways and Means Committee's trade subcommittee next year.

Meanwhile, among South Korea's more nonsensical trade quirks is its restriction on U.S. beef, which is based on overblown fears of mad cow disease. That should be jettisoned as well.

With $72 billion in trade last year, South Korea is the United States' seventh-biggest trading partner. A successful free-trade agreement would be an achievement in itself and would lay the groundwork for an even bigger deal with Japan. Such an agreement is too important to be derailed by a protectionist minority in both countries.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror War A Bust Stats Inflated: Study (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, December 6, 2006

Federal authorities' strategy of arresting terror suspects on any charge possible has proved effective in thwarting attacks, but too often prosecutors have inflated the importance of the busts, a new study says.

"The strategy of disruption has worked, but they hyped these cases to be more than what they seemed," said Karen Greenberg, author of the study by New York University's Center of Law and Security.

"It leaves their record of prosecuting the war on terror unconvincing," she said yesterday.

Of 510 cases since the Sept. 11 attacks that the government said were terrorism-related, only 30% of the defendants were actually prosecuted on a terrorism charge, the NYU study found. Most of the others faced charges such as fraud, racketeering or conspiracy.

While 169 cases are still pending, only four people charged since the 2001 attacks were convicted for trying to commit an act of terrorism, the study said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the report "reflects the underlying premise of our strategy to prevent and disrupt terrorists before they can carry out what they may be conspiring to do, by using any and all tools at our disposal in the U.S. code."

Terror prosecutions have declined from a spike in the three months following the 9/11 attacks, when 116 people were indicted. Only 57 have been indicted in 2006.

The NYU study found that only 14% of the defendants were tied to Al Qaeda. Of the 510 defendants, more than half had "no known affiliation" with any terrorist group.

Justice officials said that suggests homegrown terror is a bigger threat than many realize.

Material support for terrorism was the most common charge in cases where a defendant was slapped with a federal terrorism offense - but only 30% were convicted. Officials noted, however, that the pending cases skew that statistic.

Former federal prosecutor Andrew McCarthy, who led probes of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, said the strategy has worked. But he said when the feds oversell a case's terror ties, it's "woefully unproductive [because] it tells the bad guys that we don't know what we think we know."

The report also found that no sleeper cell with "logistical or tactical links to Al Qaeda" has been uncovered in the U.S.

Power Of Privacy Board Questioned (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Civil liberties advocates urged a White House privacy board Tuesday to review aggressively the government's warrantless surveillance program, even as they questioned whether it has the power to do so.

The Privacy and Civil Liberties Board, created in late 2004 after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission, held its first hearing with testimony from nongovernment experts on ways to protect Americans' rights during the war on terror.

Its five members, who left the agenda open, repeatedly found themselves under scrutiny.

"This board needs to bring a little sunshine," said Caroline Frederickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. She said she was disappointed panel members recently praised the surveillance program's safeguards that a federal judge initially ruled as illegal.

"It remains clear that this program was built outside of, and in direct contradiction to, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and Fourth Amendment guaranteed protections," she said. "This panel's integrity and usefulness will be questioned if it dodges its duty to undertake a full review."

Board members defended their role, saying that as an advisory panel to the president it was not their job to determine whether the eavesdropping program was illegal but to find ways - in consultation with Congress and Bush - to improve it.

"Congress put us in the office of the president," said former Clinton White House counsel Lanny Davis, the panel's lone Democrat, after several audience members unsuccessfully asked the panel to divulge what specific issues it has raised with the White House.

"Had Congress wanted us to be an independent body, they would have made us an independent body," he said, explaining that as a result many of the board's deliberations will be kept secret. "Why Congress did what it did, that's an open question."

Privacy officers from the Office of Director of National Intelligence and the departments of Justice and Homeland Security also attended in a hearing described by the board as a "listening session."

The panel was created as a compromise between Congress and the White House amid growing public concern about the government's tactics in the war on terror, including the eavesdropping program, a financial transactions tracking system and secret CIA prisons where terrorism suspects have been interrogated.

Bush appointed Carol Dinkins, a Houston Republican, to chair the board. A longtime friend of the Bush family, she was treasurer of Bush's first campaign for governor of Texas, and a longtime partner in the law firm of Vinson & Elkins, where Attorney General Alberto Gonzales once was a partner.

The panel's other GOP members include vice chairman Alan Raul, a Washington attorney, former U.S. Solicitor General Theodore B. Olson and former Ambassador Francis Taylor.

The board does not have subpoena power, and the White House can vet its annual reports to Congress. The members serve at the pleasure of Bush, and Gonzales has final say over whether officials must comply with the board's recommendations.

After a delay of more than a year, board members last week received classified briefings on the National Security Agency's surveillance program as well as the administration's program to monitor international banking transactions.

Raul and Davis have said in interviews that they were impressed by the protections and indicated that Americans might be "more reassured" if they knew all the details.

On Tuesday, privacy advocates said they were worried the board might be partly missing the point.

"We continue to be troubled by the argument that a president has no obligation to follow the law or respect other constitutional guarantees whenever he invokes national security as a justification for his actions," David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, told the panel.

Frederickson said she was not confident of the board's ability to get meaningful information from government agencies. Americans might be better off with legislation introduced by Reps. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y. and Christopher Shays, R-Conn., that would make the board independent from the president, she said.

Board members responded that they were briefed by administration officials on the surveillance program with the understanding that they had the same level of classified detail as members on the congressional intelligence committees.

The board's first report to Congress is due in March.

Civil Liberties Panel Criticized At Hearing (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

Some groups say the advisory board is powerless. Members, picked by Bush, seem to struggle in their watchdog role.

WASHINGTON — A presidential advisory commission created two years ago to monitor the effects of anti-terrorism measures on civil liberties held its first public hearing Tuesday amid criticism from advocacy groups that the panel was a paper tiger and indications that its members were wrestling with their watchdog role.

The four-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board was urged to take a more aggressive tack in checking the power of the Bush administration in its handling of the war on terrorism. Witnesses cited concerns over such policies as the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program and an error-plagued terrorist watch list that has ensnared innocent citizens.

"This hearing is a welcome, but long overdue, first step in the right direction to air just some of the civil liberties transgressions of this administration over the past five years," said Caroline Fredrickson of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Clearly, you've been fiddling while Rome burns."

Created by Congress in response to a recommendation by the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission, the panel was conceived as a way to ensure the administration considers implications on privacy and civil liberties when implementing "all laws, regulations and executive branch policies." In practice, though, its power is limited by the fact that its members are appointed by the president, whose policies they are supposed to scrutinize.

Its authority is also likely to change next month when Democrats take control of Congress. Some Democrats have proposed making the panel independent of the White House, with the power to subpoena witnesses and documents. Others have suggested that its influence could wane if Democrats take over one of the reasons for its existence — aggressive oversight of administration policies.

But board members said at the hearing that they were taking their job seriously. They have received classified briefings on the secret surveillance program and a separate program that monitored international bank data, and were also briefed on legislation to put new limits on the surveillance program.

"This program today is an exceedingly important part of our mission to hear these points of view, and we have a great deal to learn in order to perform our statutory responsibility," panel member Theodore B. Olson, Bush's first solicitor general, said at the hearing. In recent months, he said, the board has met with senior officials of the Justice Department, the National Intelligence office and the National Security Agency, among others.

"We have had access to anyone that we wanted to have access to," Olson said. "We have been able to ask any questions we wanted to, and they have been answered."

The hearing also showed that panel members were struggling over such basic issues as whether the advice they give to the administration will ever become public.

"It is important for us to maintain the confidentiality of the recommendations that we might or might not take," Alan Raul, a Washington lawyer and vice chairman of the panel, said in response to a question. "To share some of the private views we might have would undermine our ability to be effective as the statute contemplated."

The panel's lone Democrat, Lanny J. Davis, a former Clinton administration advisor, said Congress put the board in a predicament.

"We did not put ourselves in the office of the president. If Congress wanted us to be an independent agency, they would have created us as an independent agency," he said.

Civil Libertarians Protest Privacy Policy (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The Bush administration's new privacy guidelines fail to protect the rights of Americans, and the board created to guarantee those rights lacks the independence to do the job, civil libertarians told the White House privacy board yesterday at its first public forum.

The guidelines, released Monday, are intended to protect the personal privacy and civil liberties of U.S. citizens as the government attempts to strengthen its intelligence-sharing to fight terrorism.

But, said privacy advocate Marc Rotenberg, the guidelines pale in comparison to protections offered under the Privacy Act of 1974.

"What struck me about the guidelines when compared with the federal privacy act was the absence of transparency, the absence of oversight and the inability for individuals to know what information about them is being collected by the federal government," said Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. Rotenberg was one of 10 panelists yesterday at a forum held by the White House Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, a panel created by Congress in 2004.

The new guidelines, issued by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, direct agencies to develop procedures to ensure that information on "U.S. persons" is lawfully obtained, is shared only if it relates to terrorism or law enforcement, and that data errors are corrected. They do not require the people affected to be notified.

James Dempsey, a member of a Markle Foundation task force on privacy, said the guidelines lack substance and specificity. They do not address data-collection standards or set up appropriate redress mechanisms for people erroneously targeted in counterterrorism programs, he said.

Democrats, about to take control of Congress, have promised stronger oversight over the Bush administration's terrorism surveillance program and its push for stronger data-mining programs to identify terrorists.

The five-member privacy board, which started work in March, lacks subpoena power and has only four full-time staff members. President Bush appointed all five members, four of whom are Republicans, including Theodore B. Olson, the administration's former solicitor general.

"What we have established here is an oversight mechanism within the executive branch of government," Rotenberg said at the forum at Georgetown University. "To be effective, the agency has to be independent because even well-intended people seeking to protect privacy will necessarily be under institutional pressure to move in the direction the . . . institution wishes it to go."

DOJ_NMG_0102919

Caroline Frederickson, legislative director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the board lacked any power to change policies on crucial issues such as citizen redress on terrorist and criminal watch lists.

"It's all bark and no bite," she said.

Frederickson called on Congress to give the board subpoena power and remove it from the executive branch. She also urged the board to be more aggressive in reviewing the government's surveillance program, which she said violates the Constitution.

Alexander W. Joel, the civil liberties and protection officer for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, said the 1974 Privacy Act is "an important foundation" and will continue to be.

"We have to be both safe and free," Joel said. "How do we do both? Sometimes by not doing as much on one side. Sometimes it's by adding work on the privacy and civil liberties side."

Board members, including Chairman Carole E. Dinkins, noted that the panel has visited the major agencies combating terrorism and met with senior officials, including the directors of national intelligence, the FBI and the National Security Agency. They received good cooperation and their questions were answered, board members said.

"We want to do this job conscientiously, and we're going to continue," Olson said.

Lanny J. Davis, the board's only Democrat, said he was puzzled about why Congress had placed what was supposed to be an independent oversight board under the president.

"That's an open question that none of us up here have been able to quite figure out," he said.

Bush's Privacy Watchdogs Make Public Debut (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 6, 2006

At its first public meeting, a White House panel hears from civil liberties advocates, but sheds little light on its supposed watchdog role.

WASHINGTON--In a stately, wood-paneled hall at Georgetown University, a seemingly phantom White House panel charged with overseeing privacy and civil liberties issues made its public debut on Tuesday. But it didn't quite receive the warm welcome it may have liked.

At its first open meeting since it was conceived two years ago, the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board heard more than three hours of tips for future action--and not all of it gentle--from advocacy groups, think tanks and academics of various political stripes.

Of the 10 such representatives who spoke on panels at the meeting, many urged the group to probe more deeply into the constitutional issues surrounding electronic surveillance, data mining and swapping, and terrorist watch list programs conducted by the government. Some didn't mince words.

"When our government is torturing innocent people and spying on Americans without a warrant, this board should act--indeed, should have acted long ago," Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington, D.C., office, told the panel in her testimony.

Training her gaze on the five presidentially appointed board members, she added: "Clearly you've been fiddling while Rome burns."

The board, borne out of an act of Congress in 2004 based on recommendations by the 9/11 Commission, has been dogged before. 9/11 Commission Chairman Thomas Kean, congressional Democrats, and watchdog groups accused the Bush administration of not taking the endeavor seriously and dragging their feet in nominating members and getting the group up and running.

That's because it was not until March 2006 that all of its members, which include partners at high-profile law firms and the chief security officer of General Electric, were confirmed by the U.S. Senate and able to hold their first meeting. Since then, they have held more than a dozen closed-door meetings composed "mainly of phone calls or teleconferences with administration insiders and agencies," by the ACLU's critical characterization.

Some board members implicitly acknowledged that rocky past but sought to reassure the sparsely populated hall that Tuesday afternoon's meeting, which they billed as an "expert's forum," would not be a one-shot deal.

"You should always feel free to raise your comments, your concerns and maybe, even an occasional compliment," Chairwoman Carol Dinkins, who served as a deputy attorney general in the Reagan administration's Justice Department and is now a partner, told an audience of about 40 people at the outset of the meeting. Dinkins is now a partner focusing on environmental and administrative law at the firm Vinson & Elkins.

How much power?

But in an ironic twist, the very group that the participants in Tuesday's meeting hoped to call to action wields less power than critics say it should.

By law, its members serve "at the pleasure" of the president, which means they can be retained or fired at his discretion. Although the body may request documents or interviews with officials, it lacks the power to subpoena such materials that many congressional committees and federal agencies enjoy. The government is free to withhold information if it determines that divulging it would thwart national security or "sensitive law enforcement or counterterrorism operations."

According to published reports, the board wasn't briefed until late last month on the National Security Agency's once-secret warrantless terrorist surveillance program, which has drawn legal challenges from civil liberties watchdogs who claim it sweeps up the phone calls and Internet communications of millions of innocent Americans. The program came to light through a New York Times report nearly a year ago.

Some members of Congress have proposed legislation that would beef up the board's powers. But at least one board member downplayed those concerns Tuesday.

"We have had access to anyone we've wanted to have to date," said board member Theodore "Ted" Olson, a partner with the firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher who focuses on appellate and constitutional law. "We have asked any questions we wanted to ask to date and they have been answered."

Suggestions and criticisms

The public meeting included no shortage of familiar suggestions from outside panelists--namely, that they believed the president's warrantless wiretapping program is operating outside of the law and the U.S. Constitution and must be reined in. But the afternoon brought a relative dearth of specific commitments on that front from the board members.

"Our chief burden as a board is to find the right balance between my own and, I believe, my colleagues' commitment to civil liberties and privacy rights while still giving the government the ability to protect our country, our children, and all of us from these forces of evil we all experienced on 9/11," said board member Lanny Davis, a former White House counsel under President Clinton and now a partner with the law firm Orrick in Washington, D.C.

During his testimony, Electronic Privacy Information Center Director Marc Rotenberg said he would be interested to hear whether the board agrees with the president's assertion that he has inherent authority to run the surveillance program without a court order. When fellow panelist Michael Ostrolenk of the Liberty Coalition, a civil liberties activist group, pressed the board members on whether they planned to answer that question, four of the board members remained mum.

Davis, the sole member to speak up, said he would prefer that "we go back to the conservative tradition of checks and balances," but seemed to suggest it was more Congress' duty than his own to curb the executive branch's power.

During a question-and-answer session, one audience member asked the board if it could reveal whether it had been briefed on how many Americans have had their phone records or Internet and phone communications monitored by the NSA.

"All that would be appropriate to say is that we did receive a detailed briefing with information of the kind you described," responded Vice Chairman Alan Raul, who served as a White House lawyer during the Reagan administration and is now a partner with a wide-ranging focus at the firm Sidley Austin in Washington D.C.

The audience member pressed the board member further, asking whether the board planned to recommend that such information be made public, just as the government is expected to disclose how many court-ordered wiretaps it completes each year, but Raul deferred again.

"I can't address the substance of the question," he said, adding: "Part of our ability to provide advice within the executive branch is the ability to provide advice confidentially and...to share some private views we have, I think, would undermine our (work)."

Raul's seemingly vague responses all go back to the manner in which Congress designed the board, fellow board member Davis said. "We didn't put ourselves in the office of the president," he said. "If Congress wanted us to be an independent agency, they would've created us as an independent agency."

How the board is supposed to reconcile its oversight duties under that umbrella, Davis added, remains "an open question that none of us up here have quite been able to figure out."

Italy Seeks Indictments Of C.I.A. Operatives In Egyptian's Abduction (NYT)

By Ian Fisher And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

ROME, Dec. 5 — Italian prosecutors asked Tuesday for the indictment of the country's former intelligence chief, along with 25 operatives of the Central Intelligence Agency, for their involvement in the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric from Milan in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0102921

The case is one of the most sensitive in Italy, raising the question of whether the Italian government broke the nation's laws by approving or assisting in the abduction.

Nicolò Pollari, the former chief of military intelligence, was replaced by the Italian government last month, possibly in anticipation of his indictment. On Tuesday, prosecutors in Milan asked for his indictment for what they said was his collaboration with American agents in the abduction of the cleric, Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, known as Abu Omar.

The indictment asks for the trials of 26 Americans, all but one of whom were C.I.A. agents, including two who were the top agency officials in Italy at the time. The other American named in the indictment is an Air Force colonel at the American air base in Aviano, from which Mr. Nasr says he was flown to an American air base in Germany, then to Egypt, where he claims he was tortured.

It is the first case in the world in which local officials have been tried in the contentious program of "extraordinary rendition," a program in which U.S. agents abducted scores of suspected Islamic militants after Sept. 11, 2001. The suspects are believed to have been taken to interrogation centers in third countries, some of which permit torture.

The case has complicated relations between Italy and the United States, though until now Italy has not asked for the agents' extradition, meaning that any trials against them could take place in absentia. The American Embassy here declined to comment on the indictments.

The risk of political embarrassment inside Italy was underscored Tuesday after one of Mr. Pollari's lawyers said the defense would call to the stand both the current prime minister, Romano Prodi, and the prime minister at the time, Silvio Berlusconi. The lawyer, Titta Madia, said the men would be able to testify about the existence of documents showing Mr. Pollari was opposed to the abduction.

"We mean to show that Mr. Pollari and the institution he represented acted correctly," Mr. Madia said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Pollari, 63, has maintained his innocence, claiming that he cannot defend himself adequately without breaching national security laws.

Mr. Berlusconi has repeatedly denied any knowledge of the abduction. Intelligence experts say it is highly unlikely that American agents would have carried out the kidnapping without high-level approval in the Italian government because the American action would have violated the sovereignty of a close ally.

Mr. Berlusconi's allies have portrayed the indictments as politically motivated — and Tuesday they strongly defended Mr. Pollari. "The attack against him risks discrediting not only him personally but also our services which, in these difficult years, have effectively protected our country against criminal assaults from international terrorism," said Enrico La Loggia, a deputy with Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party.

A judge will now have to decide whether the cases go to trial.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Catch The Holiday Spirit -- And A Terrorist (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Flying out for the holidays for a little relaxation and family time? Fine. But Uncle Sam hopes you'll remain vigilant, on the lookout for terrorists who also might be heading home to see their families in such places as Myrtle Beach, S.C., or Londonderry, N.H.

To help, the State Department and the Department of Homeland Security are distributing hundreds of "wanted terrorist" posters to major airports around the country, a news release announces.

Get those visions of dancing sugarplums out of your head and focus on the "Faces of Global Terrorism" posters. Each poster shows mug shots of "26 known terrorists with reward offers of up to $25 million" for some of them.

So as you put on your seat belt, take a look at that guy in shorts across the aisle. Sure, he's got blond hair now, and he's cleanshaven, but doesn't he look just a little like Abderraouf Ben Habib Jdey, a.k.a. Faruq al-Tunisi? Look for a scar on his forehead. Get the jump on him and it could be worth $5 million.

And that short guy sitting next to him with those big ears? Okay, the picture's maybe five years old, but isn't that Faker Ben Abdelaziz Boussora, a.k.a. Abu Yusif al-Tunisi, sitting in 15B? He's worth another $5 million from the Rewards for Justice program.

Who knows, but Osama-- worth a cool $25 million -- just might be that guy in the dark glasses and cane on your right.

DOJ_NMG_0102922

And remember: "You and your family may be eligible for relocation," the program Web site says, and "strict confidentiality is assured."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Liberty and security

Suffice it to say, Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee, Texas Democrat, is no fan of guns. In 2003, the National Rifle Association (NRA) took one look at her pro-gun-control voting record and gave her a rating of F.

That said, this column a few days ago was the first to report that the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) was alerted to a recent airport-security incident involving Mrs. Jackson-Lee, who serves on the Homeland Security subcommittee on intelligence, information sharing and terrorism risk assessment.

The congresswoman was going through security at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston when the alarm sounded not once, but twice. However, when she was placed in a queue for follow-up screening, Mrs. Jackson-Lee "complained" about the process, according to the DHS.

When she insisted on retrieving her personal carry-on items, a Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officer informed her that she would first have to be rescreened, at which point the lawmaker continued to complain.

Now, one group is actually coming to the congresswoman's defense. Or is it?

"I cannot commend you enough for criticizing the humiliating and degrading treatment that travelers must endure undergoing security screening," Michael L. Bane, founder of the Armed Passengers Project, writes in a two-page letter to Mrs. Jackson-Lee.

"However, one very valid question has been overlooked throughout the years of dialogue since September 11th. That question is whether the victims of Flight 93 -- indeed, the victims of all the doomed flights -- could have saved themselves as well as the lives of others if they had been allowed by law to carry weapons onboard," he says.

"If they had been permitted to do so, they would have had, literally, a fighting chance to stop the hijackers and at least minimize the damage done on that fateful day."

Mr. Bane's project (www.armedpassengers.org) advocates restoring the basic human right of self-defense on planes, trains, buses and shops. He reminds Mrs. Jackson-Lee of what Ben Franklin said: "Those who would sacrifice liberty for security deserve neither."

Instant No. 2

One thing is for certain, there are more rats roaming around the city of Washington than there are Republicans.

Consider the 2006 mayoral election. In a city that counts 354,410 registered voters, Republican candidate David W. Kranich received only 6,744 votes last month, or about 6 percent of the votes cast.

We call this to your attention because, based on the documents filed with the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics, the District of Columbia Independent Party (DCIP) is expecting certification this month as the District's newest political party and organization, representing the growing numbers of registered voters designated by the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics as "independent" and "no-party."

Already the DCIP is touting itself as "the second-largest ... voting group in the District of Columbia."

Feeling blue?

What's with all the blue neckties (particularly a certain shade of baby blue) appearing in Washington of late, including at the White House -- and during Christmas season, no less?

Even yesterday's White House pool report observed that for his early-morning meeting with President Bush, Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates "got the clothing memo -- both men showed up in dark pinstripe suits, white shirts and blue ties."

Quote of the week

"I apologized to him in Philadelphia the other day. I said, 'Bill, I take it back. My dog Millie did not know more about foreign policy than you do.' And he was very understanding."

-- Former President George Bush, speaking in Tallahassee, Fla., this week about a criticism he made of Bill Clinton during the 1992 presidential campaign

Going for baroque

"When we're earmarking money for opera houses, it's no wonder the federal government is baroque."

So says Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, who, while his wordplay is clever, is not happy to discover a $250,000 earmark for the Bardavan Opera House in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., in one congressional appropriations bill for fiscal 2006.

Homeland Security Extends Comment Time (WP/AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Under pressure from Congress and the public, the Homeland Security Department extended the time for people to comment on its computerized risk assessment system for international travelers.

The deadline was pushed back from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29, department spokesman Jarrod Agen said Tuesday.

By Tuesday, the department had received 59 public comments. All but one either opposed the system outright as a violation of privacy and other laws or called for better means for people to correct any errors in the data. One law firm representing ship owners and importers sought more time for comment.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who will become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee when Democrats take control of Congress in January, wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff seeking extension of the comment period.

Based on a briefing that committee staff received about the system last Friday, Thompson wrote "serious concerns have arisen that, with respect to U.S. citizens and possibly lawful permanent aliens, some elements of ATS as practiced may constitute violations of privacy or civil rights."

The Associated Press reported last Thursday that for four years Customs and Border Protection agents have been using the Automatic Targeting System, or ATS, to produce assessments of the risk that any of the millions of people crossing U.S. borders, including Americans, are terrorists or criminals.

Almost every traveler entering or leaving the country is evaluated by the ATS computers, but they are not allowed to see the assessment of them or directly challenge its accuracy. The government intends to keep the assessments 40 years and the data on which they are based for up to 40 years.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chair of the Senate Judiciary Committee, promised more congressional scrutiny next year of the government's anti-terrorist databases and called the ATS scheme "simply incredible."

The assessments are based on applying so-called rules, which are actually assumptions based on the past behavior of terrorists and criminals, to the person's travel records, including where they are from, how they paid for tickets, their motor vehicle records, past one-way travel, seating preference and what kind of meals they ordered.

The government's first acknowledgment that ATS was producing risk assessments of travelers came in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register, a dry daily compendium of rules and regulations.

Although that notice said ATS would be implemented Dec. 4 unless negative comments dissuaded officials, ATS has been operational for some time and no changes were planned for Dec. 4, Toby Levin, senior adviser in Homeland Security's privacy office told the AP.

The notice was only designed "to give greater transparency" to what Homeland Security was already doing, she said.

In fact, Jayson Ahern, assistant commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said federal agents had used ATS to develop risk assessments of travelers since the late 1990s, but the program had mushroomed in 2002 when legislation spawned by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks took effect. That legislation required all air and cruise lines to electronically give Homeland Security advance lists of all their incoming and outgoing passengers and crew members.

In addition, Ahern said Amtrak voluntarily provides passenger data on rail travelers between the U.S. and Canada and border agents keep track of many of the people and drivers who enter or leave land border crossings. Ahern said ATS is designed to pick out people who are not already on watch lists or wanted by law enforcement.

Homeland Security's Agen said a new notice announcing the extension was sent Tuesday to the Federal Register and would be published in a few days.

Furor Over 'Terror Scores' For Airline Travelers (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

NEW YORK

Do you know your terror score? Think you don't have one? You may, if you've traveled internationally during the past four years. And that is generating a growing controversy both in the United States and abroad.

The Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection (CBP) has been quietly assigning travelers, both American and foreign, on international flights a score that's designed to identify high-risk travelers. It's derived from a set of criteria, such as where you're from and whether you have a habit of buying one-way tickets and paying with cash.

DOJ_NMG_0102924

CBP officials call the program, which was implemented with little public notice and no congressional approval, a crucial tool to protect the nation. They describe it as a kind of extra electronic border that has the potential to catch terrorists and criminals before they get to an actual border crossing.

"Without a system like this, we would in many ways be blind to potential threats before they arrive," says Jarrod Agen, a DHS spokesman.

But some congressional leaders, privacy advocates, and travel executives believe it's an unparalleled use of data-mining to invade individuals' privacy. Some European leaders also object, claiming the program - called the Automated Targeting System (ATS) - violates a privacy agreement worked out between the US and the European Union.

Opponents are calling on the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to suspend the program until privacy concerns can be addressed. They say the key problem with ATS is that there's no way for individual to determine that he or she has been flagged. CBP can also share the information it's collected with other government agencies, other governments, and even private contractors. And CBP can keep the data up to 40 years.

"For the first time, a dossier is being built on me and every other innocent citizen that tracks information on them," says Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition in Radnor, Pa. "To add insult to injury ... they say they're keeping the data for 40 years - just in case Kevin Mitchell - whose profile is not threatening at the moment - has some kind of ties to a terrorist organization in the future."

The controversy over ATS erupted after privacy advocates at the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) found an obscure notice about it in the Federal Register last month. In the notice, which is required under the 1974 Privacy Act, DHS says that its data collection system "does not identify or create any new collection of information, rather DHS is providing additional notice and transparency of the functionality of these systems."

In fact, the data collection system has been in place since the mid-1990s, says CBP spokesman Pat Jones. It was started as a way to help interdict drug shipments and smugglers and was carried out by the Treasury Department. After 9/11, it was enhanced to include potential terrorists, and it was eventually moved to CBP, according to Mr. Jones. "The information that we've got is not invasive. How someone pays for their plane ticket I don't think is an invasion of anyone's privacy," he says. "These issues always involve some kind of a balance."

But privacy advocates contend the issue is far more complex. EFF's lead counsel, David Sobel, notes that prior to the publication of the November notice, the only public mention of ATS said that it was used to target and assess cargo shipments, not people.

"Congress didn't know they were doing this. Even DHS's own inspector general in a report issued this summer didn't realize they were using this to target passengers," he says.

The Transportation Security Administration has been trying to put together a similar data collection system to check air passengers for years, Mr. Sobel and other privacy advocates note. That system, called Secure Flight, has been tabled by DHS until privacy concerns raised by Congress can be addressed.

Mr. Mitchell of the Business Travel Coalition says that while he and others were testifying before Congress about problems with Secure Flight, DHS was quietly collecting almost the same kind of information. And unlike Secure Flight, which is designed to "ping data" and then expunge it, the ATS data is saved in a data bank.

"None of us knew this was going on behind our backs," says Mitchell. "This looks like it was done because [other data-mining systems failed] and Secure Flight's in trouble."

Some congressional leaders, including Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont, have pledged to hold hearings on ATS. "Databanks like this are overdue for oversight, and that is going to change in the new Congress," Senator Leahy said in a statement.

For now, DHS is standing by its program and says it has no plans to suspend it for further public scrutiny. "You tell [privacy advocates] when they're able to persuade the bad guys to announce when they're coming into the country, we won't need a system like this," says Jones of CBP.

Probes Dismiss Imams' Racism Claim (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Three parallel investigations into the removal of six imams from a US Airways flight last month have so far concluded that the airline acted properly, that the imams' claims they were merely praying and their eviction was racially inspired are without foundation.

An internal investigation by the airline found that air and ground crews "acted correctly" when they requested that the Muslim men be removed from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight on Nov. 20.

DOJ_NMG_0102925

"We believe the ground crew and employees acted correctly and did what they are supposed to do," US Airways spokeswoman Andrea Rader said.

Omar Shahin -- one of the imams and the group's spokesman -- said the men did not behave out of the ordinary while on the plane, and that passengers overreacted because some of the imams conducted prayers in the concourse before boarding.

US Airways' investigation is "substantially complete" but Miss Rader said airline officials still want to meet with the imams to review the situation. "We're looking at it as a security issue and as a customer-service issue and where we might need to do outreach," she said.

Airline officials have had several discussions with Mr. Shahin, but a meeting scheduled for Monday with all six men was canceled at the imams' request.

"We talked with crew members and passengers and those on the ground. We've done what we typically do in a situation where there is a removal or some kind of customer service at issue," Miss Rader said. "We found out the facts are substantially the same, and the imams were detained because of the concerns crew members had based on the behavior they observed, and from reports by the customers."

The Minneapolis airport police department's report on the incident said the imams' behavior warranted their removal. The imams were not accused of breaking any laws.

The Department of Homeland Security's (DHS) Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties is reviewing the actions of department members who were involved in the incident.

Secret Service agents questioned the imams, who are accused of making negative comments about President Bush and the Iraq war. Officials of the Transportation Security Administration were involved in screening the imams and their baggage.

"There is no indication there is any inappropriate activity, at least no indication at this time," DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said. "To my knowledge, we are only doing a review, and that is a fairly routine practice with incidents like this."

The Air Carrier Security Committee of the Air Line Pilots Association investigated the incident and said, "The crew's actions were strictly in compliance with procedures and demonstrated overall good judgment in the care and concern for their passengers, fellow crew members, and the company."

"The decisions made by all the parties were made as a result of the behavior of the passengers and not as a result of their ethnicity," the report concluded.

The suspicious behavior cited in the report included "changing seats, stating anti-war, anti U.S.-Iraq involvement, negative comments concerning the president of the United States." The report noted that "two of the passengers requesting seat-belt extensions when their body size did not appear to warrant their use."

Mr. Shahin told television reporters that he needed the seat-belt extension because he weighs 280 pounds. However, the police report lists his weight as 201 pounds. Weights listed for the other imams ranged from 170 pounds to 250 pounds.

The imams have retained the Council of American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) as their legal counsel. CAIR officials said yesterday that initial claims by the airline contradict the official police report.

"The imams are obviously concerned about a number of false and distorted representation of the facts and events, and one example is initial reports that all suggested they refused to get off the plane when personnel asked them to, and the police report said they all got off and cooperated," a CAIR spokesman said.

On A Wing And A Prayer (WSJ)

By Debra Burlingame

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Allahu Akbar! Those are the words that started it all. Six bearded imams are said to have shouted them out while offering evening prayers as they and 141 other passengers waited at the gate for their flight out of Minneapolis International Airport. It was three days before Thanksgiving. Allahu Akbar: God is great.

Initial media reports of the incident did not include the disturbing details about what happened after they boarded US Airways flight 300, but the story quickly went national with provocative headlines: "Six Muslims Ejected from US Air Flight for Praying." Yes, they were praying -- but let's be clear about this. The very last human sound on the cockpit voice recorder of United flight 93 before it screamed into the ground at 580 miles per hour is the sound of male voices shouting "Allahu Akbar" in a moment of religious ecstasy.

They, too, were praying. The passengers and crew of flight 93 lost their valiant fight to take back the plane just one hour and 20 minutes after it pushed back from the gate. Until the hijackers stormed the cockpit door, they were just a handful of Middle Eastern-looking men on their way to sunny California. So, yes, let's be exceedingly clear about the whole matter. Some 3,000 men, women and children are dead because the unassuming people on those airplanes did not look at them and see murderers. Or dangerous Arabs. Or fanatical Muslims. They saw a few guys in chinos. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0102926

In five years since the 9/11 attacks, U.S. commercial carriers have transported approximately 2.9 billion domestic and international passengers. It is a testament to the flying public, but, most of all, to the flight crews who put those planes into the air and who daily devote themselves to the safety and well-being of their passengers, that they have refused to succumb to ethnic hatred, religious intolerance or irrational fear on those millions of flights. But they have not forgotten the sight of a 200,000-pound aircraft slicing through heavy steel and concrete as easily as a knife through butter. They still remember the voices of men and women in the prime of their lives saying final goodbyes, people who just moments earlier set down their coffee and looked out the window to a beautiful new morning. Today, when travelers and flight crews arrive at the airport, all the overheated rhetoric of the civil rights absolutists, all the empty claims of government career bureaucrats, all the disingenuous promises of the election-focused politicians just fall away. They have families. They have responsibilities. To them, this is not a game or a cause. This is real life.

Given that Islamic terrorists continue their obsession with turning airplanes into weapons of mass destruction, it is nothing short of obscene that these six religious leaders -- fresh from attending a conference of the North American Imams Federation, featuring discussions on "Imams and Politics" and "Imams and the Media" -- chose to turn that airport into a stage and that airplane into a prop in the service of their need for grievance theater. The reality is, these passengers endured a frightening three-and-a-half hour ordeal, which included a front-to-back sweep of the aircraft with a bomb-sniffing dog, in order to advance the provocative agenda of these imams in, of all the inappropriate places after 9/11, U.S. airports.

"Allahu Akbar" was just the opening act. After boarding, they did not take their assigned seats but dispersed to seats in the first row of first class, in the midcabin exit rows and in the rear -- the exact configuration of the 9/11 execution teams. The head of the group, seated closest to the cockpit, and two others asked for a seatbelt extension, kept on board for obese people. A heavy metal buckle at the end of a long strap, it can easily be used as a lethal weapon. The three men rolled them up and placed them on the floor under their seats. And lest this entire incident be written off as simple cultural ignorance, a frightened Arabic-speaking passenger pulled aside a crew member and translated the imams' suspicious conversations, which included angry denunciations of Americans, furious grumblings about U.S. foreign policy, Osama Bin Laden and "killing Saddam."

Predictably, these imams and their attorneys now suggest that another passenger who penned a frantic note of warning and slipped it to a flight attendant was somehow a hysterical Islamophobe. Let us remember that but for their performance at the gate this passenger might never have noticed these men or their behavior on board, much less have the slightest clue as to their religion or political passions. Of course, that was the point of the shouting. According to the police report, yet another alarmed passenger who frequently travels to the Middle East described a conversation with one of the imams. The 31-year-old Egyptian expressed fundamentalist Muslim views, and stated the he would go to whatever measures necessary to obey all the tenets set out in the Koran.

The activist Muslim American Society (MAS) issued a press release within hours of the incident, demanding an apology and announcing a "pray-in" at Reagan National Airport in Washington, D.C. Standing just a short distance from the Pentagon, where five years ago black plumes of smoke from the crash of American Airlines flight 77 could be seen for miles, the assembled demonstrators complained that African-American Muslims, accustomed to "driving while black," must now cope with the injustice of "flying while Muslim." This brazen two-step is racial politics at its worst; none of the imams are African-American. MAS, which teaches an "Activist Training" program with lessons on "how to talk to the media," must have been thrilled when one cable news outfit, suckered by the rhetoric, compared the imams' conduct to that of civil rights icon Rosa Parks, who refused to give up her bus seat in the face of institutional racism. One wonders what the parents of the three 11-year-olds who died on flight 77 -- all African-American kids on a National Geographic field trip -- would make of this stunning comparison.

Today, MAS Executive Director Mahdi Bray says his organization wants more than an apology. He wants to "hit [US Airways] where it hurts, the pocketbook," and, joined by the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), will seek compensation for the imams, civil and federal monetary sanctions, and new, sweeping legislation that will extract even bigger penalties for airlines that engage in "racial and religious profiling." An investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Civil Rights & Civil Liberties is underway. Not incidentally, it is the "fatwa department" of MAS that pushed for segregated taxi lines that would permit Muslim cab drivers at the Minneapolis airport to reject passengers carrying alcohol. * * *

Here's what the flying public needs to know about airplanes and civil rights: Once your foot traverses the entranceway of a commercial airliner, you are no longer in a democracy in which everyone gets a vote and minority rights are affirmatively protected in furtherance of fuzzy, ever-shifting social policy. Ultimately, the responsibility for your personal safety and security rests on the shoulders of one person, the pilot in command. His primary job is to safely transport you and your belongings from one place to another. Period.

This is the doctrine of "captain's authority." It has a longstanding history and a statutory mandate, further strengthened after 9/11, which recognizes that flight crews are our last line of defense between the kernel of a terrorist plot and its lethal execution. The day we tell the captain of a commercial airliner that he cannot remove a problem passenger unless he divines beyond question what is in that passenger's head and heart is the day our commercial aviation system begins to crumble. When a passenger's conduct is so disturbing and disruptive that reasonable, ordinary people fear for their lives, the captain must have the discretionary authority to respond without having to consider equal protection or First Amendment standards about which even trained lawyers with the clarity of hindsight might strongly disagree. The pilot in command can't get it wrong. At 35,000 feet, when multiple events are rapidly unfolding in real time, there is no room for error.

We have a new, inviolate aviation standard after 9/11, which requires that the captain cannot take that airplane up so long as there are any unresolved issues with respect to the security of his airplane. At altitude, the cockpit door is barred and crews are instructed not to open them no matter what is happening in the cabin behind them. This is an extremely challenging situation for the men and women who fly those planes, one that those who write federal aviation regulations and the people who agitate for more restrictions on a captain's authority will never have to face themselves.

Likewise, flight attendants are confined in the back of the plane with upwards of 200 people; they must be the eyes and ears, not just for the pilot but for us all. They are not combat specialists, however, and to compel them to ignore all but the most unambiguous cases of suspicious behavior is to further enable terrorists who act in ways meant to defy easy categorization. As the American Airlines flight attendants who literally jumped on "shoe bomber" Richard Reid demonstrated, cabin crews are sharply attuned to unusual or abnormal behavior and they must not be second-guessed, or hamstrung by misguided notions of political correctness.

Ultimately, the most despicable aspect about the imams' behavior is that when they pierced the normally quiet hum of a passenger waiting area with shouts of "Allahu Akbar" and deliberately engaged in terrorist-associated behavior that was sure to trigger suspicion, they exploited the fear that began with the Sept. 11 attacks. The imams, experienced travelers all, counted on the security system established after 9/11 to kick in, and now they plan not only to benefit financially from the proper operation of that system but to substantially weaken it -- with help from the Saudi-endowed attorneys at CAIR.

US Airways is right to stand by its flight crew. It will be both dangerous and disgraceful if the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Transportation and, ultimately, our federal courts allow aviation security measures put in place after 9/11 to be cynically manipulated in the name of civil rights.

Ms. Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, is the sister of Charles F. "Chic" Burlingame III, the pilot of American Airlines flight 77, which was crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001.

For Mass-casualty Preparedness, Congress Should Fund 'ER One' (HILL)

By Tommy Thompson

The Hill, December 6, 2006

The old adage that "failing to prepare is preparing to fail" seems particularly poignant today. More than five years after Sept. 11, 2001, no state is adequately prepared for a potential mass-casualty disaster caused by a terrorist attack, pandemic or natural disaster. A new CDC study on the state of emergency rooms and the Institute of Medicine's report this summer on our inability to respond to large disasters and epidemics tell a very alarming tale about the state of emergency preparedness in this country.

As head of the federal government's health response to Sept. 11 and as a former governor, I am keenly aware that emergency preparedness is a critical issue for every state's chief executive and legislature. Although major efforts have been made to strengthen security and improve coordination of resources, one persistent public policy question remains unanswered: How best can the federal government help prepare 50 states with diverse assets, risks and needs for an unknown mass-casualty emergency?

Congress can now begin to answer that question. Under debate will be this year's major spending bill for the Department of Health and Human Services, and along with it, a provision to fund a hospital preparedness project that could benefit every state. The project, commonly known as "ER One," is the Washington Hospital Center's proposed state-of-the-art emergency facility. It is arguably one of the smartest investments that Congress could make, and it deserves to be approved. Conceived by physicians, scientists, infectious disease specialists, disaster relief professionals, and security experts recruited from some of the nation's most prestigious institutions, ER One will bolster states' preparedness in two critical ways.

First, as the nation's first civilian demonstration facility, ER One will serve as an education center and working research laboratory for testing and publishing new approaches to managing risks. ER One Institutes, the educational and training arm of the project, will create practical, exportable training models on emergency preparedness for every type of hospital nationwide. Medical personnel from small-town facilities to major urban complexes throughout the United States will learn how to deal with mass-casualty events beyond their scope of daily practice and maintain those skills as new treatments and new threats appear.

By having access to this thinking and training, states and localities would be much better served than if the funds designated for ER One were simply included as part of the overall hospital preparedness block grants through which funds are parceled out to the states. The money needed to fund construction of ER One will make a huge impact and ultimately benefit disaster preparedness at all levels far more than it would if it were simply thrown into the pot and parceled out in small amounts to dozens or even hundreds of potential recipients.

Training and education for the country's hospital staffs is a priority today. The Trust for America's Health (TFAH) has found that hospitals in nearly one-third of the states have not sufficiently planned for a surge of extra patients. In addition, the General Accounting Office has said the nation's emergency preparedness efforts in healthcare remain grossly inadequate. ER One and the ER One Institutes represent the most efficient and effective way to address this need.

Second, as the nation's first all-risks-ready facility, ER One would meet myriad challenges posed by a mass-casualty medical emergency in the nation's capital. A major disaster that interrupts government operations, cripples essential federal services, shuts down communications, or disrupts national security would create chaos across the country and in world markets. Every American would be affected — from recipients of government programs such as Social Security, Medicare, low-interest loans and housing allowances to state and local law enforcement officers.

Washington's unique role will always make the city vulnerable to dangers that have national ramifications. ER One would help protect government functions and personnel, as well as the general population, by managing large surges of patients, treating victims of any major disaster, and containing rare contagious illnesses, especially biological, chemical or radiological.

Rarely has an issue enjoyed this level of support from both political parties, local and national officials and the public and private sectors, particularly during an election year. The ER One project has already received federal funding for planning and design efforts. And although both the fiscal year 2006 and 2007 budgets included money for such a facility, the funds needed to begin construction became an unintended casualty during the most recent congressional debate over earmarks.

Now Congress has another opportunity to boost states' preparedness by approving a Health and Human Services budget that includes funds for ER One. The choice is clear: Congress can give states the ER One tools and training they need to meet the challenges of a dangerous world — or it can prepare to fail by failing to prepare.

As an open and free society, we may be more vulnerable, but we also have the ability to be more resourceful. We must be aware of danger, but always recognize opportunity. ER One is that opportunity.

Package Tossed Near White House (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

Streets around the White House were closed Tuesday morning after a woman threw a package into the courtyard of the adjacent Old Executive Office Building.

The woman was taken into custody without incident and was being questioned by the Secret Service, said Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the service. The package was being investigated but no immediate details were available.

The president was in the White House at the time of the incident.

Streets were closed along Pennsylvania Avenue, between 17th and 18th streets, and along 17th Street between State Place and H Street.

Report Finds New Problems In FEMA Aid Distribution (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The Federal Emergency Management Agency has recouped less than 1 percent of an estimated $1 billion in fraudulent or unjustified payments it distributed after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a new report by Congressional investigators says.

At the same time, the agency continued to wrongly send out millions of dollars of new aid this year, including $17 million in rental assistance to families living rent-free in FEMA trailers, the Government Accountability Office report says.

The auditors' findings, set to be released on Wednesday, demonstrate how the agency has remained open to criticism from advocates for evacuees as being too stingy with people who have real needs, and to criticism from auditors as being too willing to give taxpayer dollars to scam artists and cheats.

Just last week, a federal judge ordered the agency to restore housing assistance and pay back rent to thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees who had been deemed ineligible for long-term housing aid.

Yet the new report by the Congressional investigators said that, in addition to the rental aid given to more than 8,600 victims living in trailers rent-free, the agency distributed $20 million to people who registered for both hurricanes, meaning they received double payments for rent and other emergency aid.

The investigators also recently determined that the agency gave at least $3 million to more than 500 foreign students or other foreigners in the United States on work visas even though federal law specifically prohibits such aid.

"FEMA has much work to do before we can be confident that it is providing assistance to those who are eligible and who need it, while denying it to those who do not," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut. Mr. Lieberman is the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which has scheduled a hearing for Wednesday on Hurricane Katrina-related fraud and abuse.

The agency's officials on Tuesday said they had not yet seen the new report and would not comment in detail until they had. But they acknowledged the serious flaws in distribution of financial aid after the hurricanes. A copy of the report was given to The New York Times.

"The stringent controls instituted this past year by FEMA will dramatically improve safeguards and help eliminate processing errors and fraudulent abuse," Pat Philbin, an agency spokesman, said in a written statement.

But the Government Accountability Office report made it clear that the inappropriate payments continued into this year. For example, 10 residents of an apartment complex in Plano, Tex., collected $46,000 in rental assistance from FEMA through June, even though the City of Plano was paying their rent, with money from the federal agency.

FEMA estimates that of the $7 billion in emergency aid given out to individuals and families after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, about $290 million was unjustified. But based on more than a year of spot-checking applications, Congressional auditors said they believed the federal agency was grossly underestimating the figure, and that a more accurate amount would be at least $1 billion.

That would include money that went to thousands of inmates and people who used falsified Social Security numbers or submitted applications for phantom homes, all cases turned up by the investigators.

FEMA has recouped about $7.5 million of these inappropriate payments, an agency official said Tuesday, and he estimated that an additional $8.1 million was on the way.

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, chairwoman of the Homeland Security Committee, said the small percentage of money recouped showed how important it was for the agency to improve how it screened applications for disaster aid.

"Once the money is out the door, it is very difficult for it to be recovered," Ms. Collins said.

At the time Hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit, the agency had systems in place to prevent fraud, including a computer program that looked for applications with the same Social Security number. But officials said they turned the system off, claiming that they were worried it might prevent legitimate victims from getting help, the report said.

That is why, for example, the 7,600 individuals had been able to collect $20 million in emergency aid for properties supposedly hit by both storms, the report said.

Ms. Collins said she did not accept the assertion that the agency could not figure out how to distribute emergency assistance quickly while preventing widespread waste and fraud.

"It's a false choice," she said.

FEMA Appeals Katrina Housing Order (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

The Bush administration is challenging a court order requiring it to make housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why housing funding was cut. He said that violated the Constitution, and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately.

FEMA said Tuesday it would appeal that ruling.

The government is still under a court order to make housing payments for people displaced by last year's storm, but the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which won last week's ruling, said in court documents Tuesday that FEMA has refused to disclose its plans for restarting the program.

FEMA may ask an appeals court to put the judge's ruling on hold while the appeal plays out.

Leon criticized the agency's handling of the housing program and described the process as "Kafkaesque."

FEMA Director R. David Paulison told reporters last week that he was disappointed by the ruling.

"It's almost a thing of no good deed goes unpunished," he said. "We felt like we did a good job."

Storm Evacuees Remain In Grip Of Uncertainty (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102930

BAKER, La., Dec. 2 — Wynaen Walker keeps a change of clothes, her prescription medications and important papers in the trunk of a friend's car. When she leaves her FEMA trailer, she tapes handwritten signs on the door with her phone number. "I still live here," one of them says.

Ms. Walker does this not so much because Hurricane Rita destroyed her house in Lake Charles, but because in October, she came home from church to find her trailer, in a park here operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency, occupied by someone else. The lock had been changed. The meager belongings she had accumulated since the hurricane were gone.

"Imagine leaving your house, and you're going right up the street," said Ms. Walker, known as Nina, who was told by FEMA officials to seek out a homeless shelter. "I come back, I ain't got no place."

"They left me out in the cold," she added. "I really panicked."

Ms. Walker had been displaced by a family from one of five FEMA trailer parks at the nearby Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport that are scheduled to close in April. Though her move was a mistake, it is one that residents say the agency has made repeatedly in its trailer parks. And when the trailers at the airport are shut down next year, more than 600 families who took refuge in those parks will find themselves on the move once again.

More than a year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, life is still precarious and unpredictable for many evacuees, especially those who have depended on the government for a modicum of stability. About 102,000 families are still living in government trailers scattered around the region, and an additional 33,000 are living in apartments paid for by FEMA. What trauma victims need most, stability, is just what has proved most elusive.

Most families in the five parks that are closing have not been told where their new homes will be. In New Orleans, residents at two FEMA trailer parks were notified that the construction of a film studio nearby would mean ceaseless noise for months. Initially they were told the parks would close, but the families refused to move yet again.

For thousands more displaced families living in apartments, FEMA has cut off aid with little explanation, but the agency was ordered by a federal judge late last month to reinstate the aid and pay months of back rent. The judge described the ordeal of the families, many of whom have already left their apartments or are on the brink of eviction, as "Kafkaesque."

The seesaw of daily life for the displaced is playing out against a backdrop of still larger uncertainties. Billions of dollars intended to help homeowners rebuild have yet to be distributed. And on Saturday, at a "town hall" meeting held simultaneously in five cities, Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans said he did not expect the city's rebuilding plan to be finished until mid-January.

Mental health experts have repeatedly warned of the importance of a consistent environment for adults and children who are recovering from trauma, and evacuees complain that stress has aggravated their physical ailments, literally making them sick.

And people who work at the agencies trying to help evacuees no longer bother to conceal their anger and astonishment at the constant change in policies and how they are carried out.

"People are basically in many instances left to fend for themselves, while being hampered, if not prevented, from fending for themselves," said Raymond A. Jetson, the chief executive of the Louisiana Family Recovery Corps, a nonprofit organization started at the behest of Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

Mr. Jetson added, "There is a misunderstanding that in some way these people have abdicated the expectation of being treated with respect and dignity."

Jim Stark, the director of the Louisiana Transitional Recovery Office at FEMA, acknowledged that finding permanent housing had been "more difficult than anyone anticipated." On the other hand, he said, "The travel trailers aren't meant as permanent homes."

For those who got apartments instead of trailers, the rental assistance program has been rife with confusing letters, repetitive requests and conflicting information from FEMA. The agency has consistently defended the process, saying that any denial of benefits can be appealed within 60 days.

But in last month's ruling, Judge Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court disagreed, saying the inconsistencies amounted to a denial of the due process rights of evacuees. He ordered FEMA to clarify the eligibility requirements and "immediately restore" many families to the program. [On Tuesday, FEMA appealed the ruling.]

So far, though, said Cindy Gabriel, the spokeswoman for the Community Settlement Network, which has taken over for Houston's evacuee housing program, the ruling has done little but create confusion, in part because FEMA's lawyers have given no indication of how they will carry it out.

Christalyn Mavis, 20, an evacuee living in Austin, Tex., said she and her fiancé had been threatened with eviction for months while they tried to convince FEMA that they were eligible for rental assistance. In September, Ms. Mavis, who lost her mother in Hurricane Katrina, gave birth to a boy, adding urgency to the couple's need for resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0102931

"We were in the recovery room," she said, "and I was getting in touch with my lawyer and caseworker from the hospital hours after giving birth."

Tired of fighting, the couple now hope to move to a less expensive city.

In Baton Rouge, the five trailer parks are closing because the airport has declined to renew the lease. Mr. Stark said the residents who did not find their own housing would be moved, but the agency is not yet sure where. "We're going to try to be as least disruptive to the families that live there as possible," he said.

Yet even the moves that FEMA has already orchestrated have not necessarily been smooth. Kim Landry, the transitional communities coordinator for the Family Recovery Corps, said caseworkers knew of five cases like Ms. Walker's in which people had returned home to find their property, or in some cases their entire trailer, gone.

"We do make regular sweeps through the parks, and we often find that people have moved without telling us," Mr. Stark said. "If it looks like no one's home and we haven't been able to contact the folks, we will close the trailer."

FEMA procedures call for three attempts to contact a resident by phone and the posting of an abandonment notice before a trailer is cleaned out. The contents are supposed to be "bagged and tagged" and stored for 30 days. But, an agency spokeswoman said, "maintenance and deactivation contractors" have a "realistic margin of error."

Ms. Walker, who is 49 and has diabetes, high blood pressure and arthritis, was eventually issued a new, empty trailer. But the belongings on her carefully written list — "engagement ring $1249.99 pl. tx." and "clothings new — (7) outfits" — have not been recovered. On Tuesday, she has an appointment at the FEMA storage facility to look for them. At the mention of this, Ms. Walker, who with her chipper grin, multicolored sweater and braided pigtails is a picture of stoic cheer, broke down like a child.

"The stuff that was taken out of my trailer wasn't bagged and tagged," she wailed. "Mine wasn't bagged and tagged. It's hard starting over again. You know. Everything. It's very hard."

Then she pulled herself together, straightened up, and smiled.

WAR NEWS:

Gates OK'd For Defense By Senate Panel (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 6, 2006

Robert Gates, seemingly clinching confirmation as the new secretary of defense, said Tuesday the United States is not winning in Iraq and he's confident President Bush will listen to his ideas about forging a new war strategy.

He won speedy and unanimous approval from the Senate Armed Services Committee after five hours of testimony, a bipartisan show of support that suggested how eager many lawmakers are to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. The full Senate could seal Gates' confirmation as early as Wednesday.

"In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq," he told the committee. But he also acknowledged the complexity of the challenge.

"There are no new ideas on Iraq," he said during a discussion of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which previewed its findings and recommendations to President Bush Tuesday and will release them Wednesday. Gates was a member of the group until Bush announced his nomination for the Pentagon job last month.

The senators voted 24-0 to support the nomination to replace Rumsfeld, who has become a symbol of the Bush administration's steadfast course in a war that has long since soured with the public and much of the world.

"I voted yes because in both the substance of his answers and the tone of his answers, he seemed open to course correction," said Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will be the committee's chairman when Democrats take control of the Senate next month.

During his appearance, Gates would not commit to any specific new course of action in the conflict. He said he would consult first with commanders and others.

Asked directly by Levin whether the U.S. is winning in Iraq, Gates replied, "No, sir." That response appeared to contradict Bush, who said at an Oct. 25 news conference, "Absolutely, we're winning."

Gates later said he believes the United States is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

His statements on the war — and his professed openness to change — underscored pressures heaped on Bush since Democratic victories in last month's congressional elections, votes widely read as a rejection of the administration's steadfast course in the war.

Unrelenting violence by insurgents and between ethnic groups, and a U.S. death toll that has soared past 2,900, have raised questions about the effectiveness of Iraq's government. Bush in recent weeks has expressed a willingness to consider a fresh course in the war, but has shown no sign of a willingness to heed Democratic calls to start withdrawal of the 140,000 U.S. troops.

Bush has said he wants to keep U.S. forces there until Iraq is able to govern and defend itself without being a haven for terrorists.

"It seems to me that the United States is going to have to have some kind of presence in Iraq for a long time ... but it could be with a dramatically smaller number of U.S. forces than are there today," Gates said.

Iraq dominated the hearing, which began with Gates saying, "I am under no illusion why I am sitting before you today — the war in Iraq." Without mentioning Rumsfeld by name, Gates made clear that he hopes to find a strategy that is more effective in Iraq than the current Pentagon approach.

After lunch, Gates told the committee he wanted to amplify on his morning remark about not winning in Iraq. He said he did not want U.S. troops to think he believes they are being unsuccessful in their assigned missions.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Gates said. "Where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments and so on." He said other federal agencies should do more in Iraq.

Gates, a former director of the CIA, fielded questions with apparent ease, acknowledging at times that he simply did not know the answer or needed more time for study. He was armed with details, such as the exact U.S. death count in Iraq (2,889 as of Monday, he said), and the number of extra troops NATO has been asked to provide in Afghanistan (2,500, he said).

There was little of the confrontational tone that sometimes emerged when the pricklier Rumsfeld testified before the same committee, which is responsible for overseeing the Defense Department.

If confirmed, Gates said, he planned to visit U.S. commanders and troops in Iraq "quite soon."

Gates, 63, said he believes Bush wants to see Iraq improve to the point where it can govern and defend itself, while seeking a new approach. "What we are now doing is not satisfactory," Gates said.

On other high-priority subjects, Gates said:

· He worries about the prospect of growing Iranian influence in Iraq.

· He would be open to the idea of direct talks with Iran and Syria about stabilizing Iraq.

· He is uncertain whether the Army and Marine Corps need to expand, as many in Congress advocate.

· He is "sympathetic to the notion" of adding more U.S. or allied troops in Afghanistan.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow was pressed by reporters about Gates' remark that the U.S. is not winning in Iraq. Snow said Gates' overall testimony showed he shares Bush's view that the U.S. must help Iraq govern and defend itself.

"I know you want to pit a fight between Bob Gates and the president, it doesn't exist," Snow told reporters.

Gates said he came to some of his conclusions during his time on the Iraqi Study Group, but he did not say what information or testimony in that process led him.

Asked whether announcing a specific troop withdrawal timetable would send a signal of U.S. weakness, he said it "would essentially tell (the insurgents) how long they have to wait until we're gone."

Gates also expressed concern about political divisions in Iraq. Unless the dominant Shiite faction shows a new willingness to share power and national wealth with the minority Sunnis and Kurds, then the country will fracture, and "it will not be long before we have a government in Baghdad that is as hostile as the one in Tehran," he said.

Much of the questioning from panel members focused on whether Gates was committed to providing unvarnished advice to Bush. He assured the committee he would not shirk from that duty.

He said he did not give up his position as president of Texas A&M University and return to Washington to "be a bump on a log."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a likely 2008 presidential candidate and an advocate of increasing U.S. troop strength in Iraq, asked whether Gates believes the U.S. had too few troops at the outset of the war in 2003.

"I suspect in hindsight some of the folks in the administration would not make the same decisions they made," including the number of troops in Iraq to establish control after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, Gates said.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether the American and Iraqi people and the next president of the United States will face a slowly but steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region or will face the very real risk, and possible reality, of a regional conflagration," Gates said.

Gates Gets Unanimous Approval Of Senate Panel (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Armed Services Committee today unanimously approved the nomination of Robert M. Gates to become secretary of Defense, hours after he acknowledged that the U.S. was not winning in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0102933

In a 21-0 vote, the Senate committee sent the nomination of Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld to the full Senate. The vote was announced by committee Chairman Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) this afternoon.

At the morning session of his confirmation hearing, Gates said he believed that President Bush, by nominating him, was looking for a new approach in Iraq. Gates vowed under questioning by both Democrats and Republicans that he would give the White House his frank opinion regardless of the conclusions reached by his predecessors.

"Mr. Gates, do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" asked Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who will become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee when Democrats take over Congress next month.

"No sir," Gates replied.

Gates' views before the committee sharply contrasted with the public stance of the Bush administration in several ways.

He told senators that "there clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country." And he said he would consider increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps. Rumsfeld has resisted increasing the size of the force and has opposed troop withdrawals.

Gates pledged to maintain his independence and speak "boldly" to Congress and the White House.

"I am not giving up the presidency of Texas A&M ... to come back to Washington and be a bump on a log," Gates told the committee. "I don't owe anybody anything."

In addition, he expressed concern over "offline analytical organizations" in the government, an apparent reference to efforts by Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney to set up groups outside the established intelligence agencies to examine information gathered by U.S. agents.

Most strikingly, Gates refused to say whether he believed the decision to invade Iraq was correct, saying that was a judgment that should be left for historians.

But at the beginning the afternoon session, Gates sought to clarify his remarks and told the committee he didn't want to give the military the wrong impression.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Gates said. "Where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments and so on."

At the White House, Press Secretary Tony Snow defended Gates and Bush despite what seemed to be different positions.

"I know you want to pit a fight between Bob Gates and the president. It doesn't exist," Snow said.

Gates' testimony appeared to assuage leading Democrats, who indicated they were ready to quickly approve Gates as the nation's Defense secretary. Levin said he found Gates' stance "a necessary, refreshing breath of reality."

Committee aides said they anticipated that the Gates hearing would conclude today and that the panel could vote on the nomination this evening, though it was more likely to come Wednesday.

"Things are going pretty well for you right now," laughed Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a leading centrist on the committee.

Quick approval would contrast with Gates' confirmation hearings in 1991, one of the longest and most contentious in recent Senate history. At the time, Gates was grilled on his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal and accusations that he bullied analysts into shaping intelligence to fit his worldview.

Some of those charges were raised again today, particularly accusations by George Shultz, the secretary of State when Gates was the No. 2 official at the CIA, who accused Gates in his memoir of using intelligence to paint the Soviet Union in the worst possible light.

Gates responded by sharing some inside Washington lore, saying he believed Shultz's view was shaped largely by his strained relationship with Gates' boss, then-CIA Director William Casey, who opposed efforts by Shultz to reach out to the Soviets and once tried to get Shultz fired.

"It was an open secret in Washington that the two didn't get along," Gates said, adding that his relations with Shultz on a day-to-day basis were more cordial.

Gates sought to portray himself as a practical moderate, open to proposals for withdrawals as well as increases in the size of the Army and Marines — his views on troop levels, he said, were "too unformed to be helpful."

On other issues in the Middle East, he warned that military attacks against Syria and Iran could hinder U.S. efforts in Iraq and harm U.S. standing in the region. He also noted that Iraq's downward spiral into further instability could lead to a regional conflagration.

"My greatest worry if we mishandle the next year or two and leave Iraq in chaos is that a number of regional powers will become involved in Iraq," Gates said, noting that Sunni-dominated countries such as Saudi Arabia could move to back Sunni Iraqis, Iran could become even more active among Iraqi Shiites, and Turkey could become involved in the Kurdish north. "All of that could spread very dramatically."

DOJ_NMG_0102934

Gates said that along with finding a path forward in Iraq, the reason he agreed to accept Bush's nomination was to find a bipartisan consensus on the global war on terrorism that would mirror the post-World War II consensus in dealing with the Soviet Union.

He argued that a baseline agreement on underlying principles would allow for ongoing debate on tactics, but would give potential adversaries certainty that the U.S. would continue to pursue a common goal.

Gates Says U.S. Isn't Winning Iraq War (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates yesterday said the U.S. is not winning in Iraq, but he declined to endorse any one of scores of new options floating in Washington for ending the stalemate and the American troop commitment.

Mr. Gates' Iraq assessment before the Senate Armed Services Committee, which later gave its unanimous approval to his nomination, came in response to a question from Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, who asked, "Do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?"

"No, sir," answered the man who is likely to become the president's chief military adviser on overhauling Iraq strategy. Mr. Gates later testified that he agreed with Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, who has said the U.S. is neither winning nor losing at this point.

The response seemed to put the nominee at odds with the commander in chief.

President Bush declared: "Absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq during an October press conference. He added, however, that he was not satisfied with overall developments, including a big spike in sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Mr. Gates said of the president, "I also believe that he understands that there needs to be a change in our approach in Iraq, that what we are doing now is not working satisfactorily."

The committee later, as expected, voted unanimously to approve the Gates nomination. The full Senate will take up the matter this week.

The question dominating Washington, as the White House weighs a shift in Iraq strategy, is whether to increase, decrease or rearrange the 135,000 troops on the ground. Mr. Gates said he does not know enough today to make a recommendation to Mr. Bush.

If confirmed, he said, he plans to first travel to Iraq to meet commanders and receive their assessments. The timeline suggests that any comprehensive change in policy will not come for weeks.

Mr. Gates did signal that he does not favor an immediate pullout, as favored by Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat.

"There is a risk that others looking around the world would see that we don't have the patience and we don't have the will," Mr. Gates said. "So I think those are some of the concerns that we would face if we ended up leaving Iraq in chaos."

During the hearing's lunch break, Mr. Gates noted that press coverage was dominated by his not-winning comment.

"I want to make clear that that pertains to the situation in Iraq as a whole," he told Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican and committee chairman, in the afternoon session. "Our military forces win the battles that they fight. Our soldiers have done an incredible job in Iraq, and I'm not aware of a single battle that they have lost."

The former CIA director, in sober clipped testimony, made a dramatic overture to both Democrats and Republicans. Under questioning from Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat who supports the war, Mr. Gates implored Congress to agree on a bipartisan framework for winning in Iraq, and in the larger struggle against Islamist terrorism.

"I think that it is imperative in this long war on terrorism that we face, that could go on for a generation, that there be a bipartisan agreement," he said. "Then there would be consistency on the part of whoever is elected president in 2008 and beyond, so that we can carry on this struggle in a way that they don't think we're going to cut and run."

Mr. Gates clearly distanced himself from early Bush administration Iraq policy and the war planning presided over by outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"There clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country," he testified.

He also labeled as a mistake the decision by L. Paul Bremer, the first U.S. administrator in Iraq, to dissolve the Iraqi army. Mr. Gates said it left thousands of armed men without a means to support their families and pushed them toward the insurgency. Instead, the soldiers should have been sent home -- with pay, he said.

Mr. Gates said options from the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, are "not the last word" and will likely differ from ideas from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The Baker-Hamilton panel, whose report will be released today, is expected to recommend a gradual troop drawdown, but not a specific timetable.

"Frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Mr. Gates, 63. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches is pretty much out there, and the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

Democrats and Republicans both eye Mr. Gates as the fresh face in Mr. Bush's war Cabinet who will change Iraq strategy in the fourth year of fighting and more than 2,900 American military deaths. Some on both sides are so happy to have Mr. Rumsfeld leaving the Pentagon that Mr. Gates' confirmation by the full Senate is a certainty.

Although Mr. Rumsfeld was typically feisty at Armed Services hearings as Democrats hurled charges, Mr. Gates gave measured answers to generally polite questions.

Mr. Gates is the first defense secretary nominee to undergo confirmation in time of war since 1968. Then, the Senate confirmed Clark M. Clifford to succeed Robert McNamara, who quit after a Vietnam War policy break with President Lyndon B. Johnson.

"I don't owe anybody anything," Mr. Gates said in response to a question from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, on his independence. He said he did not give up the presidency of Texas A&M University "to come back to Washington to be a bump on a log, and not to say exactly what I think."

He confronted two starkly different views on the committee itself. Mr. Levin is pushing a date-certain U.S. pullout, brigade by brigade, beginning in March. On the other end of the debate, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, wants a substantial increase in troops in Iraq beyond the current 135,000.

Mr. Gates told Mr. McCain he is "very open" to increase the Army's end strength -- its congressionally authorized force. Critics say the Army, with a half-million active soldiers, is stressed to the breaking point. Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the Iraq region, told the committee last month that he does not want more troops, in order to let the Iraqis prove themselves.

The Baker-Hamilton 10-member bipartisan group is expected to call for direct talks with Syria and Iran, two bordering regimes that support the deadly insurgency in Iraq.

Mr. Gates said he would not recommend military action against Syria and came close to ruling it out against Iran.

He called war with Iran an "absolute last resort" to stop the Islamic republic's nuclear-weapons program, but agreed that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is "lying" when he says Tehran is not pursuing an atomic arsenal.

"I think that we have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable," he said.

Gates Says U.S. Is Not Winning In Iraq; Heads For Confirmation (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, December 6, 2006

Robert Gates, President Bush's nominee to become the next secretary of defense, yesterday admitted that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq.

Senate critics of the war saw the nominee's opinion, given in a response during his nomination hearing, as a sharp departure from the president's position in late October — that America was "absolutely" winning.

Asked by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, whether he thought the United States was winning in Iraq, Gates answered, "No, sir."

The committee yesterday endorsed the Gates nomination unanimously. The full Senate will likely vote on the nomination by the end of this week.

In the second part of his hearing, Gates refined his view, saying he agreed with a statement by Gen. Peter Pace of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who said, "We are not winning, but we are not losing." Gates said he did not want to give troops in Iraq the impression that he thought they were failing in their mission.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a prospective 2008 presidential candidate, asked the same question as Levin and used his time to express frustration that the U.S. military does not have enough troops in Iraq.

He has been pushing for more troops in Iraq, a view considered unpopular, as has his close ally, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

McCain is heeding the call of several military leaders who said at the onset of the war in Iraq that the U.S. needed more troops to stabilize the country after the invasion. Gates acknowledged that the United States should have sent more in 2003.

"At this particular point … when the suggestion is made, as the situation deteriorates and the status quo is not acceptable, that we reduce troops or, as General [John] Abizaid said, that he had sufficient number of troops, in your study when did we reach the point where we went from not having enough troops to having sufficient number of troops as the situation — boots on the ground — as the situation deteriorated?" McCain asked Gates at the hearing.

"That's a non sequitur that I have yet found to — I'm unable to intellectually embrace," the senator concluded.

DOJ_NMG_0102936

Levin has pushed for swift withdrawal of U.S. troops and is due to become the armed services panel chairman in January. McCain will be the ranking GOP member.

Gates cautioned that setting a timetable for withdrawal would tell extremists "how long they have to wait until we're gone."

But Levin said he would still press for a phased troop withdrawal.

Gates, a former CIA director, said there are no new ideas on Iraq, but "all options are on the table."

His nomination hearing came just a day before the congressionally created, bipartisan Iraq Study Group is due to release its policy recommendations.

Gates said these recommendations will not be the be-all, end-all and that he would be open to a wide range of ideas and proposals on Iraq, including an analysis conducted by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other reports commissioned by the White House.

Gates said that as soon as he is confirmed he would travel to Iraq to seek advice, including that of Gen. George Casey, commander of multi-national forces Iraq, and Abizaid, head of the Central Command. If confirmed, he said, he would immediately consult other military leaders and Congress.

America would be in Iraq a long time because the Iraqi military does not have any logistics or airpower of its own, he added.

He was open to new ideas, he said, but developments in Iraq would shape the future of the entire Middle East, possibly with dire consequences.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether the American and Iraqi people and the next president of the United States will face a slowly and steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region or will face the very real risk of a regional conflagration," he said.

His greatest "worry" was that if U.S. forces left the country "in chaos," regional powers including Iran and Syria would get involved "and we will have a regional conflict on our hands."

The likely 2008 presidential candidates praised Gates for his open-mindedness and candor, but pressed him to prove his independence from Vice President Dick Cheney.

Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) asked Gates what made him believe the president would heed his advice after shooting down advice from prominent figures in his administration, such as Secretary of State Colin Powell.

"Senator, because he asked me to take the job," Gates answered, adding that the situation has changed since other political appointees were asked to serve five years ago.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), another high-profile candidate for the presidency, was skeptical that President Bush would look at all alternatives.

"Based on your experience, do you believe that the president, the vice president and the existing secretary of defense are intelligent men?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am," he replied

Clinton: "Are they patriotic men?"

Gates: "Absolutely."

Clinton: "Do they care about our men and women in uniform?"

Gates: "Absolutely."

Clinton: "Do they believe that the decisions they have made for the last five years have been in America's best interest?"

Gates: "I have not had that discussion. I'm sure that they believe that they were in the country's best interest."

Gates told Clinton that the process of changing strategy and tactics in Iraq would proceed with "considerable urgency."

Levin opposed Gates's confirmation 15 years ago, in part because Gates had been accused of skewing intelligence reports while at the CIA. This time around he said that he wants to ensure that Gates is independent-minded.

Defense Nominee Gains Approval Of Senate Panel (NYT)

By David S. Cloud And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to be defense secretary, won unanimous approval from a Senate panel on Tuesday after testifying that the United States was not winning in Iraq and that American failure there could ignite "a regional conflagration" in the Middle East.

At one point, Mr. Gates said it was "too soon to tell" whether the American invasion of 2003 had been a wise decision. He added: "My greatest worry if we mishandle the next year or two and leave Iraq in chaos is that a variety of regional powers will become involved in Iraq, and we will have a regional conflict on our hands." [Excerpts, Page A20.]

DOJ_NMG_0102937

Mr. Gates is expected to win confirmation from the full Senate as early as Wednesday to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld. At the daylong hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Democrats and Republicans praised what they called Mr. Gates's refreshing candor.

Mr. Gates gave few firm signals on Tuesday about his own favored options for Iraq, but portrayed himself as a flexible realist, open to all options for adjusting American strategy. But he made clear that he had concerns about a rapid military withdrawal, and said the recommendations to be made public on Wednesday by the Iraq Study Group would be important but not "the last word."

"It's my impression that frankly there are no new ideas on Iraq," Mr. Gates said, pointing out that there are multiple other government reviews under way. "The question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a way forward?"

The group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to propose that American combat troops be pulled back from Iraq, but not necessarily withdrawn, by sometime in 2008.

In 2003, Mr. Gates supported the administration's decision to invade Iraq. In his testimony on Tuesday, however, he made clear that his operating style and approach would be in some respects different from those of Mr. Rumsfeld and his deputies, who have led the Defense Department for nearly six years. Mr. Gates expressed grave reservations about taking military action against Iran, an idea that the Bush administration has not ruled out in trying to halt its nuclear program.

"I think that military action against Iran would be an absolute last resort," Mr. Gates said. "I think that we have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable. And I think that the consequences of a conflict, a military conflict, with Iran could be quite dramatic. And therefore, I would counsel against military action, except as a last resort."

Mr. Gates said he also opposed any attack on Syria, which the Bush administration has criticized, along with Iran, for contributing to the instability in Iraq.

Mr. Gates's most direct statements about Iraq came during exchanges with Senators Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will take over as the panel's chairman, and John McCain of Arizona, who will become the top-ranking Republican.

"Do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" asked Mr. Levin, who has pushed for announcing a date to begin withdrawing American troops from Iraq. "No, sir," Mr. Gates replied, adding that he did not believe that the United States was losing, either.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, pointed out that Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had used language similar to Mr. Gates's at a policy forum in Washington on Monday.

As recently as October, Mr. Bush said that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq, though he also made clear he was dissatisfied with the pace of progress.

Mr. Warner, the chairman of the Senate committee, said the message from last month's elections was that "change is needed."

Mr. Gates said he agreed with Mr. Levin that it was "worth looking into" the idea of withdrawing troops to instill a "sense of urgency" in the Iraqi government to resolve sectarian strife. But he ruled out setting a date for a withdrawal.

Under questioning from Mr. McCain, Mr. Gates said there had not been sufficient troops in Iraq immediately after the 2003 invasion. If confirmed, he said, he would consult with ground commanders about whether they wanted additional forces.

Mr. Gates also appeared to differ slightly with Mr. Bush's frequent declaration that Iraq is the "central battlefield" in fighting terrorists. Asked if he agreed with that description, Mr. Gates called Iraq "one of the central fronts in the war on terror" but said the United States also faced a "dispersed" enemy of Islamic militants worldwide.

But he was more direct in criticizing the Bush administration's decision to disband the Iraqi Army and, for a time, to bar from government jobs tens of thousands of Iraqis who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

Several Democrats, while applauding Mr. Gates's forthrightness and willingness to consider new tactics, questioned whether Mr. Bush would follow his advice on a new strategy.

"Senator, I'm not coming here to be a bump on a log and not say exactly what I think," Mr. Gates told Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. He added: "There is still only one president of the United States. He will make the final decision."

Mr. Gates said he had abandoned certain positions he once held on certain national security issues. Asked about an article he wrote in 1994 advocating a military strike against North Korea's nuclear facilities, Mr. Gates said he had changed his mind about how to deal with the communist country's developing nuclear program. "I believe that clearly at this point, the best course is the diplomatic one," Mr. Gates said.

If confirmed, Mr. Gates said, he would make an early visit to Iraq to assess the situation. He visited Iraq in September as a member of the Iraq Study Group, a post he resigned after being nominated by Mr. Bush on Nov. 8 to take charge at the Pentagon. On Tuesday, Mr. Bush and Mr. Baker ate lunch together to talk about the recommendations the group would make, said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Mr. Gates did not say whether he intended to roll back any of Mr. Rumsfeld's initiatives, but there were indications that his tenure at the Pentagon would be vastly different from the nearly six-year term of Mr. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Rumsfeld arrived at the Pentagon brimming with ideas for a leaner, more agile military. He promised to challenge what he saw as the status quo thinking of the military services, and he brought in civilian aides who clashed repeatedly with senior uniformed officers.

Mr. Gates offered no such agenda or vision. He said the campaign to transform the military needed to continue, but admitted that he was not familiar with the details of Mr. Rumsfeld's efforts. He also questioned some of the Pentagon's efforts before the Iraq war to analyze raw intelligence.

Mr. Gates's presumably easy path to confirmation contrasts with his two previous nomination hearings before the Senate, both for the post of director of central intelligence. Mr. Gates withdrew his nomination the first time, in 1987, after questions arose about his role in the Iran-contra affair.

After being nominated again by Mr. Bush's father in 1991, Mr. Gates was confirmed, but 31 Democrats voted against him, including 12 senators who are still in office.

Mr. Levin, one of those who opposed him in 1991, said after Tuesday's vote, "I voted yes because in both the substance of his answers and the tone of his answers, he seemed open to course correction."

As the day wore on and his confirmation appeared increasingly secure, Mr. Gates seemed to absorb the weight of the job. He asked to expound on his morning remark about not winning in Iraq, saying he did not want the troops to believe they were being unsuccessful.

"Our military wins the battles that we fight," Mr. Gates said. He added that "where we're having our challenges, frankly, are in the areas of stabilization and political developments," and that he believed that other federal agencies should contribute more assistance in Iraq.

Dinner for Secretary General

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The White House under Mr. Bush and the United Nations under Kofi Annan have not exactly gone together like Mom and apple pie. But the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, predicted that all would be amicable when Mr. Bush, Mr. Annan and their top aides met for a final time Tuesday over dinner in the White House residence, where Mr. Bush was to toast Mr. Annan on the completion later this month of his tenure as the United Nations secretary general.

It was unclear, however, whether the White House had a table long enough or wide enough to separate John Bolton, who has resigned as United Nations ambassador, and Mr. Annan's top deputy, Mark Malloch Brown, who was visibly pleased on Monday at the news of Mr. Bolton's departure.

Mr. Snow said he was not worried. "We practice effective diplomacy," he said. "I expect it will be perfectly pleasant." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Gates' Main Appeal: He's Not Rumsfeld (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Once one of the most controversial men in Washington, Robert M. Gates stepped into what passes in the nation's capital for a congressional love-fest Tuesday for the simple reason that he was not Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The last time around, when Gates was nominated to head the CIA in 1991, the hearings stretched over months — with the nominee facing hundreds of tough, personal questions. This time, Gates, nominated to become secretary of Defense, was questioned publicly for less than a day. Few, if any, of the questions could be considered difficult.

The soft-spoken Gates, it seemed, could do no wrong, eliciting praise from Republicans and Democrats for his "candor" and "forthrightness."

In addition to not being Rumsfeld, Gates had the decided advantage of not having yet made up his mind on U.S. strategy in Iraq. And so, as various senators laid out their competing plans for the future of Iraq — more trainers, more troops, fewer troops, hard deadlines — Gates could answer that every option was on the table.

Gates told Sen. John McCain (R.-Ariz.), who favors increasing forces, that if confirmed he would inquire as to whether the military commanders wanted more American forces, and said he would consider increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

Gates told Sen. Carl M. Levin (D.-Mich.), who favors withdrawing U.S. troops as a way to force Iraqis to take more responsibility, that such an option also would be considered.

Even on the question of winning and losing, Gates was able to have it both ways.

When Levin, now a war skeptic, asked whether the U.S. was winning in Iraq, Gates answered "no." But when Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) asked whether the nominee agreed that the United States was not losing, Gates was able to say: "Yes, sir. At this point."

Gates gave few hints of precisely where he was inclined to try to steer U.S. policy. But he did say the new strategy probably would be a mix of the ideas for strategic changes that are being discussed.

"It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," Gates said. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches is pretty much out there, and the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

It may appear unlikely that Gates can craft a policy that combines both Levin's call for a scheduled draw-down with McCain's demand that the military send in more troops for a last attempt to win the war.

But Gates could well intend to try. He told Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), a war supporter, that he agreed to take the Defense Department job because he saw the need to help create a basic foreign policy that both Republicans and Democrats agreed with — akin to the broad accord that prevailed during the Cold War.

"I think that it is imperative in this long war on terrorism that we face, that could go on for a generation, that there be a bipartisan agreement," Gates said.

To that sentiment, Gates added exactly what the committee members wanted to hear: a promise that he would work with them to craft the policy.

Inclusion is not something Rumsfeld was keen on offering the Senate. And throughout the day, it seemed as if Gates was working hard to come off as the anti-Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld, both with Congress and the media, had a habit of restating questions to make them more to his liking before embarking on long answers. Gates appears to favor the more straightforward "yes" and "no."

While Rumsfeld would offer up a belittling "goodness gracious" or a strategic pause when presented a supposition with which he disagreed, Gates was taking all comers seriously Tuesday.

After Gates suggested the U.S. would capture Osama bin Laden when someone close to the Al Qaeda leader turned him in to collect the reward, Sen. Ben Nelson (D.-Neb.) asked for Gates' opinion on a plan to increase the bounty by $1 million a week.

"Sort of 'Terrorist Powerball,' " Gates quipped.

But a moment later, intent on including all suggestions, Gates added: "I'm certainly open to that, senator."

Defense Nominee Candid On Iraq Views (MCT)

By Matt Stearns

McClatchy Newspapers, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States is not winning the war in Iraq and “all options are on the table,” defense secretary nominee Robert Gates said at his confirmation hearing Tuesday.

Gates, 63, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he was “open to a wide range of ideas and proposals” regarding the American presence in Iraq, but he made clear he felt a precipitous withdrawal would not be the best solution.

“My greatest worry is if we mishandle the next few years … and leave Iraq in chaos, we’ll have a regional conflict … that would spread fairly dramatically” and involve Syria, Iran, Turkey and Saudi Arabia, Gates said. “There is the risk that others would see we don’t have the patience and we don’t have the will.”

Gates also noted that one of the reasons President Bush nominated him was to get a fresh approach on Iraq. But while he pledged to be a strong, independent voice within the Bush administration, Gates said there was ultimately one authority: Bush.

“Of course, it is the president who will decide what if any changes will be made in our approach,” he told the Senate panel.

Later, Gates said: “There is only one president of the United States, and he will make the final decision.”

If confirmed, Gates would lead the Defense Department at a time of nearly unprecedented challenges: a difficult war in Iraq, a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, nuclear threats in North Korea and Iran, military readiness as dangerously low levels, and a procurement system under fire.

But it was Iraq that dominated the hearing.

“This is our last chance to save this situation,” Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain told Gates, a conclusion Gates did not challenge.

Gates received a warm, if stern, welcome during the first part of the hearing from both Republicans and Democrats, all of whom urged regular, substantive contact between Congress and the Pentagon.

Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner of Virginia told Gates he “simply had to be fearless” in delivering his advice; ranking Democrat Carl Levin of Michigan urged Gates to “speak truth to power.”

DOJ_NMG_0102940

But even Levin, who voted against Gates when was nominated as CIA director in 1991, said he would take a “fresh and fair look” at Gates this time around.

Gates promised not to let them down.

“I will speak candidly, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue,” Gates said. “I don’t owe anybody anything.”

Senate Panel Approves Gates (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Robert M. Gates was unanimously approved by a Senate committee yesterday to become President Bush's new defense secretary, after a day-long confirmation hearing in which he bluntly stated that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq.

Gates also told the panel that "it's too soon to tell" whether the Bush administration made the right decision in launching the invasion in March 2003 to topple Saddam Hussein.

In confirmation hearings that left both Democrats and Republicans praising his candor, Gates warned that the war risks provoking a "regional conflagration" in the Middle East unless a new strategy can arrest Iraq's slide toward chaos.

"My greatest worry, if we mishandle the next year or two and if we leave Iraq in chaos, is that . . . we will have a regional conflict on our hands," he said. "You could have Saudi Arabia, you could have Turkey, Syria, Iran -- all would be involved. We're already seeing Hezbollah involved in training fighters for Iraq. I think all of that could spread fairly dramatically."

Gates's cordial reception by the Senate Armed Services Committee signals he will almost certainly be confirmed as the nation's 22nd defense secretary. He would replace Donald H. Rumsfeld, who announced his resignation a day after the Nov. 7 elections, in which Democrats regained control of Congress. Gates's view that the United States is not winning the war stood in sharp contrast to Bush's own statement on Oct. 25, when he declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

"What we heard this morning was a welcome breath of honest, candid realism about the situation in Iraq," Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) said during a midday break. Levin, who will become committee chairman next month, said this "bodes well . . . for a speedy confirmation."

At the end of the session, Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) said, "I think you're going to be a good secretary."

In return, Gates emphasized "the importance of the bipartisan approach" and laid out several ways in which he would operate differently than Rumsfeld. "I think the first step is the tone at the top," he said.

Gates promised to treat the top brass respectfully, a subject that became an issue earlier this year after several retired generals called for Rumsfeld to be fired, in part because they felt he ignored their professional advice.

Gates said a "great deference" should be shown to the judgment of generals once a policy is decided that they have to implement, and he emphasized that one of his first steps as secretary would be to "urgently" consult with U.S. ground commanders in Iraq. "When you treat the professionals in an organization who deliver the mission . . . with respect and you listen to them . . . I think that everybody is better served," he said.

Gates, who was CIA director from November 1991 to January 1993, was also critical of a Pentagon office that had independently examined intelligence on Iraq during the run-up to the war, second-guessing the CIA and other agencies. "I have a problem with that," he said.

Against fairly light probing by senators, Gates defended his record over past allegations that as CIA deputy in the 1980s he had skewed intelligence reports to fit his views. He said such charges grew largely out of personal animosity between then-Secretary of State George P. Shultz and then-CIA chief William J. Casey.

Several senators, listing the immense challenges Gates would face as defense secretary, urged him to be bold in expressing independent views. "You simply have to be fearless -- I repeat, fearless" in counseling the president on Iraq and other critical Pentagon matters, advised the committee chairman, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.).

Gates responded later that he has no intention of coming to Washington "to be a bump on a log and not to say exactly what I think, and to speak candidly and, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue." He also emphasized that he did not seek the job of defense secretary, saying, "I don't owe anybody anything."

Gates, 63, made it clear that if confirmed, Iraq will be his highest priority. "I am under no illusion why I am sitting before you today: the war in Iraq," the white-haired Wichita native told a packed committee hearing room. Gates said the president nominated him to bring "fresh eyes" to the problem, stating repeatedly that "all options are on the table" on Iraq strategy.

As a member of the Iraq Study Group, the commission led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), Gates studied those options for several months, until leaving the group when he was nominated for the Pentagon slot.

Currently president of Texas A&M University, Gates said he has known some of the 12 university students who have been killed in Iraq. "This all comes down to being very personal for all of us," he said, reciting the exact count of the 2,889 U.S. troops who had died in Iraq as of Monday.

Even so, U.S. forces will be in Iraq for "a long time," Gates predicted, although he said the number of troops could be "dramatically smaller" than the current 140,000. Pressed by Democrats, he said beginning modest troop withdrawals -- a suggestion included in a recently leaked Nov. 6 memo to the White House by Rumsfeld -- is one possibility.

Questioned by Republicans, however, Gates suggested a specific withdrawal timetable would be detrimental because it would tell U.S. enemies in Iraq "how long they have to wait until we're gone."

He also allowed for the possibility of a surge of U.S. ground forces into Iraq.

"That certainly is an option," he said, saying that such an increase could involve dispatching more military training teams to work with Iraqi security forces. "If our focus is on training and bringing up the Iraqi army, do we have enough trainers to do that job in Iraq?"

Gates declined to call the Iraq situation a civil war and agreed with senators that he did not want to see U.S. troops caught in a crossfire between Iraqi factions. Nor was he willing to predict whether beginning to withdraw troops would exacerbate sectarian violence, as the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, testified last month.

Several times during the hearing, senators mentioned an assessment offered Monday at a think tank by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that the United States is neither winning nor losing in Iraq. (Pace had spoken on an off-the-record basis, but the senators quoted him by name.) Gates said he agrees with Pace's view.

While the hearing concentrated on Iraq, Gates appeared to depart from administration rhetoric by saying Iraq is just one central front in the anti-terrorism effort. Moreover, he said that over the past five years, Osama bin Laden has posed a greater threat to the United States than has Saddam Hussein.

Gates said the U.S. overthrow of the Taliban government in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001 led to a "metastasized terror threat from the jihadists" around the world. "Indigenous radicals in countries like Britain, like Spain and like the United States are in fact planning terrorist operations," he said, adopting a tone reflective of his past as a career intelligence expert.

But he sighed audibly when Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) asked how he plans to catch bin Laden. "The way we'll catch bin Laden eventually," Gates said, is "one of his own people will turn him in."

On Iran, Gates said he thinks Tehran is pursuing nuclear weapons but is lying about it, and he cited threats the country poses to the region, including the potential to shut down vital oil lanes and install a like-minded regime in Baghdad. Still, he said that U.S. "military action against Iran would be an absolute last resort" and that diplomacy is his preferred course.

Senators So Very, Very Not Contrary Toward Gates (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

And so it came to pass, in the 12th month of the sixth year of the reign of Bush, that a prophet came forth to deliver us from the war in Babylon.

Actually, it was only Bob Gates at his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, but the rapturous senators seemed to regard the president's second defense secretary as a harbinger of the Second Coming.

"We're very pleased," Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) said twice.

"Very, very pleased," added soon-to-be-chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.).

"We're very grateful," proffered John McCain (R-Ariz.).

"Very proud," contributed Pat Roberts (R-Kan.). "Very enthusiastic . . . and very happy."

Gates earned these very, very nice words because of one very important attribute: He is not Donald Rumsfeld. He gave no wiseacre answers, asked himself no questions and said nothing to disparage the "Army you have." Instead, he made the obvious statement that the Bush administration, until yesterday, had refused to utter: We are not winning in Iraq. Where Rummy was incurably aloof -- he originally used an automatic signature machine to sign letters to the kin of dead troops -- Gates sounded human.

"The pressures of the hearing are nothing compared to the pressures I got from a woman who came over to me at the hotel while I was having dinner the other night, seated by myself," the nominee said. "She congratulated me on my nomination and she said, 'I have two sons in Iraq. For God's sake, bring them home safe.' "

The room went quiet as Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.), who had been questioning Gates, smiled and nodded in agreement. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) joined the nodding, and the smiles spread down both sides of the dais as Gates vowed independence. "I can assure you that I don't owe anybody anything," the nominee promised.

Gates, who won the committee's unanimous support by day's end, was confident enough about his prospects that he told the senators his wife had skipped the hearing to accompany "the Texas A&M women's basketball team to an away game in Seattle."

The senators, too, exhibited few signs of tension: Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) read a news clipping about himself headlined "Nelson Defeats Harris," then perused a housing report. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) worked his way through a box of candy and a large cup of coffee. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) and John Thune (R-S.D.) thumbed their BlackBerrys. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) rehearsed her questions, written in large type on numbered index cards. An evidently distracted Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) spoke of communing with fallen troops. "I talk to those who've lost their lives, and they have that sense of duty and mission," he reported.

Even the war protesters lacked enthusiasm: Only six dissenters answered organizers' call to picket in front of the Hart Office Building before the hearing. In this environment, Gates felt comfortable enough to lighten things up a bit. When Ben Nelson proposed continually increasing the bounty for Osama bin Laden, Gates noted: "A sort of Terrorist Powerball."

Gates made no promise to end the war in Iraq or to bring home the troops. But he endeared himself to the candor-starved senators at the start with just two words. "Mr. Gates, do you believe that we are currently winning in Iraq?" Levin asked.

"No, sir," Gates replied. In fact, he worried about "the very real risk and possible reality of a regional conflagration."

Seven times, Gates assured the senators that all options are "on the table" -- even a "dramatically smaller" number of troops in Iraq. Nine times, Gates and his questioners agreed on the need for "fresh eyes" or a "fresh look" or a "fresh approach" -- a development Levin, Bill Nelson and Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) declared "refreshing."

But if Gates was offering fresh eyes (his reading glasses rested on the witness table), he could not promise a fresh face. The veteran of the George H.W. Bush administration was ushered into the room by a literal old guard: former senators Bob Dole and David Boren.

The current senators, having embraced Gates as the ticket out of Iraq, encouraged him to say something bad about Bush policies. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.) got Gates to criticize the administration's disbanding of the Iraqi army and de-Baathification of the government. McCain got him to say that "there clearly were insufficient troops." Byrd got him to say that it would be folly to attack Iran or Syria. Warner got him to say that Bush "understands that there needs to be a change in our approach in Iraq." Lindsey Graham (R-S.C) got him to say that Iraq wasn't necessarily the "central front" in the fight against terrorism. Levin got him to criticize the Pentagon's handling of intelligence.

But it was Kennedy, the old liberal, who elicited an emotional response when he noted that 59 Americans had been killed in Iraq since Gates was nominated.

Gates, unlike some predecessors at the Pentagon, knew the war's total tally: 2,889 dead as of Monday morning. "Twelve graduates of Texas A&M have been killed in Iraq," said the nominee, who is A&M's president. "I would run in the morning with some of those kids. . . . I'd hand them their degrees, I'd attend their commissioning, and then I would get word of their death. So this all comes down to being very personal for all of us."

Very well said.

A Fresh Old Hand (WP)

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

ROB ERT M. GATES, asked by President Bush to provide "fresh eyes" at the Defense Department, began yesterday by offering the Senate Armed Services Committee a refreshingly candid voice. Asked near the beginning of his confirmation hearing if the United States was winning the war in Iraq, he responded with two words: "No, sir." He later spelled out some of the mistakes that explain that failure -- including the deployment of too few troops -- with a frankness rarely heard from a Bush administration Cabinet member. Where outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld commonly batted down or evaded legitimate congressional questions, Mr. Gates was responsive to the most tendentious queries, calmly explaining to Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) why he would not favor a U.S. invasion of Syria. He said one of his two principal goals was to help forge a truly bipartisan policy for the war on terrorism; his performance yesterday was a good start.

Mr. Gates's first challenge, as he acknowledged, is Iraq, and there he no more possesses a simple solution than does the Iraq Study Group, which is due to report today. The Defense nominee said he would be open to all options, but he made clear that he does not favor a quick or unconditional withdrawal of American forces or the abandonment of efforts to shore up the elected Iraqi government and its army. He warned that such an abandonment could lead to "a regional conflagration" that would deeply damage U.S. interests in the region. "Frankly," he said, "there are no new ideas on Iraq. The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches, is pretty much out there. And the question is: Is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

We share Mr. Gates's view that a consensus can be reached on a new course for Iraq, one that would involve a mix of the pieces that he and senators from both parties returned to yesterday: more training for Iraqi forces and a handoff of combat duties that would allow for a reduction of U.S. troops; pressure on Iraqis to reach a political settlement; more aggressive regional diplomacy. A couple of Democratic senators questioned whether President Bush accepted Mr. Gates's view that the status quo is unacceptable. The veteran Washington operative responded forcefully: "I am not . . . [coming] back to Washington to be a bump on a log and not to say exactly what I think, and to speak candidly and, frankly, boldly to people at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue about . . . what I think needs to be done."

We hope Iraq will not be the only subject for such candor. Mr. Rumsfeld also leaves behind the pressing question of whether the Army and Marine Corps are too small to handle the press of engagements around the world -- as we believe they are. Also, how can the department manage a procurement budget intended to "transform" the military for 21st-century battles and also pay for big conventional weapons systems conceived during the Cold War? Was the enormous expansion of Defense Department intelligence operations since 2001 a necessary shift or a wasteful byproduct of Mr. Rumsfeld's bureaucratic infighting? Mr. Gates promised to investigate all these matters; we hope his answers will be as sure and unvarnished as those he offered yesterday.

The Un-Rumsfeld (NYT)

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

The nearly universal (and bipartisan) relief at the departure of Donald Rumsfeld ensured that Robert Gates would have an easy confirmation hearing. And Mr. Gates played the role of the un-Rumsfeld masterfully yesterday. He offered just enough candor and conciliation to persuade most senators that he plans to be a very different sort of defense secretary, while deftly holding back any real information about how he plans to clean up President Bush's mess in Iraq.

Mr. Gates's truth-telling did not go much further than acknowledging what is obvious to everyone but this White House. He agreed with various senators that the United States is not winning in Iraq, that politicians in Baghdad need to be pressured into negotiating a political settlement, and that the Pentagon botched the post-invasion by failing to send enough troops and committing other now infamous errors.

He was less accommodating when asked to share his prescriptions for Iraq, saying only that he was open to all ideas. Given both President Bush's and Mr. Rumsfeld's unrelenting denials of Iraq's disastrous reality — and their refusal to accept the advice of others — even statements of the obvious and a pledge to keep an open mind sound good. But Iraq is unraveling so fast that Mr. Gates will have to come up with opinions quickly, and be willing to express them to the president forcefully.

Mr. Bush has certainly shown little sign of opening his mind. Since announcing Mr. Gates's nomination, he has sought to pre-empt the much-anticipated advice of James Baker's Iraq Study Group (on which Mr. Gates served), brushing off suggestions that he talk directly to Iran and insisting that there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq.

Still, Mr. Gates seems at least game to try to break through the wall. He said that Iraq was only "one of the central fronts" in the war on terror — a departure from the official litany. He said that he did not believe that the president had been given authority — either under the 9/11 war resolution or the Iraq war resolution — to attack Iran or Syria (and would counsel against it). And he said bringing both countries into negotiations about Iraq's future at least "merits thinking about."

In any other time that would all be considered pretty bland stuff. But for an aspiring member of this administration, that came close to speaking truth to power.

A More Honest Assessment Of Iraq Draws Cheers (USAT)

USA Today, December 6, 2006

After almost four years of prickly denials from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld that anything was wrong with the Pentagon's plan in Iraq, it was refreshing Tuesday to hear his successor acknowledge that things are not going so well. During a Senate confirmation hearing, Robert Gates conceded that U.S. forces aren't winning and that new approaches need to be considered.

This is obvious to nearly everyone now, but it nevertheless was so sharp a departure from Bush administration dogma that it won over some of Gates' strongest detractors.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who advocates withdrawing U.S. troops and who becomes chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take over Congress next month, gushed that Gates' testimony was a "welcome breath of honest, candid realism." This from one of 31 senators who voted against Gates' confirmation as CIA director in 1991. The committee voted 21-0 on Tuesday for confirmation, and the full Senate is certain to follow.

So two cautionary notes:

One is that Gates' fans should hope he's no longer the man his critics said he was during his painful CIA confirmation hearings 15 years ago. Then, Gates was portrayed as an arrogant bully who distorted intelligence findings to fit administration policy, refused to listen to dissenting opinions, and was never entirely forthcoming about his role in the Iran-contra scandal — precisely the sort of arrogance and bad judgment that got Rumsfeld in trouble and chained the nation to a failed policy in Iraq. Gates' friends say he has evolved since that confirmation experience, and he went on to win generally favorable reviews for his tenure as CIA director. But wartime Defense secretaries face far more pressure and far more scrutiny.

The other worry is that no matter how adroit Gates is, no matter how clear-eyed about the magnitude of the mess he faces, the outlook is bleak. As Defense secretary, Gates will be playing a weak hand for a politically damaged administration with few friends in Washington or around the world. He will get lots of advice, starting with today's much-anticipated recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, but what happens next is as much about the public's willingness to support any new plan as it is about the Pentagon's ability to execute it.

For now, Gates' chief strength — and it's significant — is that he's not the man he'll replace. Given Rumsfeld's radioactivity in Washington and around the world, that should give Gates a useful honeymoon.

The signs are that he realizes he's walking on the edge of an abyss. At the very end of the morning session Tuesday, a time when many onlookers have left and participants are mostly thinking about lunch, Gates mused about possible outcomes in Iraq. He sketched a scenario in which U.S. forces remain bogged down and unable to win, and another in which they slowly manage to right the situation and impose order.

"Seems to me," he said, "it could go either way." That's the right place to start.

Goodness Gracious! The Truth! (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

First Junior took over the house with grandiose plans to remodel it and make it the envy of the neighborhood. But then he played with matches and set the house on fire. So now he's frantically trying to stop the flames from torching the whole block.

The Bush administration has gone from a breathless plan to change the Middle East to a breathless plan to preserve it, from democracy promotion to conflagration avoidance.

That was the cold shower offered yesterday by Robert Gates, the former C.I.A. chief, on his way to being unanimously endorsed as the new defense secretary by a Senate panel craving a cold shower.

He told the Armed Services Committee, peppered with wannabe future presidents, that the American occupation could lead to a Baghdad as hostile as Tehran, and set off "a regional conflagration" if Iraq is not deftly handled in the next couple of years.

Mr. Gates asserted that if America left Iraq in chaos, Iran and Syria could encroach more, and Turkey and Saudi Arabia might jump in to stop the ethnic cleansing of Sunnis by Shiites. "We're already seeing Hezbollah involved in training fighters for Iraq," he said. "I think all of that could spread fairly dramatically."

It was the sort of realistic assessment that never came from Rummy, except when he privately admitted in a classified Nov. 6 memo that their Iraq strategy was "not working well enough or fast enough," offering a silly hodgepodge of wildly tardy or dubious options, like telling the Iraqis to "pull up their socks."

It was chilling to see in print that the man who spent nearly four years overseeing the war did not have any idea what to do in Iraq; his basic plan was not so much to fix the problem as to lower expectations. The memo, reported by Michael Gordon in The Times on Sunday, offered the following lame-brained prescriptions to manage perception:

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' " And this: "Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist."

So with the Pentagon deciding whether to Go Big, Go Long or Go Home, Rummy urged the White House to Go Minimalist and simply streamline the spin.

Junior took the advice to manage perceptions by minimizing Rummy two days after he sent the memo. The walls had closed in on W.; he could no longer minimize the war, which was escalating, or the perception that it was not going well, which had spread into Republican ranks. Even Gen. Peter Pace, yes man that he is, acknowledged on Monday that "We're not winning but we're not losing."

The old criticisms of whether Mr. Gates massaged intelligence were forgotten; the senators would have embraced an ax-murderer if he had seemed sensible about Iraq.

There was no blathering yesterday about "known unknowns" or "Henny Penny" pessimists. The soft-spoken, vanilla Mr. Gates offered a sharp contrast from the finger-wagging, flavorful Rummy. In a remarkable shift from the mindless bellicosity and jingoism of the last few years, Mr. Gates said he did not favor military action against Iran or Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0102945

Even though he was a member of the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Gates conceded that there would be no silver bullet. "It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," he said. Asked by Robert Byrd who was responsible for 9/11, Saddam or Osama, Mr. Gates did not try to fudge. "Osama bin Laden, Senator," he replied. Asked who has represented a greater threat to the U.S., he repeated "Osama bin Laden."

W. insisted to Fox News's Brit Hume on Monday that his "objective hadn't changed" and that "we're going to succeed in Iraq." Asked by Carl Levin if America was winning in Iraq, Mr. Gates answered, "No, sir."

After lunch the nominee clarified his remarks, saying he had not meant to criticize the troops, that the reversals in Iraq were not their fault. They don't lose battles in Iraq because there are no battles. There's just a counterinsurgency that they can't see and that they weren't prepared or equipped to fight.

Gates's friends from the old Bush 41 gang have been watching closely to see if 43 brought the old Washington hand back for "cosmetic reasons," as one put it, simply to try to change the perception that W. has been stubborn and deaf on Iraq. Or whether 43 really will give his new defense chief the parameters he needs to make real changes in strategy. Will he let him Go Maximalist? <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — When Robert M. Gates faced Senate confirmation to be director of central intelligence in 1991, the hearings stretched over four months and featured hundreds of witnesses, thousands of documents and the nominee responding to 1,000 questions in written and oral form over four long days of testimony.

On Tuesday, Mr. Gates was welcomed back by the Senate as "a refreshing breath of reality," applauded by people on both sides of the aisle for his candor and forthrightness, his pledges of bipartisanship and dialogue. And the committee rewarded him with unanimous confirmation in less than eight hours.

This time, of course, he was appearing as the anti-Rumsfeld, and as a symbol to the incoming Democratic majority in particular of fresh thinking on Iraq. No one on either side spent much time defending the departing defense secretary on style or substance.

If the comparison was not obvious enough, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, made it so in her questioning late in the morning. "Thank you for your candor — that's something that has been sorely lacking from the current occupant in the position that you seek to hold," Mrs. Clinton said. "We need a strong secretary of defense, but that doesn't mean strong-headed."

In contrast to Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sometimes had to be coaxed to his appearances before the committee and then rarely ceded an inch, Mr. Gates declared that the United States was not winning in Iraq and that mistakes had been made all around.

The Democrats seized the opportunity to relish their victory in the midterm elections, which provided the final push out the door for Mr. Rumsfeld, and to hammer home their campaign themes.

Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, displaying his feistiness at age 89, asked Mr. Gates who he believed was responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks, Saddam Hussein or Osama bin Laden. "Osama bin Laden, sir," Mr. Gates replied quietly.

Who has represented the greater threat to the United States? Mr. Byrd pushed. "Osama bin Laden."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, who was sitting next to Mr. Byrd, raised an eyebrow and smiled.

Republicans for the most part were content to sit back and lob softballs suited more to a first job interview or college application. "You've been in tough situations before," said Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama. "Do you feel that that experience can help you think through with some new perspective on these issues?"

With the White House and Congress awaiting the release of the Iraq Study Group's conclusions on Wednesday, Democrats sought to remind President Bush, through Mr. Gates, that Congress intends to have a say in the conduct of the war. Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the pocket-kerchiefed Senate parliamentarian, backed them up from across the aisle, opening with a statement that pointedly reminded the president that he had "a moral obligation" to listen to both parties and to work with the legislative branch.

Mr. Warner, the departing Republican chairman of the committee, reminded Mr. Gates of his own reflections in his book, that the White House works best when it works in concert with Congress. And Mr. Warner urged him not to hold back in offering his personal recommendations to the president. "You simply must be fearless," Mr. Warner said. "I repeat, fearless."

DOJ_NMG_0102946

The seats behind the nominee, normally filled with family, White House escorts and other defenders, were left largely empty behind Mr. Gates, who sat alone at the table. (His wife of 40 years, Mr. Gates said, had asked to be excused to travel with the Texas A&M women's basketball team to a game in Seattle.)

But Mr. Gates did not need much protection, except perhaps from the 40-odd photographers tripping over themselves to capture his every hand gesture.

He displayed a knack for flattering the committee. "Secretaries come and go, but the Senate Armed Services Committee remains," he said. "If confirmed, I will seek your counsel and take it seriously."

"We all work for the same boss," he added. If it was not clear that he did not mean the president, he added, "That boss is the people of the United States."

Mr. Gates paid moving tribute to the nearly 3,000 American service members killed in Iraq, including 12 graduates of Texas A&M, where he has been president for four years. He spoke of the woman who came up to him as he dined alone in a Washington restaurant and told him: "I have two sons in Iraq. For God's sake, bring them home safe."

"So this all comes down to being very personal for all of us," Mr. Gates said.

It was a day of compliments and warm chuckles; when Senator Ben Nelson, Democrat of Nebraska, suggested increasing the bounty for capturing Mr. bin Laden by a million dollars a week, Mr. Gates offered, "Sort of terrorist Powerball?"

Introducing Mr. Gates, former Senator Bob Dole made the obligatory joke about how he realized too late that Mr. Gates's handlers wanted the other Senator Dole — his wife, Elizabeth, beaming in a red suit and matching lipstick from her seat alongside the other committee members — to do the honors.

Mr. Dole then reminded the committee of the seriousness of the task at hand; the last time a secretary of defense was changed in wartime, he said, was in 1968 when President Lyndon B. Johnson nominated Clark Clifford to succeed Robert S. McNamara. "Make no mistake about it," Mr. Dole said, "history is being made here today."

The most aggressive questioning came from those committee members eyeing the presidency: Mrs. Clinton and Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who continued to press his case for more troops in Iraq. It was a "non sequitur," he insisted, to say that there were not enough troops going in, but also that current troop levels are sufficient despite the deteriorating situation.

But even he seemed to recognize that he would not win his point, concluding, "I hope you will help us gain consensus."

Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, another possible Democratic contender, asked Mr. Gates how he could be confident the president would heed his counsel. "Senator, because he asked me to take the job," Mr. Gates replied. Mr. Bayh waited for a more elaborate answer, and, realizing one was not coming, said simply, "He asked the others to take the jobs as well."

Gates Wins Senate Committee Approval, 21-0 (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee for secretary of Defense told a Congressional committee Tuesday that he agreed to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld so he could help shape a new course in Iraq, not "to be a bump on a log." Robert Gates said he expected President Bush to listen to his advice even when he disagreed.

"I think that the president was very direct in saying, both privately to me and then publicly, that he saw the need for fresh eyes on the problem," Gates said during his Senate Armed Services Committee confirmation hearing.

Committee Democrats said they were encouraged by Gates' statements that were seemingly at odds with the White House. For example, Gates said the United States was neither winning nor losing in Iraq, adding that he wasn't criticizing U.S. troops. They, Gates said, were doing well and had not lost on the battlefield.

U.S. forces will be in Iraq for a long time, Gates warned, and failing to secure the country could cause a "regional conflagration" involving Iran, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and other Middle Eastern nations.

Gates said the United States needs to communicate with Iran and Syria, although Bush has rejected direct talks with those two neighbors of Iraq.

"A channel for communications is not necessarily a vehicle for negotiations," Gates said, adding he doubted the U.S. could gain much in negotiations with Iran.

After the U.S. invasion toppled Saddam Hussein's regime in April 2003, the United States should not have disbanded the Iraqi military or purged the government of Saddam's Baath Party, Gates said.

In another diversion from current administration policy, Gates criticized Rumsfeld's creation of a small group at the Pentagon to mine intelligence reports for signs that Saddam was threat.

DOJ_NMG_0102947

"The one thing that I don't like is offline intelligence organizations, or analytical groups," said Gates, who worked at the CIA for more than two decades before becoming its director from 1991 to 1993. Instead, Gates said, he prefers depending on professional intelligence analysts and preserving their independence.

Gates said his first move as Defense secretary would be visiting U.S. commanders in Iraq and Afghanistan to seek their recommendations, which he will give "great weight."

The panel liked what it heard. Gates won unanimous committee approval that set up a final Senate vote that could come as early as today. The 21-0 vote Tuesday evening came after a day of public and private questioning of the former CIA director. Democrats and Republicans alike praised Gates as an independent voice for changing policies in Iraq the Bush administration now concedes aren't working.

"I think you're going to be a good secretary," Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., told Gates near the end of about five hours of public questioning. "You come to the table for all the right reasons … and I think you're doing this out of a sense of loyalty to our country and a sense of patriotism."

Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said he asked Senate leaders to hold debate and a vote on the Gates nomination today, but no decision had been made Tuesday evening.

Gates' approval is all but inevitable, said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the panel's top Democrat. "The faster the president can hear the kind of candor we heard this morning on Iraq, the better." Levin told reporters during a break in the hearings.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, one of at least three potential 2008 presidential contenders on the Senate panel, praised Gates while simultaneously criticizing Rumsfeld's prickly relationship with Congress.

"Thank you for your candor," she told Gates. "That's something that has been sorely lacking from the current occupant in the position that you seek to hold."

Gates was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group until Nov. 8, when Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation and Gates' nomination. That panel's recommendations, due to be released today, will be helpful but aren't the only ones to consider, Gates said.

"It's my impression that there are no new ideas, really, on Iraq," Gates said. "I think the report of the Iraq Study Group is important. I don't think it's the last word."

Gates Says 'US Is Not Winning Iraq' (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Robert Gates, the White House choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary, on Tuesday acknowledged the US was not winning the war in Iraq.

Asked at his nomination hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee whether the US was winning the war, Mr Gates responded: "No sir."

Following the hearing - notable for the lack of acrimony that was present when Mr Rumsfeld testified - the committee voted unanimously to approve sending his nomination to the full Senate for final approval, which is expected to come this week.

Mr Gates later clarified that his remarks did not mean he thought the US was losing in Iraq. But his blunt assessment was at odds with an October statement by President George W. Bush that the US was "absolutely...winning".

Mr Gates also demonstrated clear differences with Mr Rumsfeld. Asked by John McCain, the Arizona senator who is the frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination for 2008, whether he believed there had been enough troops in Iraq, he replied: "There clearly were insufficient troops in Iraq after the initial invasion to establish control over the country."

In another display of independence that won Mr Gates admiration from Democrats, Mr Gates said he did not believe Iraq was "the central front" in the war on terror, which President Bush has consistently argued.

Asked by Lindsey Graham, an influential Republican on the committee, whether Iraq was "the central front", Mr Gates paused before replying: "I think it is one of the central fronts in the war on terror".

The Iraq Study Group, the bi-partisan commission mandated by Congress to examine US policy on Iraq, is on Wednesday expected to release its recommendations for a new policy direction on Iraq, although Mr Bush is not expected to respond until after he has heard the conclusions of two internal administration reviews.

Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will chair the Armed Services Committee from January, praised Mr Gates, saying his acknowledgement that the US was not winning in Iraq was "a necessary, refreshing breath of reality that is so needed if we're going to look at ways of changing course in Iraq to maximise the chances of success". Mr Gates said he was open to a "wide range" of ideas for US policy on Iraq. But the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency – who was an ISG member until being nominated to replace the controversial Mr Rumsfeld – said he did not believe the group's recommendations would be the "last word".

"It's my impression that . . . there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Mr Gates. "The list of tactics, the list of strategies, the list of approaches, is pretty much out there. And the question is: is there a way to put pieces of those different proposals together in a way that provides a path forward?"

Mr Gates said the next two years in Iraq would be crucial in determining whether the US could help the country stabilise.

"Our course over the next year or two will determine whether American and Iraqi people and the next president of the US will face a slowly but steadily improving situation in Iraq and in the region, or will face the very real risk and possible reality of a regional conflagration."

Mr Gates was also outspoken on Iran, saying he would only advise an attack on the country as an "absolute last resort".

"We have seen in Iraq that once war is unleashed, it becomes unpredictable. And I think that the consequences of a military conflict with Iran could be quite dramatic." He said he did not support an attack on Syria, which, along with Iran, the US has accused of meddling in Iraq, adding that an attack on either country would likely worsen the violence in Iraq.

His reservations on military action against Iran were a shot across the bows of weakened but still influential neo-conservatives in Washington who have called for strikes against the Islamic republic's nuclear facilities. Glen Howard of the Jamestown Foundation, a security think-tank, said: "The neo-cons are regrouping around the Iran threat."

Gates' Assets Include Defense Stock (WP/AP)

By Sharon Theimer, The Associated Press

The Washington Post/AP, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Defense Secretary-nominee Robert Gates' assets include up to $250,000 in stock in a defense contractor on whose board he serves, a financial disclosure report made public Tuesday shows.

If confirmed as defense secretary, Gates will divest his holdings in the company, NACCO Industries, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said. He will step away from any Defense Department matters involving NACCO for at least a year, she said.

Gates is a member of the board of directors of NACCO Industries, the Cleveland-based parent of the NACCO Materials Handling Group, a lift truck company and Defense Department contractor.

He holds stock worth $100,000 to $250,000 and earned $134,750 in director fees from the company from 2005 to the present, according to the financial report he filed with the federal government.

Gates plans to sell all the stock he owns in individual companies and sever all ties with them if the Senate confirms him as Pentagon chief, Perino said.

The Cabinet post would mean a pay cut for Gates. Like the man he would succeed, Donald H. Rumsfeld, Gates is a millionaire. The defense secretary post pays $183,500 a year; Gates earned nearly that much from speeches alone over the past few years.

Among his other holdings, Gates is part of BLO Family Properties, a family-owned company in Mount Vernon, Wash. He described that asset as worth $1 million to $5 million.

Other assets and earnings detailed in Gates' financial report from 2005 to the present include:

_ $752,788 in salary as president of Texas A&M University.

_ $137,469 in a lump-sum payment from a Texas A&M deferred compensation plan.

_ $397,834 in compensation from Fidelity Investments, where he is chairman of the board of trustees.

_ $163,000 from a total of 10 speeches, including $16,000 each in speaking fees from National Pest Management, AIM Investments, Mellon Financial, Target Corp. and others and $20,000 for addressing the Securing America's Future Energy Foundation.

_ $91,000 in director fees from Parker Drilling Co.

_ $80,033 in director fees from Brinker International.

_ $64,749 in consulting fees from The Mitchell Group, an energy consulting group in Houston.

_ A $5,000 consulting fee from Temple Inland, a real estate firm in Austin, Texas.

Gates' report also lists positions he holds with nonprofit organizations.

Gates is a member of the boards of directors of the Boy Scouts of America in Irving, Texas, and the United Way of Brazos County in College Station, Texas. He is president of the National Eagle Scout Association in Irving and a member of the Council on Foreign Relations, the Aspen Strategy Group and the Center for Strategic and International Studies Transnational Threat Project, all in Washington.

All The President's Men Are Down To One (SH)

By Martin Schram

DOJ_NMG_0102949

Scripps Howard, December 6, 2006

(SH) - They were all this President's men - Cheney and Rummy and Wolfie and Bolton - neoconservatives, hard-line conservatives, iron-fisted conservatives, unyielding conservatives.

Once they were not only The Untouchables but also The Unbudgeables. Now there is only one.

Don Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz and now John Bolton have been bulldozed and/or forklifted out of power. Once the Team Bush Neocons controlled Bush's Situation Room. Now they can caucus in a telephone booth - except it is unlikely Cheney can find one anymore.

So perhaps the once-dominant neocons will make do with just a morning caucus in Dick Cheney's bathroom mirror.

And that may be Cheney's most visible appearance of the day. For it seems that Dick Cheney may be on his way to becoming just another one of those veeps who is seldom seen and hardly heard. After all, Cheney's last assigned mission was to be unceremoniously summoned to Saudi Arabia, where not a single public event was held. And that was just as well because the word in the Washington think tanks is that the Saudi monarch used Cheney to send his sternest warning that if the Untied States leaves Iraq too rapidly and the Iranian-backed Shiite take over, the Saudis may step in to prevent a massacre of the Suunis.

The last Cheney sighting you may recall was his Nov. 3 appearance on ABC News, where he defined President Bush's resolve: "It's victory in Iraq. And it's full speed ahead on that basis." That, of course, was part of the pre-election bravado when Bush himself had promised that both Cheney and Rummy would stay on the job as long as he was president. Then, faster than you can say, "Brownie you're doing a heck of a job," Rummy was told his resignation was accepted, so would he please write it?

Rummy has had a heck of a run in Washington - a marathon. As a 1960s congressman from Chicago's suburbs, he was known as a moderate Republican back before GOP moderates became a rare breed. Then he got cabinet-rank domestic jobs in the Nixon White House - even though the Old Man (as Nixon's favorite guys, like Pat Buchanan and Bill Safire, called their boss when he wasn't around) suspected he was a secret dove on the Vietnam War.

One day when a young Washington correspondent arrived for a scheduled interview, Rumsfeld had another fellow there, too. "This is a new guy on my staff and, if you don't mind, I'd like him to sit in just to see how I handle press interviews," Rumsfeld said, adding, "Say hello to Dick Cheney."

Rummy and Cheney. Mentor and protege. They were cautious, thorough, insightful yet careful not to leave fingerprints on anything that could explode in their faces ... or all over their resumes. They excelled at avoiding controversy, skillfully putting their best and blandest face forward.

But Rummy did his best work behind the scenes and Cheney quickly learned the craft of politics. Including the great manipulation of November 1975. President Ford was under pressure to dump his veep (Nelson Rockefeller) from the 1976 ticket and Ford's chief of staff. Rumsfeld (Cheney was his deputy there. too) coveted the job. But a potential rival was another ex-congressman, ex-United Nations ambassador and currently ambassador to China: George H. W. Bush. So Rummy engineered Bush's appointment as CIA director. Bush felt trapped into accepting - and furious.

"It's a graveyard for politics... ," he wrote his three brothers and sister. Offering his reluctant acceptance to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, the elder Bush lamented: "Your message came as a total and complete shock ... I see this as the total end of any political future."

Strange turns. Voters weren't spooked by Bush's CIA past and he, not Rummy, became a president. And when Bush's son was elected, it was Cheney who landed a return engagement as defense secretary for his old mentor, Rummy.

Speaking of strange turns, Rummy apparently had one last writing job before getting to his resignation note - that classified memo to President Bush, listing every conceivable new course option for Iraq. His memo, written without the usual detailed analysis, seems intended mainly for our eyes only. It quickly materialized on page one of The New York Times - and we saw everything but the leaker's fingerprints.

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote. His memo was dated Nov. 6, just three days after his protege had assured us that the Iraq plan was "full speed ahead" - and three days before the president told the world he needed a new man at the Pentagon to help us find a new direction.

The dynamic duo has run its last course.

Iraq Panel To Urge New Policy Wednesday (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 6, 2006

President Bush got a preview Tuesday of the Iraq commission's ideas for changing war policies, as the White House sought to dampen the report's impact by emphasizing that Bush will be listening to other voices as well.

DOJ_NMG_0102950

Over lunch at the White House, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the Iraq Study Group's Republican co-chairman, gave Bush a private briefing on the general outline of the conclusions, said Dana Perino, a presidential spokeswoman.

The report — which Baker referred to during the lunch, Perino said — will be released Wednesday morning. The full commission, led by Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, will give a copy of the report to Bush at 7 a.m. EST.

Following the presentation to the president, the group is to brief Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his team via secure videoconference from the White House.

Bush, to be joined by Vice President Dick Cheney, White House chief of staff Joshua Bolton, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and other senior White House aides, was to thank the commission but not comment on the specifics of its recommendations, the official said.

"We're going to give it a careful review," said White House press secretary Tony Snow. "As we have mentioned, there are other ongoing studies within the administration."

Bush is expected to hear in about two weeks the conclusions of in-house examinations of Iraq policy, anchored by a review of military options by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Snow said the president already is taking the advice of Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who said Bush has a "moral obligation" to seek input on a new Iraq strategy from Democrats who are about to take control of Congress.

Tuesday afternoon, the president consulted on Iraq with House Republicans and is due to see House and Senate leaders after Wednesday's briefing by the Iraq Study Group.

On Capitol Hill Tuesday, the confirmation hearing for Robert Gates — who is expected to be approved to replace embattled Pentagon chief Donald H. Rumsfeld — became a vehicle for lawmakers to express their displeasure. Democrats as well as some Republicans have urged Bush to present a plan for some of the 140,000 U.S. troops to begin coming home.

Replying to a question, Gates contradicted Bush's previous statements and said the United States is not winning in Iraq — a conclusion he said he reached while a member of the Iraq commission. But he played down the likelihood of the commission coming up with a quick solution.

"It's my impression that, frankly, there are no new ideas on Iraq," said Gates, who left the commission when Bush nominated him to be defense secretary. The Senate panel voted 21-0 to recommend his confirmation.

But even as the administration pushed back against the idea that a major change is coming, it appeared to be maneuvering separately from the commission to set the stage for adjustments.

The war has surpassed the length of American involvement in World War II, and U.S. deaths have passed 2,900. A relentless insurgency and the added complication of increased fighting between religious and ethnic factions have raised questions about whether Iraq is embroiled in a civil war and whether the al-Maliki's U.S.-backed government will ever be able to calm the country.

A changed political environment at home has added to the pressure on Bush. Democrats wrested majorities in the House and Senate from the president's Republican Party in last month's midterm elections, in large part because of dissatisfaction with the war.

The Iraq commission members gathered at a Washington hotel Tuesday to receive their copies of the report, thick black binders that each carried out, and their marching orders for media interviews on Wednesday. "But of course," said lobbyist and commission member Vernon Jordan when asked if the group was satisfied with its product, but everyone stayed mum on details, as did the White House.

The report was expected to urge the U.S. to reach out for more help on Iraq's security — including Iran and Syria as part of a larger group — and to gradually change U.S. troops' mission from combat to training and support, with a broad goal of withdrawing the Americans by early 2008.

Bush has resisted engagement with Iran and Syria, which the U.S. accuses of being bad actors on the world stage as well as fomenting instability in Iraq. Bush has rejected any timetable for U.S. troop drawdowns.

From Baghdad, though, the top American military spokesman said the Pentagon expects all of Iraq to be under the control of Iraqi forces by the middle of next year.

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said this is part of an accelerated timetable discussed by Bush and al-Maliki during a meeting in Jordan last week. Previous Iraqi predictions of their abilities to take over have fallen by the wayside, but al-Maliki's statement last week that Iraq soldiers and police would be up to speed by June was seen as one way out for the administration.

And the White House reacted warmly to al-Maliki's announcement Tuesday that his government wants a conference with neighboring nations, such as Iran and Syria, on ending the violence.

"It's a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security," Snow said.

Report's Rollout Precisely Planned (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Beginning with an early morning presidential briefing, the long-awaited Iraq Study Group report will be unveiled and promoted with a well-choreographed plan.

Group members have a 7 a.m. appointment today at the White House to present their report to President Bush, starting a day-long series of briefings and media appearances on their recommendations for Iraq.

"The purpose is to inspire and inform public debate," said Lauren Sucher, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Institute of Peace, a federally funded think tank that has assisted the Iraq Study Group.

After their White House visit, group members will head to Capitol Hill to brief House and Senate leaders. They plan to hold a news conference at 11 a.m., when they will release the report to the public.

The rest of the day features a string of television, radio and newspaper interviews of study group members, including its co-chairmen: former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., now director of the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington.

The interviews are being coordinated by the Edelman public relations firm, which will continue to assist the institute through appearances on this Sunday's news talk shows.

The U.S. Institute of Peace, which is devoted to global conflict resolution, received a $1 million appropriation from Congress to assist the Iraq Study Group.

Sucher would not reveal how much of that budget is going to Edelman.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush and his aides probably won't be saying much today because they want to study the report first.

Pressure Builds On Bush To Change Track (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

The Iraq Study Group report, to be released on Wednesday, will increase the pressure on President George W. Bush to adjust US military policy in Iraq to stem the rising violence and pave the way for an eventual troop withdrawal.

Leaks from the bipartisan commission led by James Baker, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman, suggest it will recommend a gradual withdrawal to step up pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian violence without outlining a timetable for a complete pull-out.

White House officials said Mr Bush would make a strategy decision within weeks after he has absorbed two internal reviews of Iraq policy, including a Pentagon military “scrub” and the Baker-Hamilton recommendations.

The initial drumbeat surrounding the ISG suggested Mr Baker, a Bush family friend, would help the president extricate himself from Iraq, where almost 2,900 US troops and tens of thousands of Iraqi civilians have died.

In Amman last week, Mr Bush appeared, however, to reject that. “I know there’s a lot of speculation that these reports in Washington mean there’s going to be some kind of graceful exit out of Iraq,” he said. “We’re going to stay in Iraq to get the job done, so long as the [Iraqi] government wants us there.”

In a classified memo leaked over the weekend, however, Donald Rumsfeld, the outgoing defence secretary, laid out policy options that included a modest withdrawal of troops to force the Iraqis to “pull up their socks”.

Regardless of the ISG recommendations, most experts say Mr Bush cannot continue along the same track and there is likely to be some change to the levels and structure of US forces in Iraq.

With the exception of small, temporary increases around events such as elections, the number and composition of US troops has been relatively stable since the March 2003 invasion.

The US has about 139,000 troops operating from 55 bases across Iraq. The Pentagon has cut the number of bases from a peak of 110 and has reduced the number of troops from a post-invasion high of 159,000 in January last year.

The Pentagon was forced to abandon plans to bring the number down to about 100,000 this year because of the escalating violence, which many experts are now calling a civil war.

One option that will be debated in the wake of the ISG report is whether to move troops to Baghdad from Anbar, the Sunni-dominated province in western Iraq which houses the insurgent strongholds of Falluja and Ramadi and where most of the marine units operate.

DOJ_NMG_0102952

Anbar has recently been eclipsed as the most violent area in Iraq by the capital, which is seeing an escalation of kidnappings, suicide bombings and killings carried out by sectarian squads.

In his memo, Mr Rumsfeld outlined several “less attractive options” which included moving a large proportion of US forces in Iraq to Baghdad in an effort to secure the capital.

At the congressional hearing last month, Gen John Abizaid, US commander in the Middle East, conceded that Anbar was “not under control” but said the “preponderance of the military activity” should be in the Baghdad area. A recent marine intelligence report concluded that the US could not defeat the insurgency in Anbar.

While the marines had previously been doing most of the difficult fighting, the army has borne more of the brunt in recent months because of the violence in Baghdad, where six of the 14 US combat brigades in Iraq are now based.

The other main army division is based outside Tikrit where, in addition to patrolling the Sunni triangle, it has responsibility for Mosul, Kirkuk and Baquba.

A separate military command, known as Anaconda because of the twisting supply lines, has responsibility for logistics -support.

The US military in Baghdad declined to provide a breakdown of the numbers of the different kinds of troops engaged in operating in Iraq. But military experts say that anywhere from 45,000-70,000 troops are involved in combat operations, several thousand are involved in the increasingly important mission to train the Iraqi security forces, while the remainder are engaged in logistics.

One ISG proposal that Mr Bush should have less difficulty endorsing is a recommendation to increase the number of US troops training the Iraqi army and police. The New York Times reported on Tuesday that the US military was already starting to shift combat troops to become advisers in Iraqi units.

Tom Donnelly, a defence expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the military faces a trade-off in increasing the number of trainers because of a lack of personnel. “If you are going to get serious about it, you have to really rearrange the incentives and pull your good guys out of combat units. There is no free lunch in all this.”

James Carafano, a military expert at the Heritage Foundation, said the army had previously been reluctant to do this but is starting to change.

“The most significant thing is that before the advisers would stop at the battalion level and now there really is an effort to get advisers down to the lowest level and infuse throughout the chain of command,” said Mr Carafano.

An increased focus on training might require US troops to pull back to garrison. This would probably result in a reduction in the casualty rate of US troops. Michael O’Hanlon, a defence expert at the Brookings Institution, said: “There has been less garrisoning in the last few months which is why the fatalities are so much higher.”

War Denials Vs. Too-simple Solutions (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With his unwavering insistence that U.S. military forces must stand, fight and "win" in Iraq, President Bush has taken on the look of the last man standing.

Both inside and outside the White House, voices are calling for at least a new war strategy—and at most a target date for withdrawal of troops from Iraq. But Bush, while acknowledging frustration with the progress of the U.S. mission, so far has refused to fundamentally alter it.

Another call to change course is likely to come Wednesday from the Iraq Study Group, chaired by Republican James Baker, a former secretary of state, and Democrat Lee Hamilton, an ex-congressman from Indiana. They are expected to recommend a drawdown of U.S. combat troops with a soft deadline of early 2008, with remaining troops focusing on training Iraqi forces, logistics, support and quick reaction in case U.S. advisers are in trouble.

The White House has downplayed the report, saying the president will have no "snap reaction" to the congressionally mandated review.

After nearly four years of war, the president has said he welcomes "fresh eyes" and new tactics. At the same time, he has kept his position that U.S. forces will not stand down until Iraq's nascent government is able to defend itself against terrorism.

And while growing ranks of authorities warn that sectarian violence is consuming Iraq in civil war, the president steadfastly rejects that assessment, calling most of Iraq "relatively peaceful."

"I just think this president simply doesn't want to believe how bad things have gotten," said Anthony Cordesman, a senior fellow at the non-partisan Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Parallels to Vietnam are always terribly dangerous, but you are beginning to see in George Bush some striking resemblance to Lyndon Johnson. Both became failed presidents and tragic figures long before they left office."

DOJ_NMG_0102953

Dangerous path

More dangerous, Cordesman suggested, is the temptation of Washington to seize upon simple solutions, such as a premature withdrawal of forces from Iraq, without considering the far-reaching implications of a potential collapse of civil society inside Iraq and the opportunity that would provide for both terrorists within the country and regional neighbors with designs on greater power.

"If the president is in denial, his critics are in oversimplification. I don't know which is worse," said Cordesman, who predicted a rush to flee Iraq if the Baker-Hamilton report bolsters a movement for quick withdrawal. "Everybody is running out to … catch the wave, rather than wondering where the ocean is going to lead."

Bush would be hard-pressed to embrace any formula for troop withdrawal because of his insistence that U.S. troop deployments are dependent on the Iraqi government's ability to operate without them.

Bush met Tuesday with Baker. The Baker-Hamilton study isn't the only review under way. The administration's National Security Council is reviewing the war policy. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is reviewing the policy. The joint chiefs of staff, led by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, is reviewing the policy.

"I think anybody who expects … a magic bullet out of the Baker-Hamilton commission is probably placing an unfair burden on them," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday. "The way out of Iraq is to have an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself."

For Bush, some say, the solution might lie in embracing one of the recommendations made by his own advisers—or even the Iraq Study Group—without publicly acknowledging that he is taking a dramatic course change in Iraq.

"He is, rhetorically, the last man standing, but from where he is standing he can also see the writing on the wall," said Fred Greenstein, professor emeritus of politics at Princeton University. "This is an extreme situation, but Bush has often been in a situation where he has said he wanted X and settled for X minus whatever he can get, and said this is a great victory. …

"It wasn't very long before he announced [Donald] Rumsfeld's retirement, after he had said he wanted Rumsfeld [to stay] until the end of his presidency," Greenstein said. "He is existing in the real world. He's got very poor cards to play with now."

Bush will play host to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his staunchest ally in the war, on Thursday. The British government has been striving to soft-pedal a recent Blair comment to broadcaster David Frost, who interviewed Blair for Al Jazeera's English-language channel and said the invasion of Iraq has been "pretty much of a disaster." Blair replied: "It has. …" But Blair's spokesman immediately called that "a straightforward slip of the tongue."

Both Rumsfeld, the president's retiring Pentagon chief, and Robert Gates, the president's nominee to succeed Rumsfeld, have issued sobering assessments of the war.

"In my view, it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote to the White House the day before midterm elections handed control of Congress to the Democrats—a memo leaked and published last weekend.

Gates, at his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday, was asked whether the U.S. is winning the war.

Gates: All options on table

"No, sir," replied Gates, adding later that the U.S. is neither winning nor losing. Gates said: "In my view, all options are on the table, in terms of how we address this problem in Iraq."

He also remained non-committal about a troop withdrawal: "It depends on the conditions on the ground under which troops were withdrawn."

The president, too, insists that any withdrawal must be based on ground conditions.

"My objective is to succeed," Bush said this week in an interview with Fox News Channel's Brit Hume. "Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for your grandchildren. And the reason … is because we're now in an ideological struggle between extremists and people who want to live in peace."

Democrats Likely To Be Cautious On Iraq Report (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, December 6, 2006

Congressional Democrats will use today's report by the Iraq Study Group as another opportunity to seek validation for a change of course in the region, but they privately acknowledge that they will be careful not to go too far in embracing the study.

Democrats say they want to make sure that the report — which is expected to call for a transition out of Iraq — doesn't provide cover for the Bush administration over its policies. As part of that approach, both House and Senate Democratic leaders will be driving home the message that the research serves as a strong rebuke of a conflict they believe has devolved into a civil war.

A senior Senate Democratic aide said there will be a "significant attempt" by Democrats to "embrace as much [of the report] as possible, while calling it a clear repudiation of the Bush administration's failed stay-the-course strategy."

"The president owns this lock, stock and barrel," the Senate aide added. "We don't want to be too closely identified with the president."

House and Senate Democrats have largely rallied around the message that 2007 will be a transition year in Iraq and have insisted on some type of troop redeployment in the nearer term. But the party, recently thrust into the majority in both chambers of Congress, has struggled to find a unified position on the war, and many Democrats still disagree on whether, and when, to redeploy from the region.

Still, Democratic leaders used Tuesday to reach across the Dome to present a unified party message on today's unveiling of the report. Sources said they were "still working" to coordinate their talking points in advance of the report's release.

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton (Ind.), will brief House and Senate leaders this morning on their six-month study on the war. House Democrats and Republicans will meet with the group at 8:30 a.m., while Senate leaders will hold their session an hour later.

Later today, House and Senate leaders are scheduled to head to the White House to discuss the study with President Bush. Bush got a personal preview of the report from Baker on Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Democratic sources said they plan to drive home three key messages: that the report shows need for a new policy in Iraq, that Iraq is embroiled in a civil war and that Bush must use the report as a wake-up call. But Democrats also will make clear that the report is "not the be-all-and-end-all."

"If what we're hearing is true, it validates what we've been saying," a senior House Democratic staffer said Tuesday. "We need to change what we're doing; it's not working."

Iraq Study Group Finds Options Are Limited (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr., Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

As the Iraq Study Group prepares to release recommendations today, the panel and the Bush administration are broadcasting a similar message: There are no dramatic fixes to end the war or to get U.S. troops home in a hurry.

The group's long-awaited report, people familiar with the matter say, will describe the situation in Iraq as deteriorating, but will acknowledge that its own recommendations are flawed and far from a magic solution. The panel plans to put the main focus on the need to launch an immediate effort to gain international support for rescuing Iraq, including from nettlesome neighbors Syria and Iran.

At the same time, the group will argue that the U.S. should redouble its effort to train the Iraqi army while diminishing its own military presence there largely to an advising and support role, with an eye toward pulling out all combat units by the first three months of 2008. Tens of thousands of U.S. troops will likely remain.

During the past few months, Democrats vying in congressional elections had talked up the possibility of beginning an immediate troop withdrawal, and anticipation had been high that the Iraq Study Group might offer some unexpected solutions. Now, most factions in Washington seem to agree that the room for maneuvering in Iraq is narrow and that any changes in U.S. strategy are likely to come largely on the margins.

Former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, who is co-chairman of the bipartisan group with former Secretary of State James Baker, made that point to a number of ambassadors and former U.S. officials at a Christmas party Saturday. "The expectations are up here," he said, putting his hand shoulder-high, "while our options are down here." He then lowered his hand below his knees, according to two other guests at the gathering.

The lack of any clear solutions for Iraq underscores the sentiment in Washington that U.S. involvement is likely to continue for years, even without obvious signs of progress.

"We are in a position where, politically, it may soon be impossible to stay in Iraq, but where, strategically, we simply can't leave," said Brent Scowcroft, a former national-security adviser to President George H.W. Bush.

During his Senate confirmation hearing yesterday, Robert Gates, Mr. Bush's nominee for secretary of defense, acknowledged that the U.S. isn't winning in Iraq. "All options are on the table in terms of how we address this problem," he said. The panel later unanimously approved the nomination and moved it to the full Senate for a vote.

Mr. Gates, who was a member of the Baker-Hamilton panel until he was selected to succeed Donald Rumsfeld as Pentagon chief, declined to discuss the timing or size of any potential military withdrawal from Iraq. He also didn't offer specifics about what other options the administration would consider to stem the violence.

Mr. Gates's role on the panel had led many to believe that Mr. Bush might be keen to embrace the group's findings, which will be laid out in a 100-plus-page report. But in recent days, Mr. Bush and his aides have downplayed its importance, depicting the report as just one review among many.

DOJ_NMG_0102955

In detailed private briefings, U.S. officials have told close allies that Mr. Bush plans no abrupt shifts in Iraq and will stick by U.S. troop commitments there. Senior U.S. military commanders in Iraq also say no major changes are in the works, arguing that their current strategy will succeed if given enough time.

That strategy aims to shift thousands of U.S. personnel from combat to training-and-advisory roles while temporarily increasing the numbers of American combat personnel in Baghdad to stabilize the city.

The administration is collecting recommendations from the Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council. Mr. Bush plans to set out his response in a speech later this month, U.S. officials say. U.S. military officials in Iraq said they expect to hear results of the reviews in January and don't expect major changes in policy. "If there was an easy way to do it, we'd have done it by now," one senior official said.

The report of the 10-member bipartisan group, which began work in April, is titled, "The Way Forward: A New Approach." Yesterday, Mr. Baker briefed Mr. Bush at the White House on the general direction of the report. Officials involved with the panel's work said some members are troubled by the increasing violence in Iraq and worry that their recommendations might make little difference, even if followed.

The recommendations put forward in the report may get a cool reception from the administration. White House officials have said the U.S. would be open to considering negotiations with Tehran if it drops its support for the militant group Hezbollah and agrees to suspend its uranium-enrichment work. But Washington has given little sign of what it would be willing to offer Iran in exchange for help in Iraq. During a visit to Amman, Jordan, last week, Mr. Bush told King Abdullah that "this is not the time for engagement with Syria," a senior administration official said.

The White House has rejected calls for beginning a U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq. Administration officials have said they are committed to maintaining current U.S. troop levels there indefinitely.

The administration's apparent reluctance to make sweeping changes in Iraq reflects two factors, said senior U.S. officials familiar with the deliberations. First, Mr. Bush continues to insist that the U.S. can still win, despite evidence that the initial goal of helping build a stable country with a democratic government capable of enforcing order is out of reach.

Second, Mr. Bush and his top advisers believe the White House can resist political pressures to change course in Iraq for at least a few months, Bush aides said. They said Mr. Bush feels that he has a short window to continue his current policy before the 2008 presidential-election cycle intensifies.

The administration's apparent commitment to largely staying the course in Iraq is certain to trigger debate within the new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate. Democratic lawmakers have coalesced around a proposal by incoming Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) to begin drawing down U.S. forces in the spring. Democratic leaders have said they won't use their power over the nation's purse strings to cut funding for U.S. personnel in Iraq for fear that it would open them up to charges of endangering the troops.

But some Democrats said they will consider reducing the money available for other administration priorities in Iraq -- like continuing small-scale rebuilding projects or training and equipping Iraqi security forces -- if the administration refuses to change course there or if the country slides deeper into conflict.

Panel To Urge Pressure On Iraq (WP)

By Peter Baker And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group plans to recommend to President Bush that he threaten to reduce economic and military support for Iraq's government if it fails to meet specific benchmarks intended to improve security in the country, a source familiar with the report said yesterday.

The congressionally chartered panel, which is due to deliver its much-anticipated report to Bush at the White House this morning and then unveil it to the public, outlined diplomatic and military ideas intended to change the course of the 44-month-old war. Among other things, the source said, the report urges Bush to aggressively tackle the Israeli-Palestinian dispute to reduce the broader regional tensions fueling the Iraq conflict.

The latest details to emerge from the commission's report help flesh out a plan that also calls for the United States to withdraw nearly all combat units by early 2008 while leaving behind tens of thousands of troops to advise, train and embed with Iraqi forces. The report suggests that the Bush administration open talks with Iran and Syria about ways to end the violence in Iraq and proposes holding a regional conference to bring together all of Iraq's neighbors.

Some proposals in the report track measures that the administration is already carrying out or is considering, but several directly challenge Bush in areas in which he has refused to compromise. The president has rejected talking with Iran and Syria and has resisted linking the Iraq war to the Palestinian issue. He has dismissed timetables for troop withdrawals, although the panel cites 2008 as a goal rather than a firm deadline. He has also declined to punish Iraqis for not making progress in establishing security.

Although the study group will present its plan as a much-needed course change in Iraq, many of its own advisers concluded during its deliberations that the war is essentially already lost, according to private correspondence obtained yesterday and interviews with participants. The best the commission could put forward would be the "least bad" of many bad options, as former ambassador Daniel C. Kurtzer wrote.

An early working draft from July stated that "there is even doubt that any level of resources could achieve the administration's stated goals, given the illiberal and undemocratic political forces, many of them Islamic fundamentalists, that will dominate large parts of the country for a long time."

In private e-mail exchanges over the past two weeks, members of the commission's working group, including former ambassadors, military officers and CIA analysts, expressed equally bleak outlooks for Iraq and skepticism that Bush would accept the panel's recommendations.

The report that resulted from that process is a mix of initiatives and conclusions that cover an array of areas, including a long diplomatic section, a security section and the proposed benchmarks for Iraqi leaders. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III, who served under President George H.W. Bush and co-chaired the commission, briefed the current president on its conclusions over lunch yesterday.

Baker and his co-chairman, former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), and the rest of the 10-member panel will meet with Bush at the White House at 7 a.m. today to formally hand over the report, then travel to Capitol Hill for an 11 a.m. news conference. The report will be released at that time on four Web sites and is being published today as a mass-market paperback by Vintage Books, a division of Random House, under the title "The Iraq Study Group Report: The Way Forward -- a New Approach."

Some of its conclusions, such as the need for a phased withdrawal and for shifting the mission of U.S. forces, have been reported over the past few days. Much of the report, though, emphasizes diplomatic options. Advisers said they pushed for dialogue with Iraq's immediate neighbors, Iran and Syria, as a major path toward improving the situation, despite a belief that Bush would reject the recommendation outright because of those countries' ties to terrorism.

Baker, who as secretary of state spent much time working to bring peace to the Middle East after the Persian Gulf War, made a personal point of including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the report and "laying out the importance of why it needs to be dealt with and a strategy to deal with it," said a source familiar with the report. Baker has been close to the Saudi royal family and his ideas may provoke opposition from Israel and its allies.

The benchmarks laid out for Iraqi forces are similar to the goals the Iraqi government recently embraced, the source said. Unlike Bush, though, the commission recommends consequences for not meeting them. "If they don't do it, we ought to reduce the military, economic and political support," the source said.

At the same time, the source said, the U.S. military strategy ought to be implemented regardless of whether Iraqis meet their benchmarks. But the commission warns against turning over control of security to Iraqi forces until reforms are in place.

Clifford May, one of the working group's advisers and a former Republican Party spokesman, was one of two advisers who opposed withdrawal and supported Bush's strategy, but he said he "was willing to concede from the start that what Bush hoped for is probably not achievable. But it doesn't mean that nothing is achievable."

May said the report includes "at least 70 recommendations," but a timetable for troop withdrawal is not among them. "Instead, it says we have a mission that can be accomplished, and it defines that mission as the need to leave behind a government that can sustain itself," May said.

Much debate in e-mail exchanges among the most outspoken advisers to the study group focused on whether adding troops would help. But most feared that bringing in the large numbers required would break the military, lead to a surge in U.S. deaths and do nothing to better protect civilians.

In the end, the experts did not agree on sending additional forces beyond military advisers for the Iraqi national army. They seemed certain that Bush would reject most of their recommendations and that few could work anyway.

"Very early on, the notion of achieving some sort of victory didn't take," said Chas W. Freeman Jr., a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "So if victory is not possible and not feasible, even if you could define it, then what you're left with is to find some way to mitigate defeat."

James Dobbins, a principal U.S. architect of the Afghan reconciliation process, said he supported "an intensified regional dialogue that would be comprehensive and encompass all of Iraq's neighbors." But he and others on the staff said a push for more U.S. engagement with Israel and the Palestinians was rarely discussed beyond a few e-mail exchanges.

DOJ_NMG_0102957

"It was kind of assumed by everybody that if the U.S. devoted more attention to it, it would be a good thing in its own right, but we didn't devote much time to that, so if it becomes a recommendation, it would likely come directly from Baker and Hamilton," said Kurtzer, who served as U.S. ambassador to Israel and Egypt.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Key Day On Iraq As Report Unveiled (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush today receives a high-profile report suggesting new approaches for the Iraq war, a day after a Senate committee signaled it wants change by unanimously approving Robert Gates to replace Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Gates, who was a member of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that is releasing its recommendations, acknowledged at his confirmation hearing Tuesday that the United States is not winning the war. He said he would be open to new options.

After the Armed Service Committee vote, senators praised Gates' willingness to alter course. "I voted yes because … he seemed open to course correction," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will be the panel's chairman after Democrats take control of the Senate.

The vote and the report come at a critical time in the war and Bush's presidency. Violence in Iraq has escalated as U.S. public support for the war has fallen.

Asked directly by Levin if the United States is winning in Iraq, Gates replied, "No, sir." Later he clarified his answer by saying that the country is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

He also acknowledged that there are "no new ideas on Iraq" but added that "all options are on the table."

President Bush, who had lunch with James Baker, the Republican co-chairman of the study group, will get the report at a 7 a.m. meeting today.

Among the issues to be raised by the commission and others:

·Withdrawing U.S. troops. The commission is expected to propose withdrawing about 70,000 combat troops by 2008.

Gates, who dismissed any timetable, told senators that any withdrawal of troops will depend on "conditions on the ground."

A timetable, he said, would tell insurgents "how long they have to wait until we're gone." There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq.

· Engagement with Iraq's neighbors, Syria and Iran. Gates said he would support such a move.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday it would be a good idea for Iraq to work with its neighbors. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki also said he'd be receptive to a conference with Iran and Syria.

·Increasing U.S. troops. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, talked to Gates about whether there have been enough troops in Iraq. Gates said he would travel to Iraq to speak with commanders about troop levels.

Gates' nomination now goes to the full Senate for a vote, which could be held as early as today.

A Study In Comity (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Whatever the final impact of the Iraq Study Group report being issued today, for the 10 commission members this was an exhilarating experience, a demonstration of genuine bipartisanship that they hope will serve as an example to the broader political world.

"It was a very wonderful experience," former Republican senator Al Simpson of Wyoming told me last weekend. "We very quickly stopped considering ourselves as Republicans and Democrats, but as Americans trying to deal with a most urgent problem."

The nine men and one woman serving on the commission -- five from each party -- represented a wide range of political backgrounds and philosophical views. Several had been on opposing sides in past presidential campaigns.

But as commission member Vernon Jordan, the Democratic lawyer, noted, they were also "professionals" -- veterans of public service. Jordan has served on presidential commissions of one sort or another since 1965, and said, "This process has been a lesson in civility."

Leon Panetta, a former Democratic congressman and Clinton White House chief of staff, said the high average age of the 10 commission members contributed to its success. "This is a different generation of policymakers," said Panetta, who at 68 was one of the youngest members. "These are people who have very different views but are comfortable trying to understand each other and coming together to solve a terrible issue facing the country."

DOJ_NMG_0102958

The analogy suggested by Simpson and Panetta, both veterans of Capitol Hill, and endorsed by Jordan, is that the commission functioned like a successful House-Senate conference committee. Members fought to include (or exclude) points that were especially important to them, "but in the end," as Jordan noted, "you have to have the votes to pass it."

"We went over the recommendations word by word until everyone was satisfied," Simpson said. "No one was trying to sneak anything in, and no one was laying traps. It was a very powerful experience."

Despite all the goodwill, several of the members recounted that toward the end of their deliberations, one commissioner -- not someone who had served in Congress, they noted -- said he would not sign the report if one part was not removed.

James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, glanced at his co-chairman, former Democratic representative Lee Hamilton, and calmly said to the dissenter, "Okay, don't."

A little later, others recalled, the dissenting member asked to return to the disputed passage and, in short order, agreed to slightly modified language.

"No one wanted to see us embarrassed by being unable to come to consensus," Simpson said.

Panetta observed that while most of the commission members had had some dealings with each other in their previous positions, they really bonded during their inspection trip to Baghdad earlier this year. "Fifteen hours on the plane together and three days in a tough place -- that was a human experience where we shared a lot and really got to know each other," he said.

When I asked the commission members whether they thought their experience of coming to agreement could serve as an example to others, the answers were emphatic.

"Hopefully," Jordan said, "the House and Senate and both political parties will be instructed by our process. In the rollout, we're going to try to provide that example. I'll be going around with Ed Meese," the former Republican attorney general, "and there will be other bipartisan pairs, led by Baker and Hamilton."

When I put the question to Panetta, he said, "Our forefathers intended that a process like this work for people elected to office -- the president and members of Congress in both the House and Senate. They believed they would come from different places but ultimately find consensus -- that was the Miracle of Philadelphia," the compromise that produced the Constitution.

"What's unusual now is their contracting out to people like us a job that elected officials are supposed to do -- finding consensus on difficult issues. I hope this will be a lesson to them; otherwise, we're in for continued trench warfare."

Panetta concluded: "This is an opportunity to look at the realities we're confronting in Iraq. For too long, both sides have been trapped by their sound bites. I hope they realize that if they're going to govern this country, they have to work together."

Simpson was even more expansive. "This could be an example, not only of how to handle Iraq, but it could apply to immigration, Social Security and all those other things that have been hung up for so long. That's what this last election said: Get serious and get your work done."

I hope Washington is listening.

Lee H. Hamilton, A Compromiser Who Operates Above The Partisan Fray (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — The choice before the Sept. 11 commission in late 2003 was whether to subpoena the Pentagon to turn over classified documents, and four of the panel's five Democrats were eager to do so.

The dissenter was the commission's vice chairman, Lee H. Hamilton, a retired Democratic House member from Indiana, who had come to be trusted by the Bush administration as an honest broker. He told the other Democrats that he wanted to give Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, an old friend from Congress, time to cooperate.

Mr. Hamilton's disdain for partisan battle, often to the annoyance of fellow Democrats, and his willingness to work toward compromise on national security policy, are likely to be on display again on Wednesday with the release of the findings of the Iraq Study Group, the independent panel established by Congress to rethink American policy in Iraq.

Panel members say the co-chairmen, Mr. Hamilton and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican, have formed a close partnership that has allowed the group's five Democrats and five Republicans to transcend what might have been bitter partisan differences over the conduct of the war. The group's report is unanimous.

"At a time when foreign policy issues are part of the partisan trench warfare of Washington, there aren't many people who can rise above it, but Lee is one of them," said Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic member of the Iraq group.

He said Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Baker had a "strong relationship," in part because "they are both cut from the same cloth — they're pragmatists who are willing to face realities and not get trapped in political posturing." They both practiced the "lost art" of negotiation, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0102959

A Republican on the panel, Alan K. Simpson, a former senator from Wyoming, said Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Baker developed a "remarkable symbiosis — they trusted each other, they respected each other." He said their leadership was a welcome reminder of a time when Democrats and Republicans typically reached across the aisle to find consensus on foreign policy.

Mr. Hamilton has said little in public about the deliberations of the panel but said recently that the successes of the Sept. 11 commission resulted from an effort to "respect one another as individuals — I didn't see my Republican friends with a big R on their head." He added: "We talked, and we talked, and we talked. And if you know a way to build a consensus without talking to one another, let me know."

With his assignments on the Sept. 11 commission and the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Hamilton, 75, has had nearly the public recognition he enjoyed during 34 years in the House, where he was a leading Democratic voice on foreign policy.

On the Iraq Study Group, Mr. Hamilton is demonstrating, as he did in Congress, that he is not in lock-step with Democratic leaders, who have mostly recommended a sharper reversal of American policy than the group will propose.

While never criticizing him in public, Democrats on the Sept. 11 commission and Congressional leaders were often at odds with Mr. Hamilton during that investigation, describing him as too trusting of the Bush administration and too patient in negotiations with the White House over access to classified documents.

At the same time, his willingness to hear out the White House won him the respect of the commission's Republicans, making them more willing to compromise when it came time to write a final report.

Similar complaints from Democrats about Mr. Hamilton's dealings with the White House were heard in the mid-1980s, when he led the House intelligence committee and appeared reluctant to follow up on news reports that the Reagan administration had sold weapons to Iran and diverted the proceeds to Nicaraguan rebels, called the contras.

The reports proved to be true, and Mr. Hamilton acknowledged later that he had been duped by senior Reagan administration officials. "I basically believed them," he said after the Iran-contra affair was exposed. "My attitude was, 'I don't have any hard evidence not to believe.' " He later led the House investigation of the scandal.

Lee Herbert Hamilton was born on April 20, 1931, in Daytona Beach, Fla. His father was a Methodist minister, and the future lawmaker's traditional, religious upbringing in Evansville, Ind. might help explain his reputation in Congress for fair play and his enthusiasm for hard work. He arrived at his desk in the House by six most mornings.

After graduation from DePauw University in 1952 and the Indiana University School of Law in 1956, he practiced law before entering Democratic politics. He was first elected to the House in 1964, swept into office in a traditionally Republican district as part of President Lyndon Johnson's landslide that year.

Mr. Hamilton ended up on what was then called the House Foreign Affairs Committee, now known as the Committee on International Relations.

He found he liked it and, when later asked to join other committees and to consider a Senate bid, Mr. Hamilton turned the offers down, preferring to remain in the House and cement his reputation as a spokesman for the Democratic Party on how the United States should deal with the rest of the world. He went on to become chairman of both the international relations and intelligence committees.

Mr. Hamilton said in a speech last spring that in his decades in Congress, he was often asked, "Why don't you focus on problems here at home?"

The answer, he said, was simple. Americans lived in a world, he said, in which a foreign-born terrorist "can endanger more Americans than a drug dealer in Brooklyn, where a terrorist strike can take the lives of 3,000 Americans in a few horrifying minutes." More and more, he said, the United States needed to "see our problems in the context of the world we live in." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Americans' Iraq Views Sink To New Lows, Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

A majority of Americans say the situation for U.S. troops in Iraq has grown worse and confidence in U.S. policies in Iraq is at a new low, a Harris poll shows.

Fifty-eight percent of U.S. adults say the situation for troops in Iraq is getting worse, according to the online survey from Nov. 13 to Nov. 20, 2006, compared with 45% in September and 36% in January. Nine percent said the situation for troops in Iraq is getting better, while 27% said there was "no real change."

The percentage who are confident U.S. policies in Iraq will be successful fell to 17% from 26% in January, while those who aren't confident increased to 63% from 55% at the first of the year.

In addition, more Americans have a negative view of President Bush's handling of Iraq over the last several months: 71% said he is doing only fair or poor, compared with 26% who think he is doing a pretty good or excellent job. In September, 64% had a negative view of Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and 32% rated him positively.

When asked if taking military action against Iraq was the right or wrong thing to do, 36% said it was the right thing and 46% said it was the wrong thing.

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Nov. 13-20, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,429 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

House Democrats May Attach Conditions To Iraq Funding (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - On the eve of the Iraq Study Group's long-awaited recommendations for how to exit Iraq, congressional Democrats were eyeing a different document as leverage for change: President Bush's anticipated request for more money to keep fighting.

House Democratic leaders, who will take control in January, said Tuesday they are considering attaching a series of conditions to the estimated $160 billion supplemental war funding request for Iraq and Afghanistan that President Bush is expected to send them early next year.

They wouldn't specify what their conditions would be, including whether they might attach a troop-withdrawal timeline, as many Democratic lawmakers want to do.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said the supplemental funding request "is going to be the turning point" for the direction of the war. "Those dollars are going to be treated differently," he said.

"There may well be attached to those $160 billion various parameters that the Congress expects to be met," said Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

The Study Group's recommendations, to be formally released Wednesday after weeks of leaks, aren't expected to trigger much in the way of immediate results. But a big war-budget request that requires congressional approval could give Democrats a hand in forcing change.

If they use the funding request to pressure the administration, two political questions arise: Will Senate Democrats have the will or the power to act as boldly as House Democrats? And how far can Democrats push without being accused of cutting off funds for troops fighting on the ground?

DOJ_NMG_0102961

In an interview last week, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., showed little appetite for holding up the supplemental budget request. "We'll see if there's any fluff in it and make sure there's no pet projects," he said. "But if it's legitimate I think we'll have to go along with it."

"We will not cut off funding for the troops," Pelosi said Tuesday, but she added: "The days of rubber-stamping any request by this administration are over."

She underscored that her ally, Rep. Jack Murtha, D-Pa., incoming chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a strong advocate for troop redeployment, would be heavily involved in setting Democratic strategy for the war budget request.

Thomas Donnelly, a defense policy expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a center-right think tank, said that Democrats aren't likely to play their new power to the hilt, but they will have room for pressure.

"They could say, `We're not going to pay the bills for a force larger than X size,' or `You can't have this money unless you start withdrawing troops from Iraq.' (But) I think they haven't got the votes or the nerve."

Instead, Donnelly said, Democrats could opt for less controversial steps.

"You start demanding a lot of reports. Or you force the president to certify that things are getting better in Iraq. You can refuse to fund certain White House operations. Or they could say `I'm going to cut missile defense funding to pay for war costs, or other executive branch operations.'

"This is how it works when you have a political division between the legislative branch and the executive branch," Donnelly said. "Obviously in a wartime situation this game of chicken is conducted at a much higher level."

Top Democrats Rebuff Calls To Cut Off War Funds (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Top Democrats in Congress are ignoring calls from within their caucus to eliminate funding for troops in Iraq, a strategy some say is necessary to end U.S. involvement in the war.

"There is only one way in which the United States will withdraw from Iraq prior to the end of President Bush's term," said Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich, Ohio Democrat. "Congress must vote to cut off funds."

Democratic leaders flatly rejected the idea yesterday, insisting they will move to "change the course" of the war but will continue to appropriate money to support the troops fighting in Iraq. The Democrats won back the House and Senate leadership in large part with staunch opposition to the Iraq war, but many worry that cutting off funding would seem unpatriotic.

"My only real comment is you have to support the troops," incoming House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton said about the Kucinich proposal. The Missouri Democrat initially supported the war but now wants gradual troop withdrawal.

Mr. Kucinich is trying to convince his colleagues that resolutions to withdraw troops have no legal effect as long as the president receives appropriations to continue the war. He said Congress must "force a new direction" in Iraq.

"Even a substantial reduction of funds could leave open the door for a legal claim that Congress still intends to keep troops in Iraq," said Mr. Kucinich, a Democratic presidential contender in 2004.

Several members of the Out of Iraq Caucus support a less drastic measure to end war funding.

Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat, said his plan would send "a signal that our occupation has to end." It would cut off most funding but leave money for the "safe and orderly" withdrawal of troops, economic recovery and international peacekeeping.

Mr. McGovern's proposal has 18 co-sponsors. Mr. Kucinich's plan, which has not surfaced in the form of a bill, has received no endorsement.

Party leaders instead favor setting conditions on appropriations.

"As long as our troops are in harm's way, Democrats will be there to support them," said House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California. "We will not cut off funding for the troops."

Democrats downplayed intraparty divisions. "No matter how you look at it, there is a consensus this war needs to end," Mr. McGovern said.

Rep. Barney Frank, Massachusetts Democrat, dismissed the Kucinich plan as "silly," but one Republican said it is the most genuine proposal he has heard from a war opponent.

"I completely disagree with him, but he is the only honest voice of liberalism in the House," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina.

DOJ_NMG_0102962

Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, the incoming chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense, told fellow Democrats that he will now allow an emergency request from the White House for billions of dollars in supplemental appropriations and will insist that the president lay out exact spending plans for completing the mission in Iraq.

Majority Leader-elect Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said conditions "may well be attached" to the next such bill, expected to total $160 billion.

Mrs. Pelosi said Democrats will insist on oversight, which includes investigations into missing defense appropriations and subcontractors such as Halliburton Co.

Some anti-war groups think that cutting off funding would be a quick way to end the conflict. Democrats took such action in 1974 during the Vietnam War. When a $70 billion spending measure was up for a vote in September, only 20 House Democrats opposed it. It received unanimous support in the Senate.

War Cost Has Hidden Tolls (MH)

By Kevin G. Hall And Dave Montgomery

The Miami Herald, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - During a recent visit to a military family center at Fort Hood in Texas, Joyce Raezer was dismayed to find a sign in a stall in the ladies' room. It asked women to clean up because janitorial service had been cut back.

"What message does that send to a family member when they walk into a family center?" asked Raezer, the director of government relations for the National Military Families Association.

At Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri, swimming pools closed a month early this fall, and shuttle vans were sharply curtailed in an effort to trim spending. At Fort Sam Houston in Texas, unpaid utility bills exceeded $4 million, and the base reduced mail delivery to cut costs.

Belt-tightening at the bases is only the beginning. As the United States spends about $8 billion a month in Iraq, the military is being forced to cut costs in ways big and small.

Soldiers preparing to ship to Iraq don't have enough equipment to train on because it's been left in Iraq, where it's most needed. Thousands of tanks and other vehicles sit at repair depots waiting to be fixed because funds are short.

At the Red River Army Depot in Texas, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram reported in October that at least 6,200 Humvees, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, trucks and ambulances were awaiting repair because of insufficient funds.

There's a virtual graveyard of tanks and fighting vehicles at the Anniston Army Depot in Alabama. Depot spokeswoman Joan Gustafson said that the depot expects to repair 1,885 tanks and other armored vehicles during the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1. That's up from the 1,169 and 1,035 vehicles repaired in the prior two fiscal years.

Some of the depot's private-sector contractors haven't been able to supply enough parts in time to make all the repairs, she said. The depot is trying to reduce the time it takes to get repair and replacement parts from 120 days to 60 days.

Tanks and helicopters are one thing; the toll on America's warriors and their families is another.

More than 73,000 soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan have been diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and with problems such as drug abuse and depression. That's enough people to fill a typical NFL stadium.

Internet blogs written by soldiers or their wives tell of suicide attempts by soldiers haunted by the horror of combat, civilian careers of reservists who've been harmed by deployment and redeployment, and marriages broken by distance and the trauma of war.

"Back-to-back war deployments has changed both of us -- to where it's as if a marriage does not exist anymore," wrote a woman calling herself Blackhawk wife on an Iraq war vets Web site. ``We just go through the daily steps of life and raising children as best we can."

A mother of a returning soldier posted this: "Since he has been back, he has had 3 DUIs, wrecked his truck, attempted suicide, been diagnosed with PTSD" and is being kicked out of the Army.

The length of the war in Iraq has strained all aspects of the armed forces, said Dov Zakheim, who was the Pentagon's chief financial officer from 2001 to 2004.

"In 2003, I don't think anybody predicted it would go as long as World War II and the wear and tear on equipment would be as intense," said Zakheim, now a vice president for global strategy consultant Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. ``When I left the department, we were spending less than $4 billion a month on Iraq. Now it's pretty much doubled."

The length of the Iraq war surpassed that of World War II last month. The costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the global fight against terrorism are expected to surpass the $536 billion in inflation-adjusted costs of the Vietnam War by spring. That's more than 10 times the Bush administration's $50 billion prewar estimate.

Through the fiscal year that ended on Sept. 30, Congress authorized about $436 billion in war spending, according to the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0102963

In October, President Bush signed legislation that tacked on $70 billion, bringing the total to more than $506 billion. That number will rise again once Congress appropriates Iraq stabilization and reconstruction funding.

The armed services, seeking to replace aging equipment and address quality-of-life issues for military families, are believed to be seeking $100 billion to $160 billion in a supplemental spending bill for spring.

If that's approved, war funding -- three-quarters of it going to Iraq-related operations -- would reach nearly $700 billion. If U.S. troops remain in Iraq through 2010, it will approach $1 trillion.

In January, Nobel Prize-winning economist Joseph Stiglitz released a study that said the true costs of the Iraq war could exceed $1 trillion and perhaps reach $2 trillion.

"When I saw that figure, I thought it was an exaggeration. I no longer think it's an exaggeration," said Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a decorated Vietnam veteran who's criticized how the war has been fought and funded.

The Stiglitz report focused on hard-to-measure things such as lifetime care for injured soldiers and the economic effect of higher oil prices as a result of the war. But his final numbers for unofficial costs are on pace to be matched by the official costs -- which don't add the intangibles.

"We were very conservative on the numbers, and the numbers have repeatedly come in higher than we estimated," said Stiglitz, a former chief economist of the World Bank, in a telephone interview from Spain. "Those costs continue to pile up: the healthcare costs, the disability costs, the replacement costs -- and there's obviously an open question now if we ever reconstruct" Iraq.

Here's a look at some of the costs:

· RESET

Until recently, little of the authorized war funding went toward reset, the military term for replacing fighting vehicles, tanks, helicopters and other equipment that are wearing out from heavy use.

"We have a backlog of maintenance work to reset, fix, retool all our equipment, and at the same time we have to take care of our civilian soldiers," said Rep. Solomon Ortiz, D-Texas, who in January will become chairman of the House Armed Services subcommittee on readiness. ``Many of the units in the United States Reserve or National Guard do not have any equipment because their equipment stayed in Iraq . . . Humvees, weapons, trucks, tanks. You name it, they need it."

Gary Schmitt, a defense expert for the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, said the problem existed before 2001. "The war has obviously made that much worse," he said. "People would be surprised, but the reality is the increases in defense spending have been personnel and operational," not for upgrading or modernizing the armed forces.

The October bridge funding, which bridges the gap that occurs when the fiscal year begins before funds have been appropriated, included $24 billion for reset costs across the armed services. The Army's deputy chief of staff, Lt. Gen. David Melcher, told Congress in March that he expected reset costs of at least $12 billion a year while troops are in Iraq and for two years after withdrawal. In the 2006 fiscal year, the Marine Corps' reset request was three times bigger than its regular procurement budget.

The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office estimated a $60 billion reset price tag through 2016, assuming a reduction in U.S. troops in Iraq by 2010.

'As long as the current level of intensity is maintained in Iraq operations, there's not going to be enough money to meet all the services' needs," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute, a military think tank. ``We're really burning up money over there at a furious pace."

Policymakers are stymied in their efforts to predict war costs, partly because the Department of Defense provides only vague estimates of future costs.

"DOD has provided little information about overall requirements to replace worn equipment or to upgrade capabilities, or how war requirements relate to ongoing peacetime investment," Amy Belasco, a defense budget analyst for the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service, said in a September report.

As the chief economist on President Bush's Council of Economic Advisors in 2002 and director of the CBO from 2002 until last year, Douglas Holtz-Eakin wrestled with that same problem. "It was hard to get actual cost data," he said.

· HEALTH

Between Oct. 1, 2001, and June 30, 2006, 35 percent of returning active-duty soldiers and 31 percent of Army reservists and National Guardsmen sought medical care from Veterans Affairs health centers. That figure from the Veterans Health Administration doesn't include treatment at VA hospitals.

In that period, more than 33,000 returning troops received preliminary diagnoses of post-traumatic stress disorder. Others experienced depression and drug abuse.

"The wear and tear on soldiers and the wear and tear on their families have been immense," said John Grady, a spokesman for the Association of the United States Army, a nonprofit group that lobbies on behalf of active and retired soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0102964

Problems are getting corrected, he said, ``but they're getting corrected very slowly because the money is very slow in arriving."

In the first Gulf war, in which 700,000 U.S. soldiers were involved, 44 percent filed for some sort of disability compensation.

More than 1.4 million U.S. soldiers have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since late 2001, and about 26 percent have filed disability claims, according to raw data provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs. That percentage could grow as soldiers leave the armed forces.

"I see the whole thing as a mini-Medicare, another huge entitlement program which is going to be sprawling out over the course of our lifetimes and our children's lifetimes," said Linda Bilmes, a Harvard University public finance professor and co-author of the Stiglitz study. ``The big costs come when they get back . . . they stand a good chance of being really underfunded and not taken care of properly."

Veterans groups worry that they'll be forced to compete with other government programs for funds. Not enough attention is being given to the future mental health and medical needs of Iraq and Afghanistan war vets, they say, especially given how those wars differ from previous ones.

"First, they are deployed to war longer. Second, they are being deployed to the war zone two or three times. The combat there is more intense than the Gulf War for nearly every one deployed," said Paul Sullivan, a Desert Storm veteran and director of programs for Veterans for America. ``There are no rear-area jobs. Everyone is on the front lines . . . cooks and clerks and truck drivers . . . the entire country is a war zone."

· FUTURE READINESS

Military commanders complain that they've been forced to fight a war on the cheap, despite its large costs. That's because military spending totals about 4 percent of the broader economy, a historically low level. Some critics, including Murtha, want to see more funds dedicated to the military's long-term needs.

"As the ships get older, the airplanes get older, we won't have the deterrent capability that we need," Murtha said.

Big-ticket U.S. military programs have been delayed since the 1990s, said Schmitt at the American Enterprise Institute. There are now so many unfunded replacements and upgrades scheduled in the years ahead that the nation faces a "procurement bow wave" that could swamp the federal budget.

Zakheim, the Pentagon's former CFO, said diverting money from acquisition programs is akin to ``eating our seed corn for the future."

Iraqi Premier Moves To Plan Regional Talks (NYT)

By Edward Wong And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 5 — Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said Tuesday that he would send envoys to neighboring countries to plan a conference on Iraq, adding momentum to calls for a regional approach to quell the increasingly anarchic war here.

Such a proposal is already gaining attention in the United States, where the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Representative Lee H. Hamilton, is expected to recommend Wednesday that the American government should approach Iran and Syria to seek their aid in ending the war. Last week, Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, suggested convening an international conference.

Publicly, the White House has resisted the idea of widening its own diplomatic channels with Iran and Syria, saying that even opening a regular dialogue would be a concession to two governments suspected of fomenting violence in Iraq. But senior Bush administration officials now say they are working out ways to talk to those countries without the White House appearing to have conceded on its principle of giving them the diplomatic cold shoulder.

A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States approved of Mr. Maliki's proposed conference.

"It's absolutely consistent with what the Iraqis have said, that they have the reins on their own diplomacy and how they will relate to their neighbors, and how their neighbors will relate to them," he said.

American diplomats say they could use an international conference on Iraq, possibly the one called for by Mr. Maliki or a resurrection of a forum held in Egypt in 2004, to engage in talks with Iran and Syria.

The talk of a regional conference came as a spokesman for the American military command, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, said the Iraqis would take operational control of all Iraqi Army divisions by early summer, and responsibility for security in all 18 provinces by next fall.

He said the timetable resulted from discussions last week in Jordan between President Bush and Mr. Maliki, who has been pressing the White House for an accelerated transfer of authority. So far, the American command has given the Iraqis operational control of 3 of the 10 Iraqi Army divisions and security oversight in two provinces.

DOJ_NMG_0102965

Mr. Maliki's statement on an international meeting was the first time the prime minister had indicated that he wanted a wider regional discussion. It contradicted the stand taken by Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, as well as that of a powerful Shiite politician, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who met with President Bush in Washington on Monday. Both rejected a conference, saying that Iraq would find solutions through internal deliberations.

Mr. Maliki told reporters that a conference should held in Iraq, and that he was seeking support — not interference — from his neighbors.

"We will send envoys to neighboring countries to exchange opinions on matters and to ask the governments of these countries to help reinforce security and stability in Iraq," Mr. Maliki said. "After settling the political climate, we will call for a convening of only those countries that want to ensure the security and stability of Iraq."

Though Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia have long been accused of aiding militants in Iraq, and the country's Shiite revival has already sent ripples across other Arab nations, most noticeably Lebanon, rulers around the Middle East have been expressing even more concerns about cross-border destabilization. King Abdullah II of Jordan warned late last month, for example, that the Middle East could be shaken by civil wars in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories by early next year.

Representatives from the region have met before to discuss Iraq, most recently in September, when foreign ministers from predominantly Sunni Arab countries converged in Cairo. The conference proposed by Mr. Maliki could take place at a higher level and would presumably be more wide ranging, to possibly include Turkey and Iran. Syria reopened its embassy in Baghdad last month after a hiatus of more than two decades.

One of the first international conferences on Iraq was held in 2004 at the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Sharm el Sheik. The conference was attended by the United Nations and the Arab League, as well as Saudi Arabia, Jordan, the United States, Britain, France, Canada, Japan, Iran and Syria.

American officials said the format of that conference might be a good vehicle for indirect talks with Syria and Iran. Administration officials have been working with the United Nations and the Iraqi government to set up the next meeting of the conference, which is sometimes called the Iraq Compact Group and other times called the International Compact on Iraq.

The parties had planned to meet this week in Saudi Arabia, but postponed those plans when Mr. Maliki asked for more time to reach out to Iraq's neighbors, according to senior Bush administration officials.

The question is whether the administration can make the next, yet-unscheduled meeting of the conference substitute for the direct talks with Iran and Syria that many politicians are calling for. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her deputies have been pointing recently to the forum begun in 2004 as a sign that America and Iran have a channel available to talk whenever they want.

"We already have a transparent process we can use to talk to Iran," Mr. McCormack said. "You know, we have this international forum."

General Caldwell's discussion at a news conference of the handover of military authority to the Iraqis next year dovetailed with the other main recommendation expected from the Iraq Study Group's report on Wednesday — that the Americans should steadily reduce the number of combat units in Iraq while increasing the size and number of American training teams embedded with Iraqi units.

Senior American commanders in Iraq say that they doubt that many of the Iraqi units will be capable of fighting the Sunni-led insurgency on their own, even after the Iraqi government gets full operational command of the military, but they say that the influx of advisers should strengthen the Iraqi forces. The Iraqis would then be able to take over most of the fighting by the end of 2007, the commanders say.

The immense security challenge facing the Iraqi and American forces was highlighted Tuesday by a series of particularly brutal attacks across Baghdad that resulted in at least 54 Iraqis killed and scores wounded.

In the deadliest assault, gunmen set off a bomb to stop a bus carrying workers for a government organization that maintains Shiite mosques, then opened fire on the passengers, killing at least 15 people and wounding nine, an Interior Ministry official said. In the Bayaa neighborhood, a triple car bombing near a gas station killed at least 14 people and wounded 25, a hospital official said.

The American military said Tuesday that a soldier had been killed and four were wounded by a guerrilla ambush in northeastern Baghdad on Monday, and that a soldier was killed and another wounded by a roadside bomb in Diyala Province on Monday.

In pushing for a regional conference, Mr. Maliki appeared to be showing more flexibility in looking for solutions to the violence than either Mr. Talabani, the Iraqi president, or Mr. Hakim, the head of the main Shiite political bloc and a rival of Mr. Maliki's.

Over the weekend, Mr. Talabani and Mr. Hakim had reacted with disdain to Mr. Annan's suggestion of an international conference on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0102966

Mr. Hakim has very close ties to Iran, ruled by Shiite Persians, and has chafed at the prospect that Sunni Arab countries in the region could get more involved in Iraq. Like many Kurds, Mr. Talabani fears interference in Iraqi affairs by Turkey, which has threatened to invade the autonomous region of Iraqi Kurdistan if the Kurds try to move toward independence or take control of the oil city of Kirkuk.

Mr. Maliki is a conservative Shiite, but is believed to be less closely allied to Iran than Mr. Hakim.

The different positions staked out by the two Shiite politicians suggested that the White House might not have an easy time getting Mr. Hakim to lend full political support to Mr. Maliki, if that had been one of President Bush's goals in inviting Mr. Hakim to the White House.

In a classified memo written last month, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, suggested that the Americans could build a new political base for Mr. Maliki by urging Sunni Arab leaders and Shiite politicians, especially Mr. Hakim, to back Mr. Maliki. That would then in theory allow Mr. Maliki to break with Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric who is Mr. Maliki's main political backer.

For months, American officials have been urging Mr. Maliki to crack down on Mr. Sadr's formidable militia, the Mahdi Army, which has been responsible for waves of reprisal killings of Sunni Arabs. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Maliki Seeks Regional Meeting On Iraq Security (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 5 -- Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki called Tuesday for a regional conference on stabilizing his country but rejected a proposal from U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan that it take place outside Iraq.

"After preparing the proper political atmosphere, we will call for holding a conference in which all those countries that are interested in the security and stability of Iraq will participate," Maliki said in a televised speech in Baghdad.

He said he would send envoys to neighboring countries, which he did not name. He also did not explain what a proper political atmosphere would be. An aide close to Maliki said the prime minister wants the conference to take place in Iraq under the Iraqi government's terms.

In an earlier statement e-mailed to reporters, Maliki rebuked Annan for suggesting that Iraq was not the right venue. "We consider his invitation to hold an international conference about Iraq as just another way to confiscate the will of Iraqis and their achievements that established democracy, a national unity government and the elected Parliament," he said in the statement.

Under pressure from the Bush administration to rein in violence, Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, said Iraqi leaders would meet in mid-December to reconcile feuding factions and "strengthen the Iraqi national unity."

His comments came a day before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is set to release a report in Washington recommending ways to reduce the U.S. military presence in Iraq and end sectarian violence. The report is expected to include a recommendation that Iraq and the United States engage in talks with Iran and Syria, which border Iraq. Iraq recently resumed diplomatic relations with Syria after more than two decades of severed ties.

But the Bush administration has long-standing concerns about what officials believe to be Iran's support for Shiite militias and Syria's failure to stop foreign fighters from joining the Iraqi insurgency. High-ranking Iraqi leaders also have reservations about involving the two neighbors.

"What are other countries going to do?" Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish Coalition member of Iraq's parliament, asked after Maliki's speech. "The problem is between Iraqis now."

Late Tuesday, Maliki released a statement urging university professors and students to ignore "the desperate attempts" of a Sunni insurgent group to keep them from class. The group had sent e-mails to students and posted signs at schools and mosques saying students should stay away while it cleanses the campuses of Shiite death squads.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said at a Baghdad news conference that the military expects the country to be under complete control of Iraqi forces by the middle of 2007, which he called "the year of transition."

"We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring, early summer," he said, echoing a timetable discussed by Bush and Maliki at their meeting last week in Jordan.

Nasar al-Rubaie, who leads the parliamentary bloc of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, said Tuesday that he had collected signatures from 115 of the 275 members of parliament calling on the government to draft a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces. The bloc suspended its participation in the government last week. The number of signatures could not be independently verified.

Dozens of civilians died in various shootings and car bombings across the country Tuesday.

The U.S. military reported that 14 Iraqi members of the "Society of Shia" were killed and four wounded when small-arms fire hit the bus carrying them in the Adhamiyah section of northern Baghdad Tuesday morning. A car bomb exploded after they died, a military statement said. Then a BMW was driven into the area and exploded as the injured were being taken to a hospital. The bomb caused no further injuries, the military said.

Three car bombs exploded near a fuel station, killing 16 people and wounding 25, in the southwestern Bayaa district of Baghdad, according to the Associated Press.

In central Baqubah, gunmen raided a house, killing two residents and wounding a third before setting the house on fire, according to an official with the Diyala Joint Coordination Center.

The U.S. military announced that three more soldiers died Monday. A soldier from the 1st Cavalry Division died from wounds suffered from an explosion near his vehicle in Diyala province. A second soldier was wounded in the blast. One soldier died when his vehicle rolled over north of Camp Anaconda in north-central Iraq. Another soldier was killed and five were wounded when insurgents attacked them as they were enforcing curfew restrictions in a northeastern neighborhood of Baghdad.

Baghdad Wants Control Of Talks With Neighbours (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, December 6, 2006

Baghdad has been trying to take ownership of regional policy ahead of the Iraq Study Group report, fearing that changes in US policy will undermine the elected government.

Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister, said on Tuesday he was sending envoys to neighbouring countries to improve security co-operation and that he would call for a regional conference.

Iraqi leaders have underlined in recent days their opposition to any proposal for an international conference and warned that they, rather than the US, should lead any direct engagement with Syria and Iran.

Direct US talks with Syria and Iran as part of a broader regional initiative is said to be among the policies that will be advocated today by the bipartisan group co-led by James Baker, the former US secretary of state.

While another core proposal may be a gradual redeployment of US combat troops, the Iraqi government has sought to focus the military debate on the need to accelerate the training and equipping of Iraqi forces and on giving greater authority to Baghdad to command and control military operations.

“We have our own views,” Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq’s foreign minister, told the Financial Times. “We have concerns about an international conference because we’re past that stage.”

Iraq “should involve the neighbours instead of the US,” he added. “The elected Iraqi government should take the lead and hold neighbours to account.”

Both the Shia coalition that dominates government and the minority Kurds worry that broader regional involvement will bring new demands on how power should be shared in Iraq.

Sunni Arab states, which would have to be brought into any discussion, for example, are urging a larger political role for Iraq’s Sunni community.

“We the Iraqis are not ready to allow neighbours to dictate the form of political system we have and how we should act,” said Mr Zebari.

Iraqi officials fear that direct US engagement with Syria and Iran could embolden the two neighbours and enhance their regional standing, without necessarily bringing an end to their alleged support for violent sectarian groups.

To underline that the government should be the only party engaging with neighbours Mr Zebari recently invited Walid al-Muallem, his Syrian counterpart, to Baghdad, while Jalal Talabani, the president, held talks in Tehran.

Mr Zebari said he was pushing for a February gathering in Baghdad of foreign ministers from neighbouring countries. Such meetings take place periodically but diplomats say that they have proved no more than a talking shop.

Although much work still needs to be done with neighbours, said Mr Zebari, the dramatic escalation in sectarian violence in recent months has alarmed the whole region. “Everyone is starting to understand that what’s going on has reached a certain level that it could be out of everybody’s control and could spill over,” said Mr Zebari.

Al-Maliki To Call For Regional Meeting (AP)

Iraq's prime minister reversed course Tuesday and said his envoys will talk with Iraq's neighbors about the possibility of a regional conference on quelling the violence here, despite opposition to the plan by some key political allies.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki made the announcement as more than 100 people were killed or found dead in and around Baghdad, underscoring the urgency of finding a solution to the bloodshed.

The U.S. military said three more American troops had died Monday — two as a result of insurgent attacks and one in a traffic accident.

Despite a string of ambushes, mortar attacks and bombings Tuesday, the chief U.S. military spokesman told reporters that all of Iraq would be under Baghdad's control by the fall of 2007, with U.S. soldiers and Marines and other coalition forces playing a supporting role.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, told reporters that his envoys would talk with other governments in the region, most of them Sunni-dominated, about how they might help establish security and stability in Iraq.

"After the political climate is cleared, we will call for the convening of a regional conference in which these countries that are keen on the stability and security of Iraq will participate," al-Maliki said.

The prime minister's statement fell short of an unconditional call for a conference. Previously, Iraqi leaders have resisted suggestions they include outsiders in efforts to settle their bitter internal divisions.

In recent days, President Jalal Talabani and a leading Shiite politician, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, have rejected U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's proposal for a regional peace conference. Annan said such a gathering could be useful if the parties met outside Iraq.

Al-Maliki, though, said any conference should take place in Iraq. Any proposals to emerge, he added, should conform to "what the national unity government wants."

The Bush administration welcomed the announcement. "It's a good idea for the Iraqis to be involved in working with their neighbors on issues of regional security," said White House spokesman Tony Snow.

At al-Maliki's press conference in Baghdad, the Iraqi leader said a frequently delayed national reconciliation conference would convene this month. He also said he planned to reshuffle his six-month-old Cabinet, to increase its "effectiveness and strength," but offered no further details.

Al-Maliki's hedged endorsement of a regional peace conference came one day before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, is to release recommendations on changing U.S. strategy in Iraq.

The group is expected to suggest that Iraq's neighbors, including longtime U.S. adversaries Iran and Syria, be invited to help in the search for an end to the violence. Al-Maliki did not say whether his envoys would visit those countries.

Al-Maliki was careful not to commit himself unequivocally to a regional conference, perhaps due to opposition to the proposal among his allies.

But the prime minister may feel he cannot reject such a call outright. Instead, his conditions appeared aimed at limiting the scope of the conference, raising the possibility it may not take place soon.

Arab countries like Egypt generally favor such a conference, in part because they increasingly fear the rise of Shiite power in Iraq and the possible growing influence of predominantly Shiite Iran.

But Iraq's Shiites, who dominate the government, fear Sunni-dominated countries will pressure Baghdad to make concessions to Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, which launched the insurgency against the U.S.-led coalition three years ago.

At any regional peace conference, both Iran and Syria would most likely try to increase their influence in Iraq.

The U.S. maintains about 140,000 troops in Iraq and is considering changing its strategic course in the country.

Robert Gates, the White House choice to be the next defense secretary, conceded during his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq. If the country is not stabilized in the next year or two, he warned, it could lead to a "regional conflagration."

He later said he believes the U.S. is neither winning nor losing, "at this point."

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell told reporters that efforts to transfer security responsibility to the Iraqi military were moving forward. He predicted the entire country would be under the control of Iraqi police and military by the fall of next year.

"We would expect to see the entire country having reached provincial Iraqi control by early fall of next year," Caldwell said. "We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring, early summer."

The planned transfer of authority, he said, was part of an accelerated timetable discussed by President Bush and al-Maliki last week in Jordan.

Meanwhile, violence persisted unabated.

Suspected Sunni extremists killed 15 Shiite government workers in an attack on their minibus in Baghdad, the government said. Gunmen halted the vehicle and executed several passengers, who were on their way to work at the Shiite Endowment, a government ministry that acts as caretaker for Shiite mosques.

Fifteen other people were killed near a gasoline station when two car bombs exploded in the capital, police said. And at least 15 died in shootings, bombings and a mortar attack in and around Baghdad. Four bodies were pulled from the Tigris River south of the capital.

Police discovered the tortured bodies of 60 people who had been bound, blindfolded, then shot and left in Baghdad over the past 24 hours, Lt. Mohammed Khayoun said.

An American soldier was killed Monday when attackers fired on a U.S. patrol in northeastern Baghdad, the U.S. command said. Also Monday, a soldier died of wounds suffered in a blast in Diyala province and another soldier died in a traffic accident.

The deaths raised to at least 2,905 the number of members of the U.S. military who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Looking To Themselves For Solutions (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — While Washington waits attentively for the release today of a report calling for new approaches to the Iraq war, leaders in Baghdad have pressed ahead with their own initiatives, some of which differ sharply from Bush administration thinking.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki reaffirmed Tuesday his intention to work with Iran and Syria to stem support for Shiite Muslim militias and Sunni Arab insurgents, an idea likely to be part of today's recommendations from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.).

President Bush has been reluctant to approach either Iran or Syria for assistance.

Other Iraqi proposals dovetail with Bush administration priorities and the U.S. panel's expected recommendations. Maliki's Shiite-led government has pressed for the accelerated training of Iraqi armed forces to quicken the transfer of security responsibilities. And the prime minister has promised to put more effective leaders in his Cabinet, reconcile with Sunnis and dismantle militia death squads blamed for nightly killings.

Few Iraqi politicians have put much stock in the deliberations of the Iraq Study Group or other reviews taking place in Washington.

Most appear preoccupied with gaining the upper hand for a particular sect or ethnicity in the byzantine negotiations that will shape Maliki's promised Cabinet reshuffle. Others say they will reject any Washington proposals on principle.

"We are now under occupation; whatever the occupation produces is considered illegitimate," said Fatah Sheik, an ally of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose followers have repeatedly fought U.S. forces and account for one of the two largest Shiite factions in parliament.

There is also scant evidence that Iraq's fractured government will set aside its internal differences long enough to implement any of its proposed initiatives.

Maliki's decision Tuesday to send envoys to Iraq's neighbors to pave the way for a regional conference has the potential to further polarize the debate.

While his government courts Iran and Syria, representatives of the disaffected Sunni minority that dominated Iraq under former leader Saddam Hussein have made overtures to Sunni governments in Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt.

Kurdish leaders, for their part, worry that such moves will lead to more foreign interference by hostile neighbors. They prefer to look within Iraq for solutions.

Maliki has made reconciliation with Sunnis leading Iraq's deadly insurgency a central tenet of his administration, promising more meetings aimed at drawing opponents into the political process.

But the prime minister has not specified with whom he plans to negotiate. Not anyone who has killed Iraqis, his government said, and not anyone who has killed Americans.

"Well, if it is an armed resistance, they have to kill somebody," said Wamidh Nadhmi, a Baghdad political analyst.

Many promises have been made, including a softening of the de-Baathification policy that forced thousands of Hussein-era functionaries out of jobs and the disarming of Shiite militias that have targeted Sunnis. But there has been little movement on these initiatives.

DOJ_NMG_0102970

The few Sunni politicians who agreed to participate in Maliki's unity government say they are under increasing pressure to pull out.

Maliki, frustrated by accusations that he isn't doing enough to stop the bloodshed, has pressed hard in recent weeks for a quick U.S. transfer of security control to Iraqi forces.

"Our hands are in cuffs," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a politician with the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Sadr movement's main Shiite rival.

"We can't do anything unless we have the permission" of U.S.-led forces.

Given a free hand, Maliki said, he could rein in the violence in six months.

Maliki's proposal is similar to those in Washington that call for rolling back U.S. combat units and ramping up training by assigning more American advisors to Iraqi units. But with only three out of 10 Iraqi army divisions under direct Iraqi control, there is a long way to go.

Other factions disagree about the capabilities of Iraqi security forces and their allegiance to the government. Shiite militiamen and Sunni insurgents have infiltrated Iraq's army and police, using them as cover to hunt and kill their rivals.

"The government is very weak, and therefore it is not feasible that it should have full control of security," said Sunni lawmaker Adnan Dulaimi, an opponent of the U.S. occupation who nonetheless recently called American troops for help when his house was attacked. "That the Interior Ministry and the Defense Ministry are divided along sectarian lines [one run by a Shiite, the other a Sunni] is the best evidence that the government is not ready."

Deep differences of opinion extend to Maliki's governing coalition. Iraq's two largest Shiite factions, each backed by a private army implicated in the nationwide violence, disagree on a timetable for U.S. troop withdrawals.

Sadr's representatives want U.S. forces out immediately. The cleric's movement protested last week's meeting between Maliki and Bush by suspending its participation in the government.

"Four years after the Americans occupied Iraq there is no excuse to stay here," said Nassar Rubaie, the leader of Sadr's legislative representatives.

"If the Americans leave Iraq today, Iraq will be secure tomorrow."

But most other Shiites acknowledge that Iraq's fledgling forces still need U.S. support and agree with American Democrats on a phased troop withdrawal.

"We need the United States to be with the Iraqi government as a partner, not a commander," Taqi said.

Shiites are also divided on proposals to split Iraq into semiautonomous regions based on sect and ethnicity.

Abdelaziz Hakim, whose Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq has a strong hold on local government in southern Iraq, is pushing for a vote on greater regional authority.

Sadr loyalists oppose weakening the central government.

Such divergent stances on solutions to the war, coupled with an embryonic Iraqi government that has failed to provide basic services or hold parliamentary meetings on a regular basis, threaten to derail any initiatives, whether they come from Washington or Baghdad.

Sunni politician Iyad Samarrai said the government suffered from two major deficiencies: the inability to reach consensus and the inability to carry out policies.

"Many Cabinet ministers are inexperienced and incapable of fulfilling their responsibilities," Samarrai said.

Maliki's plan to replace ineffective Cabinet members with technocrats has broad support — in principle — among the politicians ensconced in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone. But negotiations have featured the same jostling for influence that paralyzed previous attempts at reform. And there doesn't appear to be a sense of urgency for results.

"You have this government hidden in the Green Zone protected by Americans and isolated from people, and the streets are left to the terrorists," said Kurdish legislator Mahmoud Othman. "The citizens don't feel they have a government there to protect them."

A Role For Syria (WP)

By Kenneth H. Bacon

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

James Baker has never met Alia Al-Naradi, but they both have an interest in seeing the United States engage Syria on Iraq. For Baker, engagement is about stabilizing Iraq to allow the United States to exit gracefully. For Alia, it's about survival.

Alia is an Iraqi refugee who fled to Syria, a country that has absorbed more than 750,000 Iraqis since the beginning of the war. Syria's resources are now stretched thin, and without international help, it may not be able to accept vulnerable Iraqis much longer. Working with Syria through the United Nations to help Iraqi refugees could provide a humanitarian first step for greater engagement.

DOJ_NMG_0102971

My organization, Refugees International, met Alia in Damascus shortly after she and her family fled to Syria in June. Shiite-dominated police had imprisoned her Sunni husband; roving militias fought in her ethnically mixed Baghdad neighborhood; gangs had been holding her nephew hostage for a week. Others waiting with her at the border crossing at Al Tanf said they fled after being kidnapped, tortured or raped, or having seen family members killed.

Syria is the last country in the Middle East to leave its borders open to Iraqi refugees. The United Nations estimates that 1.8 million Iraqis have sought refuge in the region, and Syria and Jordan host the largest concentration.

It can't maintain its open-door policy without international support. Refugees already strain social services. Yet, the international response to the Iraqi refugee crisis has been dismal. Despite numbers that rival the displacement in Darfur, there has been scant media attention and even less political concern. The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees is doing little.

An increase in resources for UNHCR could make a huge difference. As winter approaches, the need is growing for portable heaters, warm clothing and help in paying electric bills and warm clothing. Mental health services for traumatized Iraqis are equally needed. And legal and financial help to maintain their visa status would prevent deportations back to a precarious life in Iraq.

Working through the United Nations or directly, the United States has an opportunity to engage with Damascus to mitigate the suffering of Iraqi refugees and the growing burden on Syria. This would advance both Alia's interests and Washington's.

The writer is president of Refugees International.

The Price Of Iran's Help (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

DUBAI -- On the eve of the Baker-Hamilton commission's report, a top Iranian official set a tough condition for his country's help in stabilizing Iraq, saying that Tehran isn't interested in such cooperation unless the Bush administration sets a timetable for withdrawing its troops.

Ali Larijani, Iran's national security adviser, said in an interview that a U.S. plan for removing "occupation forces" from Iraq would be considered "a sign of a change in strategy." In that case, he said, "Iran would definitely extend the hand of assistance and would use its influence to help solve the problem."

The Iranian official made his comments after a speech yesterday to a conference here called the Arab Strategy Forum. His remarks were the clearest statement I've heard of how Iran views its role in the region following what he described as the failure of U.S. intervention in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. His tone was triumphalist: In his view, America is bogged down in Iraq and "in dire need of change," while a newly confident Iran is positioning itself as a dominant power for the region.

"When we face a strategic stalemate, we can break it only by changing the strategy itself," Larijani said in his speech. He explained that America's choice was to stick with a failing strategy of unilateralism, tinker with it to "retard the process" of defeat, or replace it altogether with a new strategy of "interdependence" that recognized Iran's primacy as a regional power. By embracing a new strategy, he said, the United States "would bring psychological calm to the region and help America to behave in a more rational way."

When I asked Larijani later at a news conference what Iran would regard as evidence that the Bush administration was indeed changing its strategy, he said, "The clearest sign would be the exit or evacuation of U.S. forces," adding: "Should there be a timetable presented, that would serve as a positive sign."

On the nuclear issue, Larijani said that a U.N. Security Council sanctions resolution reportedly drafted this week by Russia and France would not stop Iran's uranium-enrichment efforts. "I announce: This is not effective," he said.

After these public comments, Larijani talked one-on-one about the changes he thinks have been set in motion by the Republican Party's defeat in last month's congressional elections. He wouldn't talk in detail about the likely recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and ex-representative Lee Hamilton. But he indicated that if the Bush administration embraced a call for gradual withdrawal, Iran would agree to join discussions on Iraq and Afghanistan. Though he called repeatedly for a U.S. withdrawal plan, Larijani didn't explain how the resulting vacuum would be filled in a way that avoided all-out civil war.

Harvard professor Graham Allison, who had a private talk with Larijani following mine, said: "In discussing Iraq after U.S. withdrawal he didn't seem to have a credible idea of what comes next."

As for the idea of a regional peace conference involving Iraq's neighbors, Larijani told me he favored a smaller group of countries that are committed to the "new paradigm" in Iraq flowing from its democratic elections and constitution -- both of which enfranchised Iraq's Shiite majority. "We are against a tribal democracy," he said.

Larijani said President Bush's statement in an interview with me in September, in which Bush recognized Iran's status as an important nation in the region, was "the first sign of having any respect for the long history and cultural background of Iran." But Larijani said the administration needed to accompany such rhetoric with a halt to its "adventurous moves" against Tehran. "The Iranian people might be great and gracious, but not naive," he said.

Larijani isn't proposing a grand bargain but a ruthlessly pragmatic one shaped by Tehran's view of current realities: Iran is up, America is down, and any post-Iraq settlement should reflect those facts. That's the steep price of Tehran's help.

In a column last week, I praised Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel for his prescient early warnings about the risks of U.S. involvement in Iraq. Some readers complained that for all his prescience, Hagel still voted to support the war, and that I was ignoring the many Democrats who were similarly wary of Iraq -- and who voted against war funding. These readers are right. Hagel took political risks expressing his concerns back in 2003, but so did Democrats who voted against the Iraq mission despite a vitriolic barrage from the administration.

Gen: Iraq To Command Own Forces By Spring (AFP)

AFP, December 6, 2006

Iraq's government will have command of its own armed forces by the middle of next year, a US general has said, revealing details of a deal between the US president and the Iraqi prime minister.

US military spokesman Major General William Caldwell said Tuesday Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki and President George W. Bush had agreed on an "accelerated timetable" for Iraq to take charge of its own security.

The announcement came on the eve of a much-anticipated report from a panel of US experts which is expected to recommend that US forces in Iraq do exactly that, in order to disengage American troops from Iraq's bloody conflict.

"We would expect to see the entire country having reached Iraqi provincial control by the fall of next year," Caldwell told reporters in Baghdad.

"We should see the complete transfer of command and control of all Iraqi army divisions by late spring early summer," he added.

"This is all part of the accelerated timetable that was discussed by the prime minister and the president of the United States when they were in Jordan," referring to a meeting in Amman last Thursday.

"I think what you'll find from here is that 2007 is going to be the year of transition. We are going to transition security responsibility to the government of Iraq and their security forces," he said.

Currently only two of Iraq's 18 provinces are under direct Iraqi security control and only two of the country's 10 army divisions answer directly to Maliki rather than to US General George Casey's headquarters.

Caldwell said, however, that increasing numbers of America's 150,000-strong force would be assigned to "transition teams" directly inside Iraqi units to speed their training and coordinate operations with US support units.

These moves are among ideas expected to be recommended by former US secretary of state James Baker's Iraq Study Group on Wednesday, but Caldwell said the revised plan had come from the military itself.

"What's happening back in Washington... we'll take whatever guidance we're given but we're already refining and making adjustments here based on General Casey's guidance," he said.

"The mission of our forces here is to set the conditions to allow the Iraqi security forces to be successful in providing security for Iraq so that Iraqis can determine the future of Iraq," he added.

What Would Happen If The U.S. Left Iraq? (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 6, 2006

Bush predicts a surge in terrorism and others see regional civil war as the greatest risk.

WASHINGTON — With Americans leaning consistently in favor of disengagement from Iraq, President Bush has warned that a precipitate withdrawal would create a terrorism superstate in the Middle East that is rich with oil cash and determined to topple moderate governments around it.

But to many U.S. lawmakers, regional experts and Middle East leaders, the chief risk is not a more menacing version of Taliban-dominated Afghanistan, but a Lebanese-style civil war that could result in the deaths of thousands more Iraqis and expand the conflict by drawing in neighboring states.

The sharply differing views color the growing debate over the consequences of withdrawal as incoming Democratic congressional leaders demand a troop drawdown and Bush opens the door to new approaches. A majority of Americans favor at least a partial withdrawal, but the administration also is considering a temporary troop increase as part of an effort to step up training of Iraqi forces.

A study panel chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.) will offer recommendations today for gradual troop withdrawals. Its final report is expected to reject a quick withdrawal, but key members have signaled that the U.S. commitment eventually should come to an end.

Bush has warned repeatedly of what he sees as the dangers of a swift exit.

"If we do not defeat the terrorists and extremists in Iraq, they will gain access to vast oil reserves and use Iraq as a base to overthrow moderate governments across the broader Middle East," he said Oct. 25 at a White House news conference.

Terrorists "will launch new attacks on America from this safe haven," Bush said, and "will pursue their goal of a radical Islamic empire that stretches from Spain to Indonesia."

But many others believe the increased risk of terrorism would be confined to limited portions of Iraq.

Some experts argue that many Iraqis, including some Sunni Arabs, as well as Shiites and Kurds, already are unhappy with foreign terrorists and would try to drive them out.

John McLaughlin, former acting CIA director, said there was less risk of an Al Qaeda-like terrorist group taking control of the entire country than of a "civil war in which you have the disintegration of the country and a widening set of tensions and potential conflicts throughout the Middle East."

In such circumstances, "Al Qaeda could gain a foothold in some piece of territory," said McLaughlin, now at the Philip Merrill Center for Strategic Studies at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who favors an increase in U.S. troops, agreed that the greatest risk is not an Al Qaeda takeover but a "wider regional war around ethnic and religious differences."

But even if Iraq wasn't taken over by terrorists, he said, a U.S. withdrawal would hearten Islamic militants and strengthen them in their fight against moderate states in the region.

Neighboring countries may initially choose a side and support it with money and weapons. Sunni-led states, perhaps Syria and Saudi Arabia, could come to the aid of Sunni groups, while Iran might help the Shiite south, said Stephen Biddle, a military affairs specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations.

But if it appears that their allies are about to lose, the states might feel pressure to increase their commitment, and might escalate the conflict by sending in their own troops, he said.

"I see a lot of warfare going on here before anyone can form a stable state out of Iraq," Biddle said. "We're more likely to get a regional version of Lebanon, and chaos, than the quick formation of a new order under a party we don't like."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), one of the Democrats' point men on Iraq, sees progressive fragmentation along sectarian lines in Iraq. But he argues that a reduction in U.S. forces would not worsen the trend, "because those dynamics are going on regardless of our presence."

Even in a drawdown, Reed said, the U.S. could train and support Iraqis, and could continue to go after Islamic militants in such places as Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province.

Syrian President Bashar Assad, among other Middle Eastern leaders, has said that the growing sectarian pressures in Iraq are likely to draw in other countries.

"Almost all countries have breaking points, and when the ethnic-religious break occurs in one country, it will not fail to occur elsewhere too," Assad recently told the German magazine Der Spiegel. "Large wars, small wars — no one will be able to get a grip on the consequences."

Like Bush, some U.S. military commanders fear an outburst of terrorism after a withdrawal.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, predicted in Senate testimony this fall that the Sunni Arab areas of central and western Iraq would not be viable as an independent state and would turn into a lawless haven for groups such as Al Qaeda.

But other analysts believe Sunnis would have little tolerance.

"We know they're already rather sick of the foreign terrorists, and could boot them out," said Wayne White, a former State Department intelligence official. "In the worst case, there would be only pockets of terrorists in the Sunni areas."

A U.S. withdrawal also would affect the growing regional influence of Iran, but there is little agreement on what a pullout would mean for Tehran.

Some, such as Graham, believe that "Iran would be the biggest winner" of a U.S. exit because it would gain strong influence over Iraq's Shiite south and an increased ability to dominate others in its region.

DOJ_NMG_0102974

But others believe that though the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq has greatly increased Iran's regional influence, a withdrawal would be a setback, forcing it to become a caretaker of disorderly southern Iraq and threatening to embroil Tehran in a costly regional civil war.

"The American presence has greatly facilitated an expansion of Iranian influence, and they would probably prefer to have us stay and continue to bear the burdens," said James Dobbins, a veteran diplomat who was a senior envoy for the Bush administration and is now director of Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy Center.

Indeed, some analysts believe that a withdrawal could benefit the United States by breaking up the alliance between Iran and Syria. That could happen, they say, should Syria side with the Sunni west as Iran comes to the aid of the Shiite south.

A civil war could reduce Iraq's oil output and increase world prices, but most experts doubt that Iraqi reserves would be used as a weapon against the U.S., even if Iraq comes under the influence of Iran.

"They're going to need the money," said Peter Khalil, an analyst at Eurasia Group, a risk-advisory consulting firm, and a former advisor to the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq. "They're not going to want to shoot themselves in the foot."

Why We Persevere (WP)

By William Caldwell IV

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- I don't see a civil war in Iraq. I don't see a constituency for civil war. The vast majority of the people want hope for their families, not to massacre their neighbors or divide their country. A poll conducted in June by the International Republican Institute, a nonpartisan group that promotes democracy, found 89 percent of Iraqis supporting a unity government representing all sects and ethnic communities. No wonder no "rebel army" steps forward to claim credit for vicious car bombs and cowardly executions of civilians.

I see debates among Iraqis -- often angry and sometimes divisive -- but arguments characteristic of political discourse, not political breakdown. The Council of Representatives meets here in Baghdad as the sole legitimate sovereign representative of the people, 12 million of whom braved bombs and threats last December to vote. No party has seceded or claimed independent territory.

I see a representative government exercising control over the sole legitimate armed authority in Iraq, the Iraqi Security Force. After decades in which the armed services were tools of oppression, Iraq is taking time to build an army and national police force loyal to all. There have been setbacks, but also great successes. In Fallujah, a city almost lost two years ago, I have seen the cooperation between the local army commander, a Shiite, and the police chief, a Sunni.

I don't see terrorist and criminal elements mounting campaigns for territory. Al-Qaeda in Iraq doesn't use roadside bombs, suicidal mass murderers and rocket barrages to gain and hold ground. Extremist Shiite death squads don't shoot people in the back of the head to further their control of the government. I do see random executions seeking to instill fear and insecurity. I don't see a struggle between armies and aligned political parties competing to rule.

I studied civil wars at West Point and at the Army Command and Staff College. I respect the credentials and opinions of those who want to hang that label here. But I respectfully -- and strongly -- disagree. I see the Iraqi people suffering from overlapping terrorist campaigns by extremist groups combined with the mass criminality that too often accompanies the sudden toppling of a dictatorship. This poses a different military challenge than does a civil war.

As the Iraqi people labor to build a country based on human rights and respect for all citizens, they are moving from the law of the gun to the rule of law. Violence will increase before life gets better. Those who know that freedom and democracy offer more hope than anarchy will not give up.

Regardless of what academics and pundits decide to label this conflict, hundreds of thousands of brave Iraqi soldiers, police officers and civil servants will continue to go to work building a free, prosperous and united Iraq. And every day more than 137,000 U.S. servicemen and servicewomen will lace up their boots, strap on their body armor and drive ahead with our mission to support these courageous Iraqis.

Knowing When To Let Go (WP)

By Mark Moyar

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

In moving to swiftly transfer security responsibilities to the Iraqi government, the Bush administration appears to be heeding lessons learned during America's closest historical precedent, the Vietnam War. In Vietnam, the United States found that indigenous troops were inherently better suited to local security tasks than Americans. Because they spoke the language, had relatives and friends in their operational areas and belonged to the same ethnic groups, they were better able to get information from civilians. They knew where the enemy was likely to hide, and could identify him by noticing subtle distinctions that escaped American troops.

During the Vietnamization period, from 1969 to 1972, the reduction of U.S. involvement in security operations galvanized the South Vietnamese forces to become more proficient. Moreover, the Saigon government's handling of sectarian unrest showed that the Vietnamese knew better than the Americans how to solve their own political problems. Recent comments from the Bush administration indicate that America will spend less time telling the Iraqis how to solve their political problems.

Restoring order will require numerous decisions based on perceptions of the beliefs, loyalties and alliances of particular Iraqis. No American is likely to perceive these things as accurately as an astute Iraqi. If Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is to be an effective national leader, we must let him use his own judgment.

During Vietnamization, the United States installed more advisers with South Vietnamese forces, just as we are now planning to do with Iraqi forces. American advisers helped in South Vietnam, but we have exaggerated the importance of their role. By far the most important factor in South Vietnamese units was the quality of their own leaders, and the same has generally been true in other countries with authoritarian traditions like Iraq's. As in Vietnam, U.S. advisers should seek to persuade Iraqi authorities to replace bad commanders.

But in any war, the ultimate objective is political, not military, and thus military competence must, in the end, be subordinated to attainment of the desired political goal. South Vietnam's premier had to engage in a delicate balancing act to keep enough competent officers in power while also keeping enough loyalists to prevent fractious military officers from starting a rebellion. The national leader in Iraq must likewise figure out how to employ some good commanders while also selecting some simply for the purpose of co-opting various factions.

Critics of Vietnamization point to the ultimate defeat of South Vietnam. But in fact the South Vietnamese largely pacified their country by 1971, and defeated a massive conventional North Vietnamese invasion in 1972 without the help of U.S. ground forces. They ultimately lost because the United States withdrew support while the North Vietnamese enjoyed enough superpower support to mount an even larger offensive in 1975.

Iraq's security forces are not going to experience anything resembling the 1975 offensive; they need only end the low-intensity fighting among Iraqis. But this task will require great political skill on the part of Iraq's prime minister. We will find out very soon whether he possesses it.

Fallujah's City Council Battles To Hold Its Ground (CSM)

By Scott Peterson, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, December 6, 2006

Despite threats from insurgents, Iraqi leaders meet weekly to address the concerns of citizens.

FALLUJAH, IRAQ

His voice cracking with emotion and anger, the mayor of Fallujah lashes out at his city council: Insurgent violence is growing, he tells them, and they're not trying to stem the tide.

"You haven't done anything," says Jassim Bedawi. "When Sheikh Kamal and Sheikh Hamza got killed, what had you citizens done to prevent their deaths?"

Mayor Bedawi is a rare phenomenon: an Iraqi still willing to participate in a democratic institution once seen as central to the rebuilding of Iraq. No other city council operates in the insurgent-riddled Anbar Province. But the embattled Bedawi - whose family, like those of other members, is under threat of kidnapping or worse - continues to forge ahead in one of the most stressful jobs the city has to offer. No debates over parking or playground equipment occupy his agenda. Issues of life and death occupy him and a number of city councilors who meet every Tuesday - as well as the question of whether they will survive a US pullback from the city. The Marine presence is reviled by many here, even though many recognize its importance to maintain some level of protection and even reconstruction.

"The people of Fallujah are not standing with me," the mayor complains, saying that without such support, asking for help from the central government could "get my head cut off, or a member of my family kidnapped."

"Citizens can't just come here and make requests," says Bedawi. "They must also give support."

Two years after US marines invaded Fallujah to force out insurgents who had made the city off limits to US forces, militants are filtering back into the city, despite only six entry points, which are heavily guarded. Since August, they have waged a campaign of intimidation that has left two key councilmen and the deputy chief of police chief murdered, and a trail of threats against those who persist.

DOJ_NMG_0102976

The previous mayor fled to Syria earlier this year, after a dispute with the Ministry of Defense in Baghdad over his plans to raise a local Sunni militia.

On this day in late November, the meeting begins with three men who complain about shootings by US Marines - one of them fatal - of their sons and a nephew. They demand prosecution of the "snipers" involved, and their removal.

The council also discusses compensation by the military for occupation of certain properties; they had previously dismissed 300 false claims by residents. They talk of the need for US forces to "get close to the people" and how the US election is likely to change their lives. They ponder who will guard the phone exchange after repairs by US forces.

"I'm in awe.... Against all odds, they continue to meet," says Col. Lawrence Nicholson, the Marine regimental combat team commander who attends every meeting. "I don't know how resilient we [Americans] would be, if [insurgents] came to our door and said: 'We will kill your family.' "

"Witness No. 1," a man called Khalid with a bandaged wrist and his arm in a sling, tells how his teenage son Hamidi was shot by a Marine "sniper" on Oct. 30 from Observation Post Fenton, a tall house with three lookout positions on the main east-west artery. The son died a week later; Khalid was wounded, and a neighbor boy who came to assist him was also shot.

The family home is near OP Fenton. Marines there, officers say, believed that Hamidi was armed with a grenade.

"No matter how much compensation, it will not be worth a dime when I go to my son's funeral," Khalid told the council and the officers present. "I want the sniper to be prosecuted, according to the law."

A third witness speaks of a shooting of his nephew from the "sniper's building" on Nov. 19. He asks that the position be moved, "because the sniper does not differentiate between terrorists and civilians."

Colonel Nicholson - a stickler on abuse, say marines under his command - stands, promising a full investigation and "my word that we will clean up this situation."

"What we have heard is ... a tragic event for all of us who call Fallujah home," says Nicholson, reminding them that he has investigated "every allegation" in his 10 months in Iraq.

"In many cases, we have pulled marines who do not act properly out of the city," Nicholson says. "I have sent marines back to the US, because they did not deserve to be able to serve here. They had betrayed my trust; I lost confidence in them."

"I must point out that this sniper position is where it is to save all lives," he says, noting that three Marines had been shot at by Iraqi snipers in the previous 48 hours.

"While I will not tolerate a Marine shooting an innocent, I think we all have to understand ... the number of IEDs [roadside bombs] that are planted in this city every day ... kill police, Iraqi Army and marines, and wound them," says Nicholson. "I could spend every meeting parading 30 victims in here."

The shooting illustrates the difficulty of policing a Sunni city where insurgent attacks have spiked, and the population - according to uncertain military estimates - has jumped by some 80,000 to about 350,000 from before the invasion of late 2004, which destroyed much of the city.

Marine officers note that, in the 45 days prior to the shooting incident, marines had reported a half-dozen incidents of teenagers or children throwing grenades at US forces. "This is the tough thing that is Fallujah," says Lt. Col. Harold Van Opdorp, a commander from Stafford, Va., of the 1/24 Marines battaltion, with units in the city. An initial investigation concluded that the shooter believed the teen was throwing a grenade, though it was not clear if such a weapon was located.

The marines have seen a "significant increase in the level of violence" directed at them in Fallujah in the last four months, says Colonel Van Opdorp.

That dynamic adds a degree of combustibility on the streets as the Marine presence shrinks. There are now fewer than 300 marines who work in Fallujah, and half of those are not based inside the city limits. Most are likely to be pulled back in the next few months.

The mayor notes that the area around OP Fenton is relatively safe, and that there should be communication between the sniper and residents. "If a sniper actually sees someone place an IED, yes, please shoot them," says Bedawi. "Look at this sniper incident, which has set a bad example for all the citizens of Fallujah of the marines."

Clouding all the proceedings are the pall of numerous threats, and the awareness that, outside this fortified meeting place, these men and one woman are top targets for insurgents. The mayor relates threats aimed at his wife, sent by cellphone, and warnings against his family. At one point, he lowers his head into his arms in despair. Later, while discussing the theft of city and business property, he laments how little good citizenship seems to be taught by the 76 mosques here.

But Fallujah is buffeted as much as any city in Iraq by forces beyond local control. The US State Department official for Fallujah, Kael Weston, stands up to describe the consequences of the shift of congressional power far away in Washington.

The mood in America about Iraq is that "people are anxious," Mr. Weston tells the council. "It pains them as much as it pains you, to see the kidnapping in Baghdad, and see the killing that's going on. But Americans are not the most patient people in the world [and] are looking for changes.

"So until I leave and the marines leave, we will make small steps [of progress], and that is probably the most lasting contribution we can make," says Weston.

"We've made many mistakes, and I've not pretended otherwise. And unlike most Americans, I've lived through 3-1/2 years of those mistakes," adds Weston. "I think it would also be unfair to indict the American government, because we did not have a perfect crystal ball."

Still, he says, the future "will be determined more by you and less by us. And that's not necessarily because we wanted it that way, but that's the reality we face."

"This is escaping from the reality," protests "Engineer Khalid," a councilman.

"If Iraq fails, America fails - I've said that before," replies Weston. "And we don't like to fail."

The meeting shifts to talk of school opening days, and the US colonel asks who will protect the telephone-exchange boxes.

"Americans will guard it," suggests the mayor, helpfully.

"We're supposed to be going home!" replies an exasperated Nicholson. "Americans guarding this is a step backward, not a step forward."

The next issue: The recent killing of one British and three Iraqi security contractors, while trying to deliver crucial medical equipment to a local clinic.

"The simple, ordinary people thought that the Ministry of Interior [which is Shiite controlled, and widely blamed for operating death squads against Sunnis in Baghdad] sent three trucks of medicine, most of it expired and poisoned," explains Engineer Khalid. "We support you, [but] this was something taken advantage of by the other side, to aggravate the people."

The question for Fallujans is whether such an atrocity will be more likely, or less, after Americans withdraw.

Bedawi voices concern for the day when Fallujah is handed back fully to Iraqis. When asked how capable the council will be then, he pulls a reporter aside.

"We don't want the Americans to leave until the Iraqi Army and Iraqi Police are rebuilt and well armed, and they kill a lot of people from Al Qaeda, and dismantle militias, and kill extremists," he says. "After that, the Americans can leave."

"I think we are capable enough, to do our work without the help of any side," says secretary Abbas Ali Hussein with a well-practiced optimism after the meeting. "No one in our city council is intimidated."

"Rebuilding now is going on very well; people are appreciating what is going on," says Mr. Hussein, adding that vigilante groups are being formed to go after militants. "There is a wakening in the city toward us, and ideological disgust of Al Qaeda.

"People have begun to realize their interests, [and that militants] are pushed by foreign hands, just to kill the will of the people toward welfare and prosperity," he continues. "Everybody who works for the sake of his people and his country - he will be secured first by God."

At Least 5 Marines Are Expected To Be Charged In Haditha Deaths (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — At least five marines are expected to be charged, possibly as early as Wednesday, with the killing of 24 Iraqis, many of them unarmed women and children, in the village of Haditha in November 2005, according to a Marine official and a lawyer involved in the case.

The charges are expected to range from negligent homicide to murder, said a senior Pentagon official familiar with the military's nearly nine-month investigation into the episode. Several marines from the Third Platoon of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment, are accused of killing the villagers after a roadside explosion killed one of their comrades.

Charges could also be brought against an additional one or two marines, the Marine official said, including one officer who was in the vicinity of the killings but did not participate in them.

Though it was nearly certain that marines would be charged with crimes for the killings, exactly when the charges would be made official was unclear, military officials and defense lawyers involved in the case said. But they said charges could closely follow a closed-door briefing by Lt. Gen. Richard F. Natonski, the Marine Corps deputy commandant for plans, policies and operations, to the House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday morning.

That briefing will relate the findings of a military inquiry into how the Marine Corps managed its investigation of the slayings, which began with an inquiry in March, four months after the killings occurred, the Pentagon official said. Aides to committee members said that Marine officials promised a confidential briefing before any charges were announced.

According to the Marine official and the defense lawyer representing one of the marines under investigation, criminal charges will be filed against Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn., the squad's leader; Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla.; Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 21, of Carbondale, Penn.; Cpl. Sanick Dela Cruz, 24, of Chicago; and Cpl. Hector Salinas, 22, of Houston.

DOJ_NMG_0102978

The 5 marines are said to have been the ones who killed the 24 Iraqis, including 5 men in a taxi that approached the marines' convoy after the explosion that killed a 20-year-old lance corporal, and 19 other civilians in several houses nearby. About 10 of the dead were women and children who appeared to have been killed by rifle fire at close range, military officials said.

The marines have said they believed that they were coming under small-arms fire from a house on the south side of the road.

Jack Zimmermann, a lawyer for Lance Corporal Tatum, said his client had responded appropriately to a lethal attack in a dangerous region of Iraq. "There was no crime committed," Mr. Zimmermann said.

Mark Zaid, a lawyer representing Sergeant Wuterich, said his client acted in accordance with military rules of engagement.

"We emphatically deny that Staff Sergeant Wuterich participated in any unlawful killings that day in Haditha," Mr. Zaid said. "The collateral civilian deaths were absolutely tragic, but occurred as a result of legally justified actions that routinely occur during time of war."

Lawyers for the other three enlisted marines declined to comment.

The senior Pentagon official said that no other marines would face charges in the case. "The only people who will be charged with an offense will be those individuals who did the shootings," the official said last week.

But the Marine officer, interviewed on Tuesday, said that he expected charges to be brought against one or two additional marines, including one officer.

"I don't see just five of them being charged," the official said. "I see six or seven. One of them, I see, is an officer."

That officer, the Marine official said, was First Lt. William T. Kallop, 25, the only officer at the scene, who arrived sometime after the initial explosion that led to the marines' sweep of the nearby homes.

A lawyer for Lieutenant Kallop declined to comment Tuesday. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Marine Corps Nears Haditha Charges (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, December 6, 2006

Military prosecutors are close to charging some of the Marines involved in the deaths of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last year, the Marine Corps said Tuesday.

It is the first time the Corps has said it will file charges in the deaths, which included unarmed women and children and followed the killing of a Marine by a roadside bomb in the town.

Defense lawyers for some members of Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment have said their clients were following rules of engagement when they returned fire after the bomb went off Nov. 19, 2005.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis has examined the investigations into the killings and has made initial decisions about what action to take, Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said Tuesday in a news release.

Gibson declined to say how many Marines would be charged or what crimes prosecutors would allege.

The Marines initially reported that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed by a makeshift roadside bomb and in crossfire between Marines and insurgent attackers. After media reports surfaced in March that the killings were deliberate, the top Marine commander in Iraq ordered a crimnial investigation.

A parallel investigation examined whether officers in the Marines' chain of command tried to cover up details of the killings. Results of the probes have not been made public.

Gibson said the Marine Corps would brief members of both the Senate and House Armed Services Committees this week on the findings of the investigations.

Washington-based attorney Mark Zaid, who represents squad leader Sgt. Frank Wuterich, said he had not heard if his client was going to be charged.

"We'll be prepared," Zaid said in a telephone interview. "If they file anything we will refute them. Our position remains that the collateral deaths of civilians was a tragedy but all of them were legally justified actions in a time of war."

In a separate case involving Camp Pendleton Marines, an eight-man squad was accused of kidnapping and murdering an Iraqi man in the town of Hamdania. That case is working its way through the military courts.

As War Ravages Baghdad, City's Ambulance Workers Must Pick Up The Pieces (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102979

BAGHDAD — Each time emergency workers return to the Mansour district ambulance station after a run, they jot notes in a dog-eared logbook that doubles as a grim diary of life here in the capital.

Sept. 10, for example: bombing with two dead.

Or Sept. 29: woman shot in the abdomen.

Oct. 10: man with shrapnel wounds.

Ambulance workers have among the clearest views of Baghdad's descent into chaos. As the city has disintegrated around them, they have been left to pick up the pieces. They are often overwhelmed, and have increasingly become targets themselves.

"These three years have been equal to 16 years as a paramedic," said Ali Jasim, 38, before he set off on a convoy carrying medicine and other supplies to Balad, a town north of the capital that was the site of horrific sectarian bloodletting.

Before the collapse of Saddam Hussein's government in 2003, so-called hot calls, for bombings or shootings, were virtually nonexistent for Baghdad's emergency workers. Now most of Baghdad's ambulance calls are hot. A relatively calm 24-hour shift might mean having to wash the blood from their clothes only once, the workers say.

In this war-ravaged city of five million people, only about 90 ambulances and crews are typically available on any given day for emergency calls, said Dr. Hashim Jabbar Muhammad, chief of the Health Ministry's emergency directorate. He said international standards recommended several times that number for a city this size.

The city's emergency dispatch system, the Iraqi equivalent of 911, amounts to a dingy room with 10 phone lines; on a recent visit, three of them were broken. Calls come in at a rate of about one every 10 minutes, although residents often complain that the lines are busy.

Each call requires a cumbersome process of calling back to make sure the call is legitimate.

The ambulance corps here and elsewhere in Iraq feel each spike in violence. When sectarian assassinations surged after the attack on a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, in February, the Baghdad ambulance drivers who pick up dead bodies were swamped.

The capital's maddening traffic, and the fact that most residents ignore sirens, compound the challenges. Ambulance crews are also treated with suspicion by American troops because militants have been known to use ambulances to transport weapons or bombs. The Americans frequently pull over ambulances in the middle of runs to search them.

Emergency workers earn salaries that are often barely enough to live on, as little as $80 a month for new paramedics. Drivers are also held responsible for any damage they incur on their vehicles.

"I wish I could quit," said Muhammad Nerous, 26, who has been a paramedic for six years and works at a station in the Bab Sharji neighborhood. "Every day when I come to work, I pray there will be no explosions because I am fed up with these scenes."

As they rush to bombings now, a secondary blast is often aimed at them. Eleven emergency workers were killed in 2006. Previously, six others had been killed since early 2004, when the department started keeping track.

More than 10 percent of Baghdad's ambulance drivers have resigned in the last three months alone as violence has escalated, said Dr. Muhammad of the Health Ministry.

On a typical call last month, a crew from the center in Mansour, a troubled western Baghdad neighborhood, transported a woman who had just gone into labor to the hospital. But after dropping her off, a firefight broke out nearby, and the crew was stuck in the cross-fire.

Upon their return, the workers scrawled a new notation in the logbook: "We could have been killed for this assignment. But God's protection was available."

It was apparently unavailable several months ago when gunmen killed an ambulance driver from Mansour en route to the dangerous southern neighborhood of Dora. As the ambulance was stopped in traffic, two men appeared and sprayed the vehicle with bullets. The driver, Akram Muhammad Sahih, 34, a married father of two, was killed.

"I pretended I was dead," said Ali Jabbar Hatin, 34, who was sitting next to Mr. Sahih in the ambulance. He escaped injury but the other paramedic in the vehicle was wounded.

Arkan Ali Hussein, 40, a veteran paramedic who works out of the Mansour center, has an unusual system for keeping in touch with his worried wife throughout his 24-hour shift. She calls his cellphone and hangs up, avoiding a charge. When he calls back and then hangs up, she knows he is alive, he said. The pair exchange missed calls at least a dozen times a day.

But he is reluctant to share with her the horror he sees. Two months ago, a man wearing a suicide belt detonated himself at an army recruiting center in western Baghdad. Mr. Hussein was among the first to arrive.

"There were pieces of flesh everywhere," he said. "People were yelling and screaming."

The first man he treated was badly burned, riddled with shrapnel. He shoved a tube into the man's mouth to establish an airway, then rushed him to the hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0102980

When he returned, he spotted a severed leg lying on the ground but could not find the body it belonged to, so he left it, moving on to another victim. The gruesome injuries that he sees nowadays, he said, are much worse than anything he witnessed as a medic in the military during the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s.

"Back then, there was a bullet in the body or a blast from a mine." he said, "Now we're finding flesh everywhere, heads, legs and hands."

Most of the paramedics have only minimal training. As a result, Dr. Muhammad said, their main strategy, rather than treating patients in the field, is to "scoop and run."

Often, however, there is little they can do. Bilal Mehdi, 26; his brother, Hilmi, 23; and their father, Mehdi Hussain Lazim, 54, are part of a small contingent of emergency workers who only pick up the dead.

Earlier this year, they helped deliver 800 bodies to the morgue in one month from a single sewage treatment station in the mixed eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Rustamiya. Bilal Mehdi said he took 300 bodies himself. Militia members had been dumping bodies into the sewers nearby, and they would wind up at the station. Mr. Mehdi had to clamber down by rope to retrieve the putrid remains.

More recently, he said, he delivered a dozen bodies stacked in his ambulance in one trip from Mahmudiya, south of the capital; some of them decapitated, some without legs. He drove back with his head out the window, because the smell was so overpowering.

As the body count in Baghdad continues to mount, Mr. Mehdi says he wishes he could leave his job. But without any other job prospects, he is stuck for now. He knows it is only a matter of time until his next call. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Iraqi Firefighters Bear The Heat Of Terrorists' Tactics (WT)

By James Palmer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- One of Iraq's most perilous jobs has become even more dangerous.

The terrorists who daily spread mayhem in the capital increasingly have adopted the tactic of following a suicide bombing with one or two secondary blasts, timed to detonate a few minutes later when a crowd has formed.

And that is bad news for the city's 3,500 firefighters, whose job demands that they rush to the scene of every explosion to douse the flames and assist the injured.

"This is part of our job now," said Nazar Khani Mousa, 32, who was working a bomb scene in central Baghdad last summer when two more explosions knocked him unconscious. His back, right hand and forearm were burned badly, while shrapnel pierced his forehead. He was unable to walk for three months.

Today, he's back at work at the Karrada firehouse in the Al-Resafah district on the east bank of the Tigris River, risking his life for the equivalent of less than $90 a week.

This year alone, at least 30 Baghdad firemen have died in the line of duty and another 55 have been wounded, according to the Interior Ministry, which oversees Iraq's fire departments.

Others have been kidnapped by criminal groups or militiamen; still others find themselves in the crossfire of insurgent groups, U.S. and Iraqi security forces, and warring militias.

Most say they are motivated to carry on by a sense of duty and a need to support their families at a time when other jobs are hard to find.

"The people still count on us to do our work. If we don't put out the fires, who will?" asked Mahdi Muhsin, a 31-year-old veteran firefighter who has been on the job since he was a teenager.

Mr. Mousa, for his part, explained that he is the sole provider for his wife and his three daughters, who range in age from 1 month to 7 years. "This is only job I've ever worked," he said.

If Baghdad's firefighters are undeterred by the risks they face, that does not mean they are casual about security.

At the Karrada firehouse, guards peer from sandbagged machine-gun nests high above the row of red trucks in the garage below. Others patrol the front gate while, inside, most carry holstered sidearms.

"We're always prepared for an attack," said Laith Al-Sabbah, a 45-year-old colonel who has 21 years on the job. "The militias control the streets now."

Col. Al-Sabbah and the other firefighters say their biggest problem on calls is trying to figure out who is who. Many of the militias have acquired police or Interior Ministry uniforms, so the firefighters seldom know whether uniformed "officials" are there to help them or hurt them.

DOJ_NMG_0102981

In August, men in police uniforms kidnapped and killed three firefighters from the Al-Shaab station in north Baghdad. And on Nov. 6, assailants in police uniforms snatched eight firefighters from the Sheik Omar station in north Baghdad during a government-imposed daylight curfew. So far, three men have been found dead; the other five are still missing.

Just getting to the scene of a fire or explosion is also a challenge.

Mahdi Muhsin, 31, a firetruck driver, said it normally takes at least 20 minutes to get to an emergency scene because of traffic congestion, closed roads and security cordons. That compares to an average response time of eight minutes for American fire departments, according to the U.S. Fire Administration.

"Sometimes when there is an attack we can't reach our destination because the military won't let us pass," said Mr. Muhsin, a 15-year veteran of the department.

The steady monthly salaries -- $350 for rookies and $600 for seasoned officers -- are keeping the department staffed, but many long for another way of life.

Col. Al-Sabbah, who oversees all 20 firehouses in the Al-Resafah district, told a reporter he had sent his wife and two sons to Syria and said he was thinking of moving there, too.

Then his phone rang. A colleague reported that Lt. Col. Ali Mustafa Hable, the director of fire training in Baghdad, had been missing for more than 24 hours.

Col. Al-Sabbah hung up the phone and looked at his visitor. He didn't have to say much. The call had clearly pushed him one step closer to joining his family.

Body Counts Only Serve To Fill Agendas (USAT)

By Jon C. Bowersox

USA Today, December 6, 2006

The United States may not be able to stop the bloodshed in Iraq, but it can halt the war over body counts. The latest salvo was fired recently by The Lancet, a leading British medical journal. The editors took a shot at the Bush administration's claims that democracy and reconstruction are succeeding in Iraq by publishing a research study claiming that the U.S.-led invasion has caused more than 600,000 "excess" civilian deaths since 2003.

Never mind that editors failed to disclose that The Lancet had taken an anti-war stand on Iraq even before 2003, or that the study used dubious methods to come up with a number many times higher than any reported before. The Lancet's number drew widespread disagreement even with the British anti-war group Iraq Body Count, which expressed "skepticism." The Iraq Body Count estimates that more than 55,000 civilians could have been killed during the war.

Ever since the Vietnam War, civilian and enemy body counts have ranged from educated guesses to pure fiction — tragic statistics twisted to serve the agendas of whoever is spinning the numbers.

As I grew up during the Vietnam War listening to the daily tally of body counts on the evening news, I saw how they served no value other than to catalyze national opposition to the war. Thus, I was heartened when Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said at the start of the Iraq war that "we don't do (civilian) body counts."

But when I arrived in Iraq as the senior consultant for reconstructing the health sector in 2005, I was surprised to see that our intelligence briefings by the U.S. Army included civilian body counts. After the Samarra mosque bombing in February, our military became obsessed with obtaining daily body counts from the Iraqi government as a way of attempting to disprove reports that sectarian violence was out of control.

Why are we so obsessed with body counts? Regardless of the true numbers, the one thing we can say with any moral certainty about excess civilian deaths is that the numbers are too high. Then we should focus on how to help Iraqis get their health system up to the level of being able to reduce the body count by saving lives.

One visit to the Baghdad morgue is all it takes to see that Iraq has a major collateral damage problem. You see it by just walking amidst the hundreds of decomposing corpses scattered about a building that rarely had more than 30 cases at a time in the past. You also see it as families watch a TV screen trying to identify missing relatives from a never-ending loop of postmortem photographs. In fact, you can taste the permeating stench for days.

All it takes is one visit to a Baghdad hospital, where Iraqis injured in the day's bombings lie in pools of blood waiting to be treated by doctors who are working without the resources needed for even basic casualty care. Many potential survivors die because the health system lacks the medical staff, medicines and equipment needed to save them.

The U.S. government has already spent 90% of its $800 million investment in health-sector reconstruction on building projects that haven't been completed — and wouldn't help the Iraqis even if they are. Not only did we not anticipate the level of excess collateral damage, we did not budget enough money to handle the flood of blood.

The international donor community has delivered less than 25% of what was pledged in 2003. In fact, the World Bank has been unable to renovate 12 badly needed Iraqi emergency centers because of the security situation.

DOJ_NMG_0102982

During my time in Iraq, I learned that there are thousands of Iraqi doctors who have chosen to risk their lives to care for their people. They need essential medicines, supplies and a safe working environment. What they don't need is the mockery of the daily body count thrown in their faces. What they need — and we owe them — is a daily survivor count.

Analysts: Bin Laden Alive But Hamstrung (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

U.S. intelligence agencies think al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri are alive and still plotting attacks, even though both have eluded a massive manhunt for more than five years since the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Bin Laden's few appearances and statements in recent months, and two recent bombing attacks in Pakistan aimed at killing al-Zawahri prompted recent intelligence reports that both may be dead.

But so far there has been no success in locating and catching either extremist leader through his movements or communications, or from intelligence agents on the ground. Both remain powerful symbols for Islamist extremists around the world and the target of scores to hundreds of covert special-operations commandos, regular troops and CIA paramilitary officers.

Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates said yesterday he plans to review the tactics being used by forces taking part in the five-year hunt for bin Laden, although he noted that bin Laden has become more a symbol to terrorists and less an active planner and organizer of attacks.

"While it's important to continue the search for Osama bin Laden, I think that his ability to directly organize and plan the kind of attacks against us that hurt us so badly in September of 2001 is very limited now," Mr. Gates said. "And I think that it's important to keep him on the run."

The challenge in chasing al Qaeda leaders is "figuring out where they're going to be, not where they've been, and getting the information in a way that is timely enough to act on it," Mr. Gates said.

"With that kind of intelligence lacking," he said, "the way we'll catch bin Laden eventually, in my view, is that just as in the case of Saddam Hussein, one of his own people will turn him in."

"I think just as he is not organizing things any longer, but remains a powerful symbol, I think being able to capture or kill him would have a powerful symbolic impact also," Mr. Gates told the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Last week, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte was asked why bin Laden has eluded the manhunt. He said he would not provide "a long exegesis" explaining the failure so far.

"Obviously, we're not going to give up on our efforts to track him down," Mr. Negroponte said after a speech at Harvard University.

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told WTOP radio last week that both bin Laden and al-Zawahri are "still alive" and "and working to hurt the people and values of the United States."

Intelligence officials said bin Laden and al-Zawahri are hiding in separate locations somewhere in the extremely rugged and mountainous border region separating Pakistan and Afghanistan. Scores to several hundred regular and special-operations troops and CIA officers are working in several task forces to locate both bin Laden and his deputy, al-Zawahri, along the 1,200-mile border.

The State Department, for its part, is supporting programs in Afghanistan and Pakistan to develop the ungoverned border region as part of a "drain-the-swamp" anti-terrorism campaign.

John Gastright, deputy assistant secretary of state for South Asia, said the United States is supporting a Pakistani plan to spend $750 million over five years to develop the border region so it won't support terrorists.

Several billion dollars in U.S. and international funds also were spent in Afghanistan as well, including the border region. "The reality is that over time [al Qaeda] won't find a home there" once the area is developed, he said.

Dennis Pluchinsky, a former State Department counterterrorism analyst, said bin Laden's low profile is likely the result of poor health or because he is hiding in an ultra-secret location that is too risky to conduct videotaping.

"The last possibility leads to the intriguing question of whether it is more secure to make many movements, or to stay in one place for a lengthy period of time," he said. "The more you move, the more opportunities for someone to see you move. The longer you stay in one place, the greater the possibility that the enemy may find you, especially in sector searches."

Gen. Hayden told the Senate Armed Services Committee in congressional testimony on Nov. 15 that killing or capturing bin Laden and al-Zawahri will not end the al Qaeda threat, but "probably would contribute to the unraveling of the central al Qaeda organization."

DOJ_NMG_0102983

Al Qaeda's "physical safe haven in the Afghanistan-Pakistan border area," Gen. Hayden said, gives the terrorists "the physical -- and psychological -- space needed to meet, train, expand its networks and prepare new attacks."

From Ruins Of Afghan Buddhas, A History Grows (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

BAMIYAN, Afghanistan — The empty niches that once held Bamiyan's colossal Buddhas now gape in the rock face — a silent cry at the terrible destruction wrought on this fabled valley and its 1,500-year-old treasures, once the largest standing Buddha statues in the world.

It was in March 2001, when the Taliban and their sponsors in Al Qaeda were at the zenith of their power in Afghanistan, that militiamen, acting on an edict to take down the "gods of the infidels," laid explosives at the base and the shoulders of the two Buddhas and blew them to pieces. To the outraged outside world, the act encapsulated the horrors of the Islamic fundamentalist government. Even Genghis Khan, who laid waste to this valley's towns and population in the 13th century, had left the Buddhas standing.

Five years after the Taliban were ousted from power, Bamiyan's Buddhist relics are once again the focus of debate: Is it possible to restore the great Buddhas? And, if so, can the extraordinary investment that would be required be justified in a country crippled by poverty and a continued Taliban insurgency in the south and that is, after all, overwhelmingly Muslim?

This valley about 140 miles northwest of Kabul, where in the sixth century tens of thousands of pilgrims flocked to worship at its temples and monasteries and meditate in its rock caves, is attracting new international attention.

In 2003, the United Nations designated the Bamiyan ruins a World Heritage site, but also listed them as endangered, because of their fragile condition, vulnerability to looters and pressures from a post-Taliban boom in construction and tourism. Intensive efforts have been under way to stabilize what remains of the cliff sculptures and murals.

Meanwhile, archaeologists have been taking advantage of the greatly increased access that became possible once the statues were gone to make new discoveries — and to pursue ancient tales of a third giant Buddha, possibly buried between the two that were destroyed.

"The history of Bamiyan is beginning to be revealed, in a concrete sense, for the first time through both works of conservation and excavations of archaeological remains," said Kasaku Maeda, a Japanese historian who has studied Bamiyan for more than 40 years.

Unesco has been overseeing a program of emergency repairs to the niches over the last few years, drawing teams of archaeologists and conservationists from all over the world. "The site is in danger," said Masanori Nagaoka, a cultural program specialist at Unesco's Kabul office.

Gedeone Tonoli, a tunnel engineer from Italy, has been overseeing the most urgent task: securing the cracking cliff face. One morning two Italian mountain climbers swung on ropes at the top of the niche that held the eastern Buddha, which, at an astounding 125 feet tall, was the smaller of the two. Wire netting covered the back wall of the niche, which still occasionally rattles with falling rocks and stones. A great scar marks the inner left wall where the explosion tore away the side of the niche, threatening the whole cliff.

The right side of the niche, however, has been stable for two years, anchored with steel rods and tons of concrete pumped into the fissures. Tiny glass slides are taped to the rock, and sensors linked to a computer keep track of every tremble in the cliff face. Before, Mr. Tonoli said, "you could see the sky here and birds were flying in."

At the base of what, at 180 feet, had been the larger Buddha, workers were still shoveling away at rubble left from the explosions. German restorers from the International Council on Monuments and Sites have spent two years carefully sorting through the debris from both Buddhas, lifting out the largest sections by crane — some weigh 70, even 90 tons — and placing them under cover, because the soft stone disintegrates in rain or snow. The smaller fragments and mounds of dust are carefully piled up at the side.

Reports that the Taliban had taken away 40 truckloads of the stone from the statues to sell were not true, said Edmund Melzl, a restorer. "From the volume we think we have everything," he said. Yet only 60 percent of that volume is stone, he added. The rest crumbled to dust in the explosions.

A continuing paradox is that the destruction of the Buddhas has in a way aided archaeologists in their investigations. For example, carbon dating of fragments of the plaster surface of the Buddhas was able to pinpoint the construction of the smaller one to 507, and the larger one to 554. Previous estimates had varied over 200 years.

The Buddhas were only roughly carved in the rock, which was then covered in a mud plaster mixed with straw and horsehair molded to depict the folds of their robes and then painted in bright colors. Workers have recovered nearly 3,000 pieces of the surface plaster, some with traces of paint, as well as the wooden pegs and rope that were laid across the bodies to hold the plaster to the statue. The dryness of Afghanistan's climate and the depth of the niches helped protect the statues and preserve the wood and rope.

The larger Buddha was painted carmine red and the smaller one was multicolored, Mr. Melzl said.

The most exciting find, he added, was a reliquary containing three clay beads, a leaf, clay seals and parts of a Buddhist text written on bark. The reliquary is thought to have been placed on the chest of the larger Buddha and plastered over at the time of construction.

The fragments have been carefully stored while the main task continues: to gather all the rubble so that the Afghan government and experts can decide what to do with it. There have been calls to rebuild the Buddhas, mostly from Afghans who feel that restored statues would provide a greater tourist attraction, and a righting of wrongs. Unesco has warned that for Bamiyan to retain its status as a World Heritage site there must be no new building, only preservation. Yet the alternative of displaying 200 tons of recovered material in a museum does not seem feasible, said Michael Petzet, president of the International Council on Monuments and Sites.

The one restoration approach considered acceptable by Unesco and other experts is anastylosis, often used for Greek and Roman temples, in which the original pieces are reassembled and held together with a minimum of new material. Michael Urbat, a geologist from the University of Cologne, has analyzed pieces of the larger Buddha and from the rock strata has been able to work out what part of the vast statue they came from.

But reassembling pieces that can weigh up to 90 tons would be extremely difficult; Afghanistan does not even have a crane strong enough to hoist them, Mr. Melzl said. The reconstruction project, which the governor of Bamiyan Province has estimated would cost $50 million, would probably also become a political issue in this impoverished Muslim country, where more than 10 percent of the population remains in need of food aid.

Nevertheless, the provincial governor, Habiba Sarabi, favors rebuilding the Buddhas using anastylosis, and said she would propose that the central government make a formal request to Unesco. Professor Maeda said he supports the idea of reassembling one of the Buddhas and leaving the other destroyed as a testament to the crime.

The government also approved the proposal of the Japanese artist Hiro Yamagata to mount a $64 million sound-and-laser show starting in 2009 that would project Buddha images at Bamiyan, powered by hundreds of windmills that would also supply electricity to surrounding residents.

Meanwhile, simply preserving what remains is daunting. Once the niches, grottos and caves were covered with murals, but 80 percent were obliterated by the Taliban, Professor Maeda said. Art thieves also did damage, using ropes to climb into caves 100 feet up on the cliff face and hacking away priceless medallions depicting seated Buddhas. One of them made its way to Tokyo, where an art dealer, suspecting its illicit provenance, showed it to Professor Maeda, who has managed to retrieve more than 40 stolen artifacts.

"One day I hope we will return them to Afghanistan," he said.

He continues to scour the caves, and finds small joys amid the destruction. One cave that he first discovered during his first trip here, in 1964, so blackened by soot from camp fires that the Taliban and looters passed it by, has revealed fine paintings of tiny animals — a lion and a wild boar, a monkey, an ox and a griffin — rare in Buddhist art, but characteristic of Bamiyan, which combines Indian, Iranian and Gandharan influences.

While the focus now is on conservation, experts know there is more to discover. At least two teams of archaeologists are engaged in a discreet race to discover a third colossal Buddha that may have once lain between the two standing Buddhas.

The Chinese monk Xuan Zang visited Bamiyan in 632 and described not only the two big standing Buddhas, but also a temple some distance from the royal palace that housed a reclining Buddha about 1,000 feet long. Most experts believe it lay above ground and was long ago destroyed.

But two archaeologists, Zemaryalai Tarzi of Afghanistan and Kazuya Yamauchi of Japan, are busy digging in the hope of finding its foundations. Mr. Tarzi, who excavated a Buddhist monastery this year, may have also found the wall of the royal citadel that could lead the way to the third Buddha. He plans to return next year to continue digging.

DOJ:

Nominee For U.S. Attorney Is In Limbo (MINNST)

By Randy Furst, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 6, 2006

The Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on Rachel Paulose's nomination for U.S. attorney in Minnesota.

Nine months after Rachel Paulose was named acting U.S. attorney for Minnesota, and four months after she was formally nominated for the job by President Bush, her appointment is slipping further into doubt.

The U.S. Senate is expected to adjourn this week without acting on the nomination. That would mean that Bush, if he wishes, must resubmit her name to the next Senate, with a new Democratic majority.

"I am disappointed the Senate will adjourn this year without taking up Rachel Paulose's nomination," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said in a statement Monday to the Star Tribune. "Ms. Paulose has shown herself to be an extremely competent and capable professional." He said he expects her to be renominated, "and I hope we will have the opportunity to confirm her nomination in a timely manner."

If approved to permanently succeed Tom Heffelfinger, Paulose, 33, would become the state's first female U.S. attorney and the youngest current U.S. attorney.

Her nomination stalled when the GOP-led Senate Judiciary Committee failed to take it up. In an apparent oversight, Paulose and her supporters did not solicit the support of both home-state senators. Without that, the committee typically does not act on a nominee.

Coleman supported her nomination, but Sen. Mark Dayton, D-Minn., took no position, saying it's his practice to meet with any nominee before the choice moves to the Judiciary Committee. However, Dayton said, Paulose never sought a meeting.

"I assumed that their silence meant lack of interest in moving the nomination forward" this term, Dayton said two weeks ago.

Meeting sought this week

Told of Dayton's comments Tuesday, the Justice Department scrambled to clear up the matter, saying it was unaware that Dayton wanted a meeting. "Now that we are aware, we have reached out to the senator's office to set up a meeting while she is here in Washington this week," said Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman.

Roehrkasse added that even if Dayton is no longer senator when the matter comes before the judiciary committee, Paulose was still paying Dayton the courtesy of meeting with him.

Dayton spokeswoman Chani Wiggins said the Justice Department's contact with his office Tuesday was "the first time we heard from them" about Paulose. Wiggins said Dayton's office will try to schedule a meeting for today.

All fall, Paulose continued to have the backing of the Bush administration.

"Rachel is a rare combination of exceptional intelligence, common sense and high moral character," Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty said in a statement to the Star Tribune last month.

Choice was a surprise

Paulose's choice as interim U.S. attorney came as something of a surprise last winter. When Tom Heffelfinger announced in February his resignation as U.S. attorney, Joan Hume was his first assistant. Traditionally, Hume would have become interim U.S. attorney until the Senate approved a successor. But the White House bypassed her and named Paulose to the interim post.

At the time, Paulose was senior counsel to McNulty in Washington, D.C. She had been an assistant U.S. attorney in Minnesota from 1999 to 2002.

Besides Paulose, Coleman offered the White House at least one other candidate for the permanent post: Clayton Robinson, assistant director of the prosecution division for the Ramsey County Attorney's Office.

Paulose keeps low profile

While the U.S. attorney is considered to be among the state's most prominent federal appointees, Paulose has kept a low profile. In her nine months, she has declined interviews with the Star Tribune and other media. Jeanne Cooney, a spokeswoman in the U.S. attorney's office, said Paulose was unavailable to the media on "any subject relative to this office because she hasn't been confirmed." She said Paulose is following Justice Department policy.

There is a slight chance Paulose would be given a recess appointment later this month, after Congress goes home. Such an appointment would be good through the end of 2008, a month before Bush's term ends.

If Bush resubmits her nomination next year, she'll face a Democratic-led Senate. Then her fate may well rest with Minnesota's newly elected senator, DFLer Amy Klobuchar, the current Hennepin County attorney. Klobuchar has declined to comment on Paulose.

She graduated from Yale Law School in 1997 and has been an attorney for eight years. She served in the civil rights division of the Justice Department for a year, three-plus years as an assistant U.S. attorney in Minneapolis and stints with law firms Williams & Connolly and Dorsey & Whitney, before rejoining the Justice Department. She worked there for two months as a senior counsel to McNulty, the deputy attorney general.

Judge offers support

Another supporter of Paulose is James B. Loken, chief judge of the U.S. Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, which includes Minnesota. Paulose clerked for him in the late 1990s.

"I have enthusiastically recommended her to every employer to hire her ... including to Senator Coleman, before he urged that she be nominated," Loken said.

While with McNulty, she worked on issues of health care, immigration and child pornography, she wrote in a memo for the Senate.

U.S. attorney nominees invariably come from the party in the White House. In 1992, Paulose was a Republican Party vice chair in a state house district covering parts of Eagan, Apple Valley and Burnsville. In 2004, she was a delegate to the state Republican convention and a party lawyer in the state for Bush.

Before her nomination, Paulose was a political unknown, her only press clippings coming as a student member of the University of Minnesota Board of Regents in the early 1990s.

Todd Jones, U.S. attorney before Heffelfinger, hired her in 1998 and calls her a friend, saying she's capable of doing the job: "I think her biggest challenge is going to be developing the credibility at such a young age and breaking the perception that because of her young age she lacks the judgment grounded in experience."

Courthouse A Home Away From Home (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

For a Father, Son and Daughter Who Are Lawyers, Chance to Share in Family Is Just Down the Hall

Each day, chances are good that Bill, Amy and Jon Jeffress will be applying their legal talents just a few doors down the hall from each other in the same stately office building near the U.S. Capitol.

But the father, daughter and son are not racking up billable hours at a white-shoe family firm.

They are reporting for work at the E. Barrett Prettyman Courthouse, Washington's federal court.

On the sixth floor, father William H. Jeffress Jr., 61, one of Washington's most prominent defense attorneys, has been busy with pretrial hearings in a case that has rocked the White House. He represents I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, who is accused of lying to investigators probing the leak of a CIA operative's name.

On the second floor, daughter Amy, 41, has been checking on narcotics cases she oversees for the U.S. Attorney's Office -- including a trial involving a ring that is accused of peddling cocaine and heroin.

And in a magistrate courtroom down the hall, Jonathan, 35, has been representing poor people as a public defender. Last month, he defended a woman accused of creating phony checks and, more recently, a convicted felon charged with carrying a 9mm handgun as he drove through the city.

The family's workdays -- and once in a while, their lunch breaks -- overlap in the court's marble hallways.

"I don't think you can go into the courthouse now and not run into at least one and usually two or three of them," said A.J. Kramer, the federal public defender in Washington and Jon's boss.

"It's really unusual for a family of lawyers to be in the same city, much less the same court," Kramer said. "You've really covered all the bases when you have one on prosecution, one on defense and another doing all kinds of private practice."

It makes for tender moments in a place that can be anything but.

One recent day, Amy, the federal prosecutor, spotted Jon, the public defender, while he was talking in a conference room with a client. The sister in Amy naturally walked over to kiss her brother on the cheek.

"Was that awkward for you?" she later asked him.

Jon smiled and shook his head.

"I like seeing a lot of my dad and sister now," he said, then joked about his junior status in the family's legal lineup. "Plus, some of my clients appreciate that I know some people in high places."

In many ways, the U.S. District Court is a kind of family home.

Their personal stories are intertwined with the court's history. Each learned the power of the law here and can trace career trajectories to work they did in the building. Some of their most profound moments of victory and disappointment unfolded in the oak-paneled courtrooms.

All three are former law clerks who returned to practice here. Bill Jeffress, a partner in the firm of Baker Botts, clerked for Judge Gerhard A. Gesell, who presided over many landmark cases, from Watergate to Iran-contra. In 1971, Jeffress was working in Gesell's chambers when the judge famously ruled that The Washington Post could print the Pentagon Papers, a historical assessment of the Vietnam War that embarrassed the U.S. government.

When Amy was growing up, Gesell was her dad's mentor and "like my second grandfather," she recalled. Two decades later, when she graduated from Yale Law School -- just like her father -- Amy, too, went to clerk for Gesell.

After Gesell's death in 1993, Amy finished her year of clerking with Judge Thomas F. Hogan, now chief judge of the court. Jon followed in Amy's footsteps, clerking for Hogan seven years later.

Jon spent several years as an associate for the Williams & Connolly law firm but decided after consulting with Hogan and Kramer that he would work for the Office of the Federal Public Defender. He said it was a natural fit because as a clerk, "I always found myself rooting for the defense."

Bill, who now typically charges more than $600 an hour, has a reputation as a go-to lawyer for white-collar defendants. He represented President Richard M. Nixon in a case blocking public access to Watergate tape recordings and has won acquittals for such clients as former Tyson Foods executive Archibald R. Schaffer III and former Louisiana governor Edwin W. Edwards (D).

Although their job choices are different, there definitely is a certain Jeffress way about them.

The three share the same Democratic Party leanings. Bill and his wife have long been active in the party. Amy worked in the Justice Department during the Clinton administration with her future husband. And Jon was an advance worker for Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

They are all just a little taller than 5 feet -- not by much. They share a self-deprecating manner that the kids attribute to their dad. Amy's more likely to talk about her two sons than the fact that this fall she won the Attorney General's John Marshall Award for excellence in trial work and was on a list of candidates suggested to the White House for D.C. Superior Court judgeships.

In a short break together in the court cafeteria, Bill patted his kids on the back for work that makes the city better. He said he has no pretensions about his job.

"As a defense lawyer, you've got to be kidding yourself if you think you're making the world a better place," the father said.

Amy retorted: "Oh Dad, what you do makes the world better."

"Well," Bill said, "it's very important to at least one person."

The family is close, although not everyone is a lawyer. Mother Judy was a longtime social worker for Adoption Service Information Agency, but Amy joked that she's "pretty much a full-time grandmother and dog walker now." Brother Jeff went to business school so he "could make some real money," Jon deadpanned. But the youngest brother also has artistic skills. Jon remembered when they made a big splash in a Louisiana courtroom where their father was in a trial.

"My brother did this amazing sketch of the entire courtroom scene," Jon recalled. "The only problem was that it showed the judge sleeping during trial, with all of these ZZZZZs coming up and all. But my dad showed it to the judge anyhow -- and the judge thought it was hilarious."

They don't talk about their cases except in general ways, and they make a concerted effort not to be the lawyers opposite each other.

One could say there' s a fourth lawyer in the group: Amy's husband, Casey Cooper. He met Bill before he met Amy. He was an impressive associate at Bill's law firm, which was then Miller Cassidy Larroca & Lewin. Then-Deputy Attorney General Jamie S. Gorelick, a former Miller Cassidy lawyer and friend of Bill's, hired Casey and Amy to work at the Justice Department.

The younger two lawyers got to know each other while working in offices across the hall at Main Justice. Now Casey works with Bill at Baker Botts, sometimes sharing cases.

"Dad never interfered with my love life," Amy insisted. Then she added: "I think Dad would have loved to have me or Jon, or Jeff for that matter, work with him. So it's really nice for him to have Casey there."

The children have appreciated their father's counsel through life. Amy most remembers him saying a lawyer has to know the facts of a case "inside and out." Jon said his father helped him by explaining that the law was about "reasoning your way to the correct rule."

But Jon couldn't resist a parting joke: "Dad prepared for the bar in, like, two days while in the middle of working on the Pentagon Papers case for Judge Gesell, so I tried not to follow his example on that one."

D.C. Prosecution: A Ménage À Trois (HILL)

By Arthur Delaney

The Hill, December 6, 2006

In two of this year's most pungent national crime stories — the Duke University rape scandal and the JonBenet Ramsey confession scandal — the next biggest stars, after the DNA, are the DAs. This question often comes up: Will the people vote the district attorney out of office as a result of his or her antics in the case?

To somebody who grew up in Washington, D.C., this perfectly normal question is perfectly foreign. We don't get to elect a district attorney. We don't even have a district attorney's office, another of the many quaint differences between the U.S. and its capital city, where only second-class citizens live.

DOJ_NMG_0102988

In July, D.C.'s nonvoting congressional delegate, Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), introduced legislation that would create a D.C. district attorney's office.

"No other citizens in the United States are treated so unfairly on this issue of such major importance. My bill would make the DA accountable to the people who elect him or her as elsewhere in the country," Norton is quoted in a July 13 statement released by her office.

Norton's District of Columbia District Attorney Establishment Act of 2006 is going nowhere in the Government Reform Committee. Norton's office had the following comment on the bill's bleak prospects:

"Unfortunately, there was no chance of getting the bill to the floor through the Republican Congress this year. In addition, this DA bill requires an affirmative decision from the mayor and the City Council that they are prepared to take on the additional $50 million annual cost. The third impediment would be opposition by the Justice Department and the administration."

So the local U.S. attorney's office, the largest such office in the country, will continue to be responsible for prosecuting both federal crimes and local crimes committed by adults in the District.

But wait! There's a third horse in this race: The D.C. attorney general's office. Mayor-elect Adrian Fenty and his nominee for attorney general, Linda Singer, have expressed interest in the attorney general's office taking some of our federal prosecutors' local criminal caseload.

All they've got so far, though, is an embarrassing bitch-slap from a federal judge: "How could there even be a thought that they could take that on? The D.C. attorney general's office is not adequately or properly handling the cases it has now," said U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth, according to a Nov. 18 Washington Post story. Lamberth was miffed over the office's apparent mishandling of a case against the D.C. police.

Former D.C. U.S. Attorney Roscoe Howard is also a bit skeptical of D.C.'s ability to take on the U.S. attorney office's work: "I know everybody wants home rule … but I'm not sure that fiscally they're ready for it. I don't think they understand how expensive it is," he says. "More power to 'em, I guess."

Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney Jeffrey Taylor, in his capacity as D.C.'s unelected district attorney, has the totally unique ability to try local thugs either in federal or local court. For our hometown criminals, this is a matter of life or death — even though you won't find the "ultimate penalty" in the D.C. Code and voters rejected a congressionally imposed referendum on execution in 1992, federal prosecutors still can seek it against D.C. criminals if their offenses meet the right criteria.

A federal judge recently ruled that the murder and racketeering charges against Larry Gooch qualify him for a capital trial, set to begin in January. It's a fat chance that a D.C. jury will send any man to die, but if it happens — well, score one for the Feds, I suppose.

Democracy, thy name is public-access television

Every Tuesday at 9 p.m., watch the wildest show on television: "Hear the Real Right Side" on DCTV, starring D.C.'s own James Caviness, a man who proclaims himself "the lone voice of common sense in the District of Columbia" and his show "the most politically incorrect commentary show in the universe."

You'll see a bespectacled Caviness standing at a podium, blasting the "despicable disgrace" of affirmative action and "phony liberals" like Eleanor Holmes Norton. Patriotic music is playing in the background, and Caviness is wearing an American-flag tie. It's just the kind of stuff you would never, ever expect from a black 60-year-old cab driver who lives east of the river.

Caviness is joined by a cast of regular callers, who sometimes sound a little drunk and who often jibe him for his far-right views: "I saw you rakin' leaves on the White House lawn!"

One man who called in on Nov. 28 just seemed baffled: "I ain't never seen a man like white people like you do! I got 10 people in here and we listenin' to this. I'm done!" he exclaimed and then hung up, just like he'd done during the previous show. Caviness was impervious to the ad-homonym, trudging ahead with his tirade against the phony liberal establishment.

How did this man get this way? The obvious answer, at first, is insanity. But Caviness explains his politics with an anecdote from his sophomore year of high school in Florida. He needed glasses so badly that he had moved to the front of the classroom just to be able to read the board. But his parents wouldn't buy him a pair; they thought he only wanted them because he was going with a girl who wore glasses.

"I became convinced I had to do what I had to do to keep from going blind," he says.

So he told his principal that he planned to take three weeks off to earn enough money picking oranges that he could buy spectacles for himself. Not wanting a student to miss so much school, his principal told his parents buy them for him. They did.

Afterwards, Caviness sat his parents down and asked them not to interrupt him (he had spent three or four days composing a little speech).

"I explained to them that what they had done was somewhat inexcusable," he says, "but they had taught me the greatest lesson they could ever teach."

DOJ_NMG_0102989

He learned that he could not rely on anybody but himself to do things for him, and that became the basis for his small-government politics. “It was a very eye-opening experience,” he says.

He’s run for mayor several times. In the most recent election, he started running but decided he’d rather do his show than be a politician. But he still voted for himself.

Caviness has never been a real part of the D.C. Republican party, but he says he knows just how his political career would end if he were. It would be something like what happened in1997 to J.C. Watts, a black Republican ex-congressman from Oklahoma who triggered a round of GOP apologies after he decried “race-hustling poverty pimps” in an apparent jab at Jesse Jackson and Marion Barry.

Caviness says he would do the same thing, but when apology time came he would have a different strategy: “‘I don’t consider you a race poverty pimp,’” he would say. “‘You are a DAMN race poverty pimp!’ And then I would tell ’em all to go to hell.”

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former French Telecom Exec Charged With Costa Rican Bribery (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, December 6, 2006

MIAMI -- A former top executive for the Latin American business of the French telecommunications giant Alcatel-Lucent faces U.S. corruption charges for allegedly funneling millions of dollars in bribes to Costa Rican officials to win lucrative contracts.

Christian Sapsizian, a 60-year-old French citizen who was a senior vice president for Latin America for Alcatel-Lucent, was free Tuesday on $525,000 bail after making his initial appearance Monday in federal court. Sapsizian is scheduled for arraignment Dec. 18 on a charge of making corrupt payments to a foreign official.

According to an FBI affidavit, Sapsizian agreed in 2000 to make payments to an unnamed senior official with Costa Rica's state-owned telecommunications authority, the Instituto Costarricense de Electricidad, or ICE.

In return, the official would "vote in favor of awarding Alcatel a contract" and provide other valuable assistance, according to the FBI.

Paris-based Alcatel S.A. completed its $11.6 billion acquisition of Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent Technologies Inc. last month, officially assuming the new Alcatel-Lucent name. The allegations involving Sapsizian, who is now retired, were under the former Alcatel S.A. corporate name.

Regine Coqueran, an Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman in Paris, provided a company statement Tuesday saying that the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is also investigating payments by the company in foreign countries. The company said it would "cooperate fully in any inquiry or investigation into these matters."

According to U.S. court documents, a subsidiary that handled Costa Rican business, Alcatel CIT, was awarded two contracts worth over $250 million in 2001 and 2002. Before that, according to the FBI, Alcatel CIT had frequently lost out to competitor Sweden's LM Ericsson AB.

The FBI traced $2.4 million payments from Alcatel to the senior ICE official in Costa Rica and $2.56 million to the official's wife. These alleged bribes were routed through a Costa Rican consulting firm hired to assist Alcatel in winning the contracts, using wire transfers from accounts at banks in New York, the Bahamas and Miami.

Sapsizian's attorney, Roy Kahn, said Sapsizian will plead not guilty to the charges and added that companies frequently hire such consulting firms for business ventures in Latin America. The Costa Rican consulting firm was paid some $14 million by Alcatel, according to the FBI.

"It appears that this is an institutionalized means of doing business by international companies in Latin America," Kahn said.

In addition, a cooperating witness told investigators that the ICE official and a Costa Rican government official, also unnamed, "agreed to share whatever bribe payments were made by Sapsizian to the ICE official," according to the FBI affidavit.

The FBI affidavit quotes Sapsizian as telling investigators after his arrest on Nov. 20 at Miami International Airport that "he could not explain" what Alcatel received in return for the money paid to the Costa Rican consulting firm.

The affidavit also says that Sapsizian arranged for a group of ICE officials to stay at a Paris hotel for four or five nights in October 2003 and told an Alcatel employee to pay their bills in company cash. In the later FBI interview, Sapsizian is quoted as telling agents that he wanted to pay cash so he would not "leave a paper trail" and that it was "wrong" to pay these officials' expenses.

Wall Street Wins Ruling Blocking IPO Class Action (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

In a victory for Wall Street securities firms, a federal appeals court said a lawsuit alleging fraud in the pricing of initial public offerings couldn't move forward in its current form as a class action.

The case alleges that more than 50 Wall Street firms committed fraud by artificially inflating stock prices in IPOs that the firms underwrote in the late 1990s and 2000.

In a ruling, the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York said that the trial judge shouldn't have allowed the plaintiffs to pursue the case as a class action, in part because their individual claims are not sufficiently similar to be grouped together. The decision could mean that the thousands of plaintiffs in the litigation will have to take on the banks individually, which is a much more difficult challenge for plaintiffs. "It's a great win," says Vince DiBlasi of Sullivan & Cromwell, one of the lead lawyers for the banks.

"There is no question the court made it hard for us," says Melvyn Weiss, chairman of the executive committee in the litigation, who plans to appeal the ruling. But "this is not necessarily a happy day for the [Wall Street] banks, either," says Mr. Weiss, of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. The Wall Street firms may now be "swamped" with individual suits by some of the class members, who number in the thousands, "if not millions," he said.

Plaintiffs lawyers often believe there are economies of scale to be gained from getting cases to run as class actions.

Lawyers on both sides said it may be possible for the plaintiffs to somehow recast the case so that it could pass muster as a class action, but that that would be difficult to achieve.

In 2003, the plaintiffs announced a settlement with insurers for technology companies that issued more than 300 IPOs. The settlement includes a guaranteed payment of $1 billion that is to be offset in part by any settlement payments from banks. U.S. District Judge Shira Scheindlin, the trial judge, has yet to approve the settlement.

In April, J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to pay $425 million in a settlement. That settlement is also awaiting court approval. It is unclear how yesterday's ruling affects those settlement pacts.

Court Rejects Class Action Against Banks (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

Wall Street banks, accused of manipulating the prices of initial public offerings of technology companies during the market boom of the late 1990s and cheating small investors out of hundreds of millions of dollars, will not have to face a huge securities class-action lawsuit, a federal appeals court ruled yesterday.

The decision was seen on Wall Street as a huge victory. The investment banks faced making payments of billions of dollars to settle the accusations — if they chose not to risk a trial — involving potentially millions of investors, lawyers involved in the case said.

The ruling also raises the prospects that earlier settlements in the case, in particular a $425 million agreement with J. P. Morgan Chase and a $1 billion guaranteed proposed deal with the issuers of the new shares that was still pending approval by the judge in the case, could be nullified.

Nearly all firms on Wall Street were touched by the lawsuit. Described by many as the largest consolidated securities class-action case ever, the I.P.O. lawsuit involved more than 300 individual investors, 309 issuers and 55 underwriters, including Merrill Lynch, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and Credit Suisse First Boston.

Yesterday, a three-judge panel of the Federal Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Manhattan said the federal judge overseeing the lawsuit had erred in granting class-action status to six “focus cases” out of 310 consolidated class actions that claimed fraud on the part of many of the nation’s largest securities underwriters.

That means investors will probably have to pursue their claims individually, in some cases perhaps through arbitration, lawyers involved in the case said.

“It’s a big win with far-reaching implications for the I.P.O. cases and for class actions,” said Gandolfo V. DiBlasi, a lawyer with Sullivan & Cromwell who represented Goldman Sachs and acted as lead liaison for the defendants in the case.

The ruling was a devastating blow to the embattled securities class-action powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, which is a co-leader for the plaintiffs. The firm has been operating under a cloud for months after it was indicted by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles in May. The firm and two of its named partners are accused of making $11.3 million in secret payments to entice people to serve as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The firm’s co-founder, Melvyn I. Weiss, however, tried to strike a defiant tone about the ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0102991

"It's not over," Mr. Weiss said. "We have the right to seek a review by the entire panel of the Second Circuit, for instance." He also said the ruling affected only the six "focus cases" and that others could satisfy the standards for class-action status.

Still, he added that he was surprised by the ruling.

"I think the decision doesn't reflect a real understanding of how people get defrauded in our society," Mr. Weiss said. "It's just sad that we don't have courts that will recognize the need for judicial approval mechanisms to hold these people accountable."

Notable not only for its sheer size and scope, the public offering case has also been one of the longest running in the class-action landscape and one that has been marked by frequent behind-the-scenes battles among the plaintiffs' lawyers over control.

The lawsuit accused the Wall Street banks of netting huge profits during the technology boom of the late 1990s by artificially inflating the share prices through various means of newly public companies after they went public.

The suit contended that the banks had awarded shares of hot initial offerings to favored clients in return for lucrative investment banking business. It also contended that the banks had made deals with investors so that they would buy shares in the aftermarket to drive up prices artificially and created misleading research to lure investors into buying.

Throughout 2001, thousands of investors filed class-action lawsuits against numerous underwriters and hundreds of issuers. Those lawsuits were later transferred and consolidated by Judge Shira A. Scheindlin in Federal District Court in Manhattan.

What remains unclear is what impact the appeals court ruling may have on two separate settlements that were reached earlier in the case.

In a proposed settlement that is both complicated and extremely unusual, the more than 300 companies, mostly Internet companies, that went public during the boom and are named in the lawsuit, guaranteed the plaintiffs at least $1 billion in recovery from all of the defendants in the case. Approval of that settlement is still pending before Judge Scheindlin.

In April, J. P. Morgan Chase agreed to settle its part of the lawsuit for $425 million. A spokeswoman for J. P. Morgan Chase declined to comment yesterday on the ruling.

But a lawyer involved in the case said it was likely that if the lawsuit did not achieve class-action status, the settlement could be revoked.

Yesterday's ruling was decided by Judges Jon O. Newman, Sonia Sotomayor and Peter W. Hall. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Comverse Ex-CEO May Have Fudged Option Exercise Dates, Not Just Grants (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Kobi Alexander, the former chief executive of Comverse Technology Inc., fled to Namibia rather than face criminal-fraud charges alleging he fattened his paycheck by backdating his options grants to low points in the company's stock price, making them more valuable.

But Mr. Alexander might have other problems with options, too.

Mr. Alexander reported a 1998 option exercise near a notable low in the company's share price. If the timing of that exercise was backdated, Mr. Alexander could have received a substantial, improper break on his personal income-tax bill.

MORE ON OPTIONS

1 · Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny2

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage3

The issue has been referred to the special committee of Comverse directors who are examining the company's grant-backdating problem, according to a person familiar with the matter. The timing of the 1998 exercise was noted in a 13-page Nov. 27 report by Gradient Analytics Inc., a Scottsdale, Ariz., research firm that specializes in the analysis of executive compensation, which Gradient believes can affect share prices. The report was distributed to clients including hedge funds and mutual-fund money managers.

Gradient didn't conclude that Mr. Alexander's exercise was backdated, and his favorable timing might have been just a matter of luck. Robert Morvillo, the lawyer who is representing Mr. Alexander, who is fighting extradition from Namibia, declined to comment.

Exercise backdating isn't new. A former executive of Symbol Technologies Inc. pleaded guilty to tax fraud in 2004 in connection with the practice, and Mercury Interactive Corp. has said former executives also engaged in it.

Options typically allow their recipients to buy shares in the future at the price on the day the option is granted, called the "strike price." The exercise date is the day the recipient decides to buy the shares.

DOJ_NMG_0102992

The form of backdating that has landed Mr. Alexander and more than 60 other top corporate officials in trouble involves pretending that the options were granted on an earlier date, when share prices were lower. Moving the grant date to a time when the stock was trading at a lower price increases the recipient's potential gain.

By contrast, backdating an exercise date gives the recipient a tax break, thanks to the particular way the Internal Revenue Service treats employee options. Such stock options are generally taxed when the employee exercises them.

The IRS considers the spread between the option's strike price and the shares' market value on the exercise date to be subject to tax as ordinary income. Because most executives exercise their options and sell the shares simultaneously, all of the gain is often taxed this way.

But when the shares aren't sold at the same time as the option is exercised, the difference between the market value of the shares on the date of exercise and any price when the shares are subsequently sold is taxed at the lower capital-gains rate. At the time of the 1998 exercises by Mr. Alexander, the top capital-gains tax rate was 20%, while the top rate on ordinary income was 39.6%.

Mr. Alexander said on a form he filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 9, 1998, that he had exercised the split-adjusted equivalent of 675,000 options two months earlier, on Oct. 9, when Comverse's shares closed at a split-adjusted price of $10 each, just pennies above its lowest closing price of the quarter. He didn't report a sale for that same day.

In the two months between Mr. Alexander's reported exercise date and the date he told the SEC about the exercise, Comverse's share price had risen to $22.92.

Assuming the exercise actually occurred as late as the day of the filing, Gradient wrote that "the possible backdating of this exercise may have reduced the amount subject to ordinary income taxes for CEO Alexander by up to $8.72 million, or almost 60%."

It isn't clear what Mr. Alexander did with the shares he received when he exercised the options. He sold a large batch of Comverse stock in 1999, months after the exercise, at about $68 a share. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market trading yesterday, Comverse shares rose 29 cents, or 1.5%, to $19.88.

The stock closed at $24.29 on March 17, the day before a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal spotlighted an unusual pattern of option grants to Mr. Alexander.

Comverse, a New York telecommunications-software maker, uses an independent broker to administer stock-option exercises, a practice that should make manipulation of the exercise date more difficult. But the company doesn't know whether the broker was used for the 1998 transaction highlighted by Gradient. At that time, the broker wasn't being used by the company on a full-time basis, a person familiar with the matter said.

A Comverse spokesman said a special committee was reviewing "all matters related to this company's stock-option practices." The Gradient analysis doesn't demonstrate that Comverse had a pattern of low exercise dates. The report also doesn't mention possible legitimate reasons for the dates, including chance and the desire of executives to exercise options at low price points and hold the shares.

SEC Attorney Adds To Concerns About Probe Of Hedge Fund Pequot (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A second Securities and Exchange Commission official told Congress he had warned agency officials that "something smells rotten" about the SEC's handling of an insider-trading probe of hedge fund Pequot Capital Management.

The testimony from Eric Ribelin, who works in the office of market surveillance, provides a leg of support for the claims of former SEC enforcement attorney Gary Aguirre.

DOJ_NMG_0102993

Mr. Aguirre says he was fired in September 2005 after his supervisors reversed course and stopped him from issuing subpoenas to current Morgan Stanley Chief Executive John Mack, whom Mr. Aguirre suspected of tipping off Pequot. SEC officials said they fired Mr. Aguirre because his behavior became erratic and he couldn't get along with his colleagues.

"I have serious misgivings about many decisions made in this investigation," Mr. Ribelin wrote in September 2005 to Robert Hanson, an SEC branch chief who had supervised Mr. Aguirre. "I don't know what all has driven the decisions. Something smells rotten, though."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) called the hearing to air allegations that the Pequot probe was derailed by political influence. The SEC staff closed its investigation of Pequot and Mr. Mack last week without recommending enforcement action. Morgan Stanley has said Mr. Mack, who testified to the SEC this past August, cooperated in the probe.

SEC enforcement director Linda Thomsen, former SEC associate enforcement director Paul Berger, SEC assistant director Mark Kreitman and Mr. Hanson joined forces to testify under oath yesterday that their probe of Pequot wasn't derailed for political reasons. The SEC enforcement attorneys said they hadn't had enough information to make it worthwhile to subpoena Mr. Mack.

The Judiciary Committee, together with the Senate Finance Committee, will release a report early next year that summarizes the evidence they have gathered through a congressional investigation. The SEC staff always has the option of reopening the Pequot probe. However, that is deemed unlikely because it would suggest that the SEC's enforcement investigations are steered by Congress, undercutting its status as an independent agency.

In an interview after the hearing, Mr. Specter said that "I think that there was totally insufficient justification for the firing of [Mr.] Aguirre." He said that they "manufactured a reevaluation as the basis for firing him." Mr. Specter said he planned to study the transcript to determine "where we go next."

"At best, this is a demonstration of very lax and inadequate enforcement by the SEC, and at worst, they have not pursued the evidence which was talked about relating to [Mr.] Mack" and Pequot chief Arthur Samberg, Mr. Specter said.

S.E.C. Calls Pequot Study Thorough (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5 — Senior officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission vigorously defended the commission's investigation of a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management, telling the Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday that its inquiry was professional, thorough and untainted by outside political influence.

In their first detailed public comments about the investigation of Pequot, four current or former S.E.C. supervisors took aim at their former colleague and chief accuser, Gary J. Aguirre, saying his allegations that the agency had pulled its punches were unfounded and came from a fired employee whose temperament and judgment had caused problems in the office.

"He treated his colleagues with disrespect bordering on contempt," said Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the S.E.C. "His investigation of Pequot was poorly thought out, disorganized, and sloppily documented."

The testimony by S.E.C. officials, including the agency's inspector general, was met with considerable skepticism by Senator Arlen Specter, who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who heads the Finance Committee. Both panels are investigating the Securities and Exchange Commission's handling of the Pequot inquiry.

"At a minimum, it is very, very troubling what the S.E.C. has done here," Senator Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said, citing conflicting accounts of Mr. Aguirre's conduct and what he said was a long delay in taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive. "We are not finished with this, ladies and gentlemen."

Mr. Aguirre had previously told Congress that the Pequot investigation, which he led, was derailed in the summer of 2005 after his supervisors blocked him from taking testimony from Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's re-election campaign.

Senator Grassley saved his most biting comments for the S.E.C.'s inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, pointing out that the inspector general had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre before concluding that his charges were unfounded.

"Just calling up people accused of wrongdoing and asking them if they did it is not my idea of an investigation," Senator Grassley said.

Senator Specter said the inspector general's investigation was at best lax and at worst had the "overtone of a cover-up."

Mr. Stachnik said his staff did not need to interview Mr. Aguirre because it had ample evidence from other sources to reach its conclusion. Mr. Stachnik eventually reopened his investigation, but in doing so he has raised new questions.

Senator Grassley accused Mr. Stachnik of trying to intimidate future whistleblowers by subpoenaing Mr. Aguirre's communications with Senate investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0102994

Asked why he had done so, Mr. Stachnik said he could not answer the question because the Justice Department advised him not to discuss the matter. That prompted Senator Grassley to say in a rising voice, "You may be playing footsy with an executive branch of government that wants to curb congressional inquiry, even beyond this one."

The S.E.C. had been investigating a number of profitable trades by the hedge fund in advance of mergers or other market-moving news. The commission eventually interviewed Mr. Mack and closed its investigation last week without filing an enforcement action. Both Mr. Mack and Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg, have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

Mr. Aguirre's tenure at the S.E.C. was a troubled one, said his former supervisors, who in addition to Mr. Kreitman were Robert B. Hanson, a branch chief; Linda Thomsen, the agency's director of enforcement; and Paul R. Berger, a former associate director of enforcement. They said they could now respond publicly to Mr. Aguirre's charges because the Pequot case was no longer active.

Mr. Kreitman said Mr. Aguirre had become increasingly erratic, throwing tantrums and "storming down the halls in a furious crouch."

Ms. Thomsen called Mr. Aguirre's supervisors "smart, dedicated and honorable" officials who were not afraid to follow evidence wherever it might lead, even if it implicated "captains of industry."

Mr. Hanson said Mr. Aguirre reached conclusions not supported by evidence, and cited Mr. Aguirre's examination of Mr. Samberg of Pequot. "It was reported to me that Mr. Aguirre behaved unprofessionally and was extremely disorganized during the testimony," Mr. Hanson said.

Senator Grassley challenged that assertion. Noting that Mr. Hanson had not been at the examination, the senator said a completely different conclusion about Mr. Aguirre's conduct had been reached by L. Hilton Foster, one of the S.E.C.'s most-respected experts on insider trading.

Senator Grassley said Mr. Foster, who had attended the examination, told Senate investigators that Mr. Aguirre's questioning had elicited "dynamite stuff," and that he intended to use the hearing transcript to train new attorneys.

Mr. Hanson said he had not spoken with Mr. Foster before reaching his conclusion.

Senator Specter said the S.E.C.'s harsh criticism of Mr. Aguirre did not square with the favorable job evaluations from his supervisors. In response, Mr. Kreitman said S.E.C. officials came to believe that they had been "overly generous" and decided to add a second, more critical evaluation.

That evaluation was not shared with Mr. Aguirre and was put in his file after he left the agency.

"It looks like that negative evaluation was created only after Aguirre started complaining," Senator Grassley said.

In a statement after the hearing, the senator added, "Neither the S.E.C. nor the inspector general can get around the fact that there is little or no documentary evidence to support the supervisors' claims about Mr. Aguirre."

The senior S.E.C. officials who testified Tuesday said politics played no role in the Pequot investigation. "I certainly knew that Mr. Mack was a very high profile individual, but I had no idea until I read in The New York Times recently about Mr. Mack's political connections," Mr. Hanson said.

S.E.C. officials said they had turned down Mr. Aguirre's request to interview Mr. Mack at the time because he had not made a strong enough case for doing so, and they pointed out that at no time was there any evidence that Mr. Mack had access to information that could have constituted insider trading.

Eric Ribelin, an S.E.C. official who had worked on the Pequot case, testified that he had been "stunned and outraged" by Mr. Aguirre's firing.

"Something smells rotten," he wrote in an e-mail message to one of his supervisors. "I'm nonplussed by issues big and small about the course of events going back to January."

Asked what he meant, Mr. Ribelin said Mr. Aguirre did not receive the support he needed within the S.E.C. to aggressively pursue his investigation.

Greenberg Firm, AIG Agree To Settle Some Legal Cases (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

American International Group Inc. and C.V. Starr & Co., a firm led by former AIG Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, are settling multiple legal cases.

Mr. Greenberg left AIG last year amid an accounting probe. He has denied any wrongdoing in a resulting civil case.

After Mr. Greenberg's departure, AIG terminated its relationship with insurance agencies controlled by C.V. Starr, which was headed by Mr. Greenberg when he ran AIG and sold commercial policies to large clients. Among other things, the firms have argued about who could use the "Starr" and "American International" trademarks. Under the settlement, AIG won't use the Starr or related names in doing insurance business, and C.V. Starr won't use certain AIG-related names.

DOJ_NMG_0102995

The settlement doesn't resolve a dispute over billions of dollars in AIG shares held by investment vehicle Starr International Co. Mr. Greenberg is chairman of Starr International.

The terms of the settlement are confidential, the companies said. A spokesman for AIG said it includes "no monetary payment that is material to AIG's financial disclosures." Of his work at C.V. Starr, Mr. Greenberg said yesterday the company has opened offices in recent months in London and Hong Kong and has invested hundreds of millions of dollars since he left AIG.

C.V. Starr and Starr International are represented by David Boies, of Boies, Schiller & Flexner LLP. AIG's lead attorney in the case is Michael Carlinsky, of Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges LLP.

Suspect In Siemens Case Claims Executives Had A Role In Bribes (WSJ)

By David Crawford In Berlin And Mike Esterl In Frankfurt

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

Siemens AG's troubles with a fraud investigation look set to grow, after a suspect gave German investigators details of a bribes-for-business scheme and alleged senior officials at the conglomerate were involved.

Munich prosecutors say they are investigating allegations that officials at Siemens' telecommunications division diverted at least €200 million ($266.6 million) to a slush fund held at banks in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein for use to pay bribes. Authorities searched offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November.

On Friday, prosecutors ordered the release of Reinhard Sickzek, 56 years old, a former sales official in the Siemens telecoms division, after he provided details of a system of bribes paid to potential customers in Africa, Russia and the Middle East, according to Mr. Sickzek's lawyer, Wolfgang Kreuzer. Mr. Sickzek also named at least one board member in the Siemens telecoms division as the supervisor of the scheme, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Mr. Sickzek's statement to Munich prosecutors, which encompasses hundreds of pages, raises questions about Siemens's determination to prevent corruption. Mr. Sickzek told police that a member of the Siemens Compliance Department advised him on how to prevent detection of the bribery operation.

Siemens says it is cooperating in the investigation as a witness.

Siemens, Europe's largest engineering company by sales, has attributed the alleged fraud to "individual acts" but also has said it is reviewing its compliance procedures and recently hired an ombudsman.

A spokesman at the Munich-based company declined to comment yesterday on Mr. Sickzek's statement, citing the continuing investigation.

Few details from Mr. Sickzek's statement, reported on Saturday in the Süddeutsche Zeitung and confirmed yesterday, are available.

A prosecutor said Mr. Sickzek was released because he provided important assistance and laid to rest any concerns he would attempt to damage the investigation.

A spokesman for the Munich prosecutors office declined to comment. Mr. Sickzek wasn't available for comment, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

In his statement, Mr. Sickzek told prosecutors he had expected his arrest since November 2004 when he was contacted by Liechtenstein prosecutors about the movement of funds at a bank in Vaduz. Prior to his arrest, he began collecting files, memos, bank receipts and legal documents that would assist the investigation, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

Among the documents were a series of falsified contracts and invoices used to divert €70 million to €100 million per year through a network of accounts and shell companies in Austria, Switzerland and Liechtenstein, according to Mr. Sickzek's statement, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Mr. Sickzek provided details of how the system of slush funds was organized at Siemens and who was in the know, according to Mr. Kreuzer.

Mr. Sickzek is likely to be a key witness against his accomplices should the case go to trial, Mr. Kreuzer said.

Robert Wallner, senior prosecutor in Valduz, Liechtenstein, says his office opened an investigation of a suspected attempt to defraud Siemens in November 2004 after a bank reported €7.6 million withdrawn from one Siemens account in cash and then deposited in cash in a second account several days later.

Mr. Wallner said he continued his investigation even after a Siemens lawyer requested he close it because Siemens hadn't been defrauded. "We are still investigating to see whether the claim is true," Mr. Wallner said.

Countrywide Settles With Spitzer (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102996

Countrywide Financial Corp., one of the nation's largest home-mortgage lenders, has settled an inquiry by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, into alleged discriminatory pricing practices and agreed to establish a $3 million consumer-education fund and implement other reforms.

The settlement comes as other banks involved in the inquiry continue to resist Mr. Spitzer's efforts to obtain information about their lending practices.

Mr. Spitzer launched the inquiry into lending by seven large banks -- including Citigroup Inc., HSBC Holdings PLC, and Wells Fargo & Co. -- in April 2005. Mr. Spitzer was elected governor of New York in November and takes office next month.

The inquiry began after a review of federal Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data showed that black and Latino customers were more likely than whites to receive high-priced loans in New York in 2004.

Mr. Spitzer sent the banks letters seeking loan-pricing data, such as credit scores, used to set interest rates and fees.

The banks sued Mr. Spitzer, contending that as federally-chartered institutions they are shielded from state scrutiny. A federal district court sided with the banks, whose position was backed by the federal Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which joined the suit. The case is on appeal before the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Manhattan.

Announcing the Countrywide settlement, Mr. Spitzer criticized the OCC for siding with the banks.

"We wish that OCC would expend as much effort examining the pricing practices of the national banks it regulates as it has devoted to protecting these banks from our fair lending inquiries," he said in a statement.

Under the settlement, Countrywide agreed to compensate minority borrowers improperly steered toward higher-cost loans. The total amount of compensation hasn't been determined yet.

Countrywide Financial, based in Calabasas, Calif., also agreed to improve training for loan officers and provide detailed reporting to the attorney general's office to ensure compliance. It also agreed to pay the state $200,000 to cover investigation costs.

"Countrywide and Attorney General Spitzer share a common goal: to assure that all individuals who apply for a mortgage loan receive equal treatment, and that any pricing differences should be based on credit, property and other risk factors," said a statement from Rick Wentz, senior managing director and chief ethics officer for Countrywide.

Countrywide Reaches Deal After Bias Probe (WP)

By Kathleen Day, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Countrywide Financial Corp., the nation's largest mortgage lender, will compensate as many as 4,500 black and Hispanic borrowers under an agreement announced yesterday with New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer.

The agreement ends the attorney general's probe of Countrywide for possible violations of fair-lending laws that Spitzer said were suggested by patterns in mortgage data collected each year by the federal government. Spitzer's office examined mortgages made in 2004.

Countrywide, which denied any wrongdoing, has agreed to review the loans in question to make sure the customers were charged the same rate as white borrowers with similar financial histories. The company made 20,000 mortgages in New York in 2004, including the 4,500 to black and Hispanic borrowers.

Neither the company nor Spitzer knows how much will be repaid until Countrywide's review is complete, but company spokesman Rick Simon said it wouldn't involve many loans or much money. "We do not think there will be a lot of payments. We do not expect this to have great impact," he said. He declined to be more specific.

The Calabasas, Calif., company said it consented to the agreement to avoid the cost and inconvenience of a longer investigation by Spitzer's office and possible litigation. The agreement also requires Countrywide to pay $200,000 to cover the cost of Spitzer's probe, beef up monitoring of its lending practices and invest $3 million in consumer education.

Allen Fishbein, housing and credit expert for Consumer Federation of America, praised the agreement for requiring Countrywide to monitor not only the loans it originates but also those it buys from mortgage brokers. He said it could be a model for other state and federal regulators, who are combing through the same federal loan data for evidence of discrimination.

Major mortgage lenders, including Wells Fargo, J.P. Morgan Chase, Citigroup and HSBC Holdings, went to court to block Spitzer from probing their lending practices. The Office of the Comptroller of the Currency has supported the banks, a stance Spitzer is challenging.

Congress May Soon Make 'Pretexting' A Federal Crime (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102997

Spurred by the Hewlett Packard Co. scandal, Congress is moving toward passing legislation this week that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval.

The measure targets so-called "pretexting" tactics, where investigators use various schemes to impersonate their target and gain access to private phone records. Investigators hired by H-P used the strategy earlier this year in a now-infamous investigation into who leaked information to reporters.

About 12 states have made telephone pretexting a crime, but there's currently no clear federal prohibition. Former H-P executive Patricia Dunn and several others were charged in the pretexting scandal for violations of California's state privacy laws.

The federal legislation under consideration, which passed the House in April and may clear the Senate before Congress adjourns for the year, would make pretexting for phone records a federal crime, and spell out new federal criminal penalties for both those who buy and sell such fraudulently obtained records.

Individuals and organizations that purchase confidential records -- knowing they were obtained without the consumer's consent -- could be subject to fines of up to $500,000 and imprisonment for up to five years. Additional penalties would be imposed in cases where the information is used to commit further federal crimes, or causes substantial financial harm, for example, to a consumer whose identity has been stolen.

The law contains an exception for law-enforcement agencies.

Until recently, telephone pretexting has existed in a murky legal realm, and federal regulators and state attorneys general have often been forced to bring cases under general consumer protection or antifraud statutes.

Noting the lack of federal protections against the practice, House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wisc.) said yesterday: "We recognized this loophole long ago, but Hewlett Packard made it a front burner issue. And if we fail to pass this now, it just gives people an opportunity to do what Hewlett Packard did again and try to get away with it."

The legislation moving through Congress doesn't go as far as some consumer advocates want. It doesn't compel phone companies to beef up security procedures, and it doesn't give the Federal Trade Commission the power to levy civil fines. While the Justice Department would have the power to enforce criminal penalties, the FTC's hands would remain tied.

In a recent telephone-pretexting enforcement sweep, for example, the FTC targeted companies that advertised their ability to obtain confidential phone records, alleging "unfair and deceptive" violations of marketing laws.

But the FTC doesn't have the clear authority to go after the shadier investigative firms that actually acquired the phone logs for those companies, and still would not under the proposed law.

Consumer advocates characterized the bill moving through Congress as a good start, but said they will continue pushing for broader measures. "It's a good first step," said Rob Douglas, an information-security consultant who runs the privacytoday.com Web site. "If we're going to get anything done in these closing moments of Congress, this is the only bill that has a chance."

Because of the bill's narrow provisions, most of the industries affected said they support the measure. "We need stiff penalties to deter criminals from pursuing this trade," said Joe Farren, spokesman for CITA-The Wireless Association, a trade group for cellular carriers. Mr. Farren said phone pretexting is already illegal under general fraud statutes, and noted that every major phone carrier has filed lawsuits against pretexters.

Many private investigators distinguish pretexting for phone and other confidential records from other, more general forms of pretexting -- such as pretending to be someone's brother-in-law to find out if they live at a certain address when investigating a child-abduction case. They say they support the penalties for those seeking confidential information -- and say few companies do that anymore. The recent attention paid to telephone pretexting has driven many Web sites advertising the service offline. "I don't know anyone that goes near it anymore," said Joseph Biondo, a private investigator in Forest Hills, NY.

Pretexting to obtain financial records is already illegal under previous federal legislation.

The House approved the proposed phone legislation long before the H-P scandal, but the bill then languished for months amid jockeying between the Senate Commerce and Judiciary committees. Both panels supported action, but the Commerce bill went beyond the Judiciary bill by creating a set of civil penalties and giving a greater enforcement role for the Federal Trade Commission and Federal Communications Commission. But consumer advocates were concerned that the Commerce bill would pre-empt tougher state laws.

In September, Mr. Sensenbrenner appealed to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) to break the logjam. This week, the leadership began pursuing a strategy of simply calling up the House bill and sending it to President Bush for his signature.

Given the late hour -- Congress is due to adjourn this week -- it could yet be blocked by an individual senator seeking leverage on some other legislation. Late yesterday, Republican aides said Arizona Sen. John McCain was threatening to block the measure unless an unrelated bill establishing a federal boxing commission was added. Mr. McCain's office did not respond to requests for comment.

Democrats said that none of their members objected and both Republican Sens. Ted Stevens and Arlen Specter, the departing chairmen of the Commerce and Judiciary Committees, have endorsed the decision to proceed along these lines.

In appealing for action, Mr. Sensenbrenner was joined by Rep. Howard Berman (D., Cal.) and Rep. Lama Smith (R., Tex.), senior members of the House Judiciary panel. In a letter to Mr. Frist in September, the three lawmakers noted the HP disclosures and that outside counsel to the company had reportedly suggested that the use of pretexting services is not clearly illegal.

"The time has come to clearly and unambiguously make such activity illegal," Chairman Sensenbrenner and his colleagues wrote.

SEC Plans Database To Stem Illegal Hedge-Fund Trading (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Jesse Westbrook And David Scheer

Bloomberg, December 6, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission plans to have a database in place by next year that will help it crack down on hedge-fund insider trading, a senior agency official said.

``The SEC presently does not have an electronic system to aggregate referrals based on the identities of the specific traders involved," SEC Enforcement Director Linda Thomsen said before the Senate Judiciary Committee today. ``We anticipate implementing a new case tracking system by mid-2007."

Illegal trading by hedge funds ``remains a substantial concern" to the SEC as the $1.3 trillion industry's influence over financial markets grows, Thomsen said. Hedge funds, which are loosely regulated private pools of capital, manage about 5 percent of U.S. assets and account for about 30 percent of U.S. equity trading volume.

Today's hearing is the third convened by Senator Arlen Specter, the Judiciary Committee's chairman, in six months to examine oversight of insider trading. The Pennsylvania Republican circulated draft legislation aimed at halting illegal buying and selling of stocks that would require hedge funds accepting money from pension funds to submit to random inspections by the SEC.

His measure would also force hedge funds, which allow managers to participate substantially in the gains of money invested, to set up ethics codes and compliance programs and allow the Justice Department to give private citizens rewards for helping in prosecutions of insider trading cases.

``Light regulation, secrecy, unregulated recordkeeping and limited compliance programs of hedge funds increase the difficulty of detecting and proving insider trading," according to Specter's legislation, which hasn't been introduced.

NYSE Effort

The New York Stock Exchange and the NASD, which refer data about suspicious buying and selling to the SEC, are coordinating efforts to share information about hedge funds, Robert Marchman, head of market surveillance for the NYSE, said in an interview.

The agencies plan to build out a database with information detailing relationships between hedge funds and other ``financial business-related entities" in an effort to uncover illegal trading, he said.

Lawsuits involving hedge funds made up 11 percent of the SEC's insider trading cases in fiscal 2006, according to agency figures. The SEC expects to file more cases against the industry alleging illegal trading in 2007, Thomsen has said.

The SEC sued Wynnefield Capital Inc. Managing Partner Nelson Obus in April, alleging three hedge funds he runs made $1.34 million after getting a tip about the merger of Allied Capital Corp. and SunSource Inc.

In May, hedge fund Deephaven Capital Management LLC agreed to pay $5.7 million to settle allegations that it profited from trades made before 19 private investments in public equity offerings that were about to be announced.

`Increasing Pressure'

``The increasing role played by hedge funds and the expectation of consistent, market-beating returns could lead to increasing pressure on fund managers to deliver by any means, such as riskier investments, or worse, illegal trading on inside information," Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley said at the hearing.

Specter held today's hearing, in part, to continue probing allegations by former SEC attorney Gary Aguirre that his investigation of insider trading at hedge fund Pequot Capital Management Inc. was stymied for political reasons. Thomsen denied Aguirre's claims, telling Specter and Grassley that the ``enforcement division does not pull its punches."

Specter's legislation would restore elements of SEC rules struck down by a federal appeals court in June that required hedge-fund advisers to register with the agency. While Specter said today that he plans to introduce the measure, he doesn't expect Congress will take it up before the end of the year.

Amaranth Collapse

DOJ_NMG_0102999

Lawmakers became concerned that the lack of hedge-fund oversight could put retiree money at risk after pension funds were stung by the collapse of Amaranth Advisers LLC. The Greenwich, Connecticut-based hedge fund lost $6.5 billion in September on bad natural gas trades.

Regulators should double the amount of net worth required to invest in hedge funds to $2 million to protect unsophisticated investors, Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal told the judiciary panel today. Currently, individuals can also invest in hedge funds if they had income of $200,000 for each of the past two years, a requirement that should be raised to $500,000, he suggested.

``A small investor in my view would be anyone who can't afford to lose the amount invested," Blumenthal said. ``Raising the net worth or income levels for participation in hedge funds is one of the single most important steps that this committee or the SEC could take to raise the bar."

The SEC will consider proposing at a Dec. 13 public meeting that the amount of wealth needed to invest in hedge funds be increased. The agency hasn't specified how it might limit the pool of hedge-fund investors.

Deadlock Broken On Revising Audit Rule (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Proposal to Rein In Accounting Costs

Regulators have reached an agreement in principle on how to revamp a contentious accounting rule that cost businesses millions of dollars more than anticipated, removing a pair of major stumbling blocks attacked by consumer advocates.

The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, plans to meet Dec. 19 to present its revised version of the regulation, officials said yesterday. The rule, which mandates that auditors review corporate financial controls, is the most disputed part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress in 2002 after frauds at Enron and WorldCom.

Businesses had objected to the cost of complying with the law's stricter audit provision. The accounting board's chairman, Mark Olson, said the new proposed guidance, which attempts to focus auditors on areas of highest risk, would more closely align the costs of the measure with its benefits.

Accounting board officials had clashed with leaders of the Securities and Exchange Commission over the issue in recent weeks. But a visit to the board's office Friday by SEC Chairman Christopher Cox helped put the process back on track.

Cox had floated the idea of requiring small companies to develop financial controls, which help prevent fraud and mistakes, but forcing auditors to test the controls only on a narrow and limited basis, in a memo that was leaked two weeks ago. But investor groups howled that the proposal would gut the law.

That idea now appears to be off the table, in part because of a report issued last week by a panel supported by Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. The Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, funded by business interests, advocated a broad overhaul of U.S. regulation and urged new protections against shareholder lawsuits. But the panel rejected the notion that small companies could evade regular testing of their internal controls.

Accounting board and SEC officials also appear to have resolved another obstacle. Under a proposal in Cox's leaked memo, thousands of companies already complying with the rule might have won an exemption because of the way the proposal defined a small business. But the new draft calls for auditors to take into account both the size of a company and the complexity of its business and accounting practices. That way, a small business that handles complex financial instruments known as derivatives, for instance, would get more stringent review.

The SEC is set to issue new guidance for corporate managers at a public meeting next week, and the accounting board is to lay out its proposed changes a week later. Officials at both agencies cautioned that certain technical details remain to be resolved and the agreement may yet founder.

Given the importance of the issue to investors and the continued urging by key lawmakers from both political parties to lighten the burden on businesses, the incentive is for regulators to settle the matter quickly.

Investor advocates said they are following the debate with interest, but they preferred to reserve comment until they could review the specific proposals. The rule is complex, and it may be difficult to grasp its implications without a close reading of the language, they added.

The revisions will be "critical in transforming [the rule] from one of the most troublesome parts of Sarbanes-Oxley to one of the most meaningful parts of the act," SEC Commissioner Paul S. Atkins, a Republican, said at a public meeting Monday.

Likewise, Commissioner Roel C. Campos, a Democrat, said that the end product "will balance very well investor protection while also creating a better environment for efficient audits of internal controls."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Renzi Reports Death Threats, Gunshots At Office (AZREP)

By Billy House, Republic Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, December 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Rep. Rick Renzi says the FBI is investigating several "death threats" directed at him, as well as incidents of gunshots and other vandalism to his Flagstaff office.

"I'm very concerned about a series of calls we've gotten - one we're taking very seriously," said the Arizona Republican, in an interview today.

A Justice Department official in Phoenix would neither confirm nor deny a pending investigation into the incidents described by Renzi.

Renzi, who was elected to his third term on Nov. 7, said incidents of vandalism dates from several months ago, and include instances of golf balls and firecrackers thrown at his congressional offices.

But concerns over the vandalism heightened last week, after gunshots were fired at the congressional office on North San Francisco Street, either late on Nov. 28 or early Nov. 29.

Along with the vandalism, there's been a series of threatening telephone calls to the office, including death threats to the congressman, said Renzi.

One call, in particular, is prompting the most concern. Renzi declined to provide the details of that message.

The FBI is conducting interviews regarding the calls and the shooting, Renzi said.

"These incidents are having a cumulative effect on our people (staffers)," said Renzi. "We are seriously looking at the possibly having to move into a more-secure building."

Aleppo Man Indicted In Murder-for-hire Case (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 6, 2006

What began as an extramarital affair for an Aleppo man is now a federal criminal case that could cost him his life.

Grand jurors in Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday indicted Eugene Talik Jr. on a murder-for-hire charge in the death of his lover, Kelly Jo Elliott.

Mr. Talik, 38, also was charged with conspiracy and interstate domestic violence. The grand jury alleges that he hired an acquaintance to kill Ms. Elliott, 28, so word of their affair would never reach his wife.

Prosecutors say Mr. Talik himself strangled Ms. Elliott after the man he hired decided he could not go through with the killing.

The second man has not been identified by federal prosecutors or the grand jury. He is cooperating with the U.S. attorney's staff in Wheeling as it prepares its case against Mr. Talik.

Mr. Talik could face a sentence of life in prison or death if he is convicted. For prosecutors to pursue a capital case against him, they would need approval from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Mr. Gonzales earlier this year authorized the death penalty in a case similar to the one against Mr. Talik. It involves Donna Moonda, of Hermitage in Mercer County, who is charged with hiring a man to murder her husband, a wealthy physician.

Investigators say Mr. Talik killed Ms. Elliott the night of May 25. The indictment alleges that Mr. Talik told her they would be taking a camping trip over the Memorial Day weekend. After they had packed, they drove in separate vehicles to the truck stop at the Dallas Pike exit of Interstate 70, where the other man was waiting.

The second man told prosecutors he hit Ms. Elliott with a pipe, but the blow did not kill her. At that point, he said, he decided he could not take her life.

Prosecutors allege that Mr. Talik then attacked and strangled Ms. Elliott, a mother of two small boys. The indictment alleges that he killed her in the moving van he drove for a living.

An arrest warrant for Mr. Talik said he and his accomplice then drove Ms. Elliott's body across the West Virginia line and into Pennsylvania. The killers set her body afire and buried her remains in a shallow grave in Elk County, prosecutors said.

Mr. Talik is in jail without bail in West Virginia. Prosecutors will not say where the second suspect is being held.

Boot Lawyer Off Case, Feds Urge (SLT UT)

By Pamela Manson

Salt Lake Tribune, December 5, 2006

Davis scandal

Prosecutors are seeking to disqualify the lawyer for a Layton couple accused of stealing federal grant money from Davis School District, claiming he gave legal advice to witnesses in the criminal investigation.

The defense attorney, Paul Gotay, denies that his actions have caused a legal conflict that would require him to step down and is fighting to continue his representation of Susan G. Ross and John D. Ross.

"My head was put in the vise, and they tried to squeeze it," Gotay said Monday after a hearing in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, where the disqualification motion was discussed. "It's a good thing I have a hard head."

Magistrate Brooke Wells has set a hearing for Monday to hear arguments on the disqualification motion and Gotay's request for transcripts of grand jury testimony by the witnesses.

In the disqualification motion, filed late Friday, the U.S. Attorney's Office said that as early as May 2005, Gotay appeared with the Rosses at the office of the FBI, the agency investigating the alleged fraud that drained the district of millions in Title I money meant to help disadvantaged students.

Then, when agents attempted to interview two witnesses they believed had knowledge of the scheme - Keith Evans and Terry Applegate - both men said Gotay was their attorney, the motion said.

In addition, Gotay himself, by engaging in "multiple financial transactions with the defendants," has personal knowledge relevant to the case and is likely to be a witness in the prosecution, according to the motion.

Gotay has said the attempt to disqualify him stems from the fact that the Rosses paid him a fixed fee for his representation after they came under investigation in the spring of 2005. The couple's assets were frozen when they were indicted Nov. 21 by a federal grand jury.

On Monday, Gotay repeated his assertion that he will represent the Rosses no matter what. Because they have paid him, the government has also frozen his assets, he said.

"The government deems it necessary to have me removed because I was willing to represent them free of charge as needed," he said. "When all legal avenues fail . . . personal attack is the name of the game."

Gotay also said he will file a motion asking that Wells be removed from the case because she appears to have decided already to disqualify him. The magistrate said during the hearing she has no opinion yet on the matter and declined to recuse herself.

The Rosses have pleaded not guilty to 47 counts of theft, fraud, copyright infringement and money laundering against them. Stella V. Smith - Susan Ross' former secretary at the district - also has pleaded not guilty after being charged in a separate indictment with 37 counts of mail fraud for allegedly taking more than $300,000 in payment on fake invoices.

Prosecutors did not seek to keep any of the three behind bars in the months leading up to their trials, scheduled in February. But all three were required to surrender their passports and keep in contact with the court's pretrial services officers.

Wells ruled at Monday's hearing to leave the same release conditions in place.

The indictment accuses the couple of selling photocopies of books to schools that receive federal Title I funding at vastly inflated prices through an intermediary company, which kept a small percentage of the profit and paid the rest to a company allegedly owned by Susan and John Ross. Money allegedly taken from 2000 to 2005 amounts to $4.3 million, but officials say the scam may have begun as early as 1985.

The intermediary company is Research and Development (R&D), which is run by Evans and Applegate, according to court records. The records say the two men, who are not charged in the case, are prosecution witnesses.

Smith is accused of creating phony invoices for books that were never ordered and never delivered. She allegedly collected $338,000 from 1999 to 2005.

The Davis district first detected something was amiss with its Title I programs in spring 2005 after implementing a new review system. Authorities were contacted immediately, said Timothy FuhrÃ‚man, special agent in charge of the FBI's Salt Lake City office, which investigated the matter along with the U.S. Department of Education Office of Inspector General, the IRS and Farmington police.

Susan Ross, who was employed by the district beginning in the 1970s, was director of federal programs before she retired in spring 2005. John Ross is the former Title I specialist for the Utah Office of Education and worked as a grant specialist for the Davis district from March 2000 to February 2005.

The maximum penalty for mail fraud and money laundering is 20 years in prison; for theft, 10 years; and for copyright violations, five years.

The U.S. Department of Education is working on its own Office of Inspector General and the Justice Department to determine whether officials at the district or state level might also be held liable, spokesman Jim Bradshaw said.

Generally in such cases, prosecutors request restitution, which the judge determines at sentencing. The Ross charges include a "notice of intent to seek criminal forfeiture" for the nearly $4.3 million and all ill-gotten assets.

Rather than waiting for the trial's conclusion, possible "administrative steps" are being discussed now, Bradshaw said, although he declined to elaborate on whether those actions might target state or district overseers.

Davis district spokesman Chris Williams said "it would be really tough" for the district to come up with the money to repay what allegedly was stolen. The district currently has less than $3.5 million in reserves, he said.

Among schemes to defraud the department, the Davis charges aren't unique. In its latest semiannual report to Congress, three of five cases reported by the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Inspector General echoed aspects of the Davis fiasco.

In West Virginia, a former financial manager embezzled more than $1.3 million in state Title I funds. The official was sentenced to more than five years in prison and ordered to pay $1.5 million in restitution.

Investigations in Georgia and Minnesota also uncovered scams to funnel federal money to front companies. The conspirators were sentenced to serve up to eight years in prison and pay back most of the money.

Stolen Car A Hoax; Mom's Boyfriend Charged In Boy's Death (AP)

By Jay Reeves

AP, December 6, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - A north Alabama woman who claimed that someone stole a car with her 5-year-old son asleep in the back seat was charged Tuesday afternoon with hindering prosecution, and her boyfriend was charged with capital murder in the boy's death.

An Amber Alert was issued Monday morning when Shalinda Glass reported that her son had been abducted outside an Albertville convenience store. A massive search was conducted by police and members of the FBI and the Alabama Bureau of Investigation.

It turns out Glass was lying.

Etowah County Sheriff James Hayes said the body of the boy, Geontae Glass, was discovered in the pre-dawn hours inside the missing Nissan Altima, which had been parked in a closed garage at a house in rural Etowah County.

He said Glass, 25, of Rainbow City, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles, who is believed to own the house where the body was found, were arrested early Tuesday morning at Towles' apartment in Rainbow City. They were both being held in the Etowah County jail Tuesday night.

Hayes said Glass told police that her son, who was in kindergarten, died from a beating after he brought home a bad progress report from school Friday.

Authorities were trying to determine jurisdiction, but believed the child was killed in Etowah County, where the mother lives, and that the alleged cover-up was committed in neighboring Marshall County, where the car theft was reported.

Marshall County District Attorney Steve Marshall said investigators believe the dead child was in the car when his mother went to the store and went inside with her 7-year-old daughter.

Towles was believed to be the "main player" in the death of the boy, Hayes said in an interview. Authorities aren't sure exactly what happened, he said, but Towles has a criminal record and appeared to be "an abusive boyfriend of the mother."

Glass reported Monday morning that her car was stolen with her son asleep in the back seat in the parking lot of a convenience store in Albertville in neighboring Marshall County. Witnesses reported seeing a man get out of a pickup truck and get into the vehicle before driving away as someone else drove off in the pickup truck.

Authorities took the pickup truck driver into custody Tuesday for questioning. Police decided not to charge him because they believe he didn't know what was happening, Marshall said.

Hayes said the pickup truck has been found and the driver was taken into custody for questioning. No charges were filed, but he said the investigation was ongoing.

"We do expect others to be arrested," he said.

Towles has several residences, Hayes said, and investigators searching his home in Albertville discovered evidence that led them to the house in Etowah County. Besides the body, officers found more than $30,000 in cash, a small amount of cocaine, marijuana residue and weapons including an AK-47, Hayes said.

"We believe this is what he thought was his safe house, where nobody knew where he was," Hayes said.

Hayes said both the time and cause of the boy's death were yet to be determined.

DOJ_NMG_0103003

Alabama state troopers and Albertville police had issued an Amber Alert for the boy, who was said to be last seen in his mother's light blue 1994 Altima. Hayes said the suspects could have tried to dispose of the car - with the body inside - if not for the public being put on alert for the vehicle.

"The Amber Alert was absolutely critical in this case," he said.

Gina Keeton, a clerk at the Albertville store, said she saw Glass crying hysterically in the parking lot after she left the store.

"When I asked her what was wrong, she said someone had taken her child and her car," Keeton said.

Beside being accused in the boy's slaying, Towles will be charged with drug offenses and being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm, the sheriff said.

An Alabama mother's report that her slain 5-year-old son had been asleep in a car when it was stolen was a hoax, and she and her boyfriend have been charged in the boy's death, police said Tuesday.

The body of the kindergartner, Geontae Glass, was found early Tuesday in the trunk of the car, which was parked outside a house owned by the mother's boyfriend, said Capt. Michael Jones of the Etowah County Sheriff's office. "They came up with a plan to disguise the homicide," Jones said of Shalinda Glass, 25, and her boyfriend, Kevin Andre Towles.

Towles has been charged with capital murder and Glass with hindering prosecution.

The story could be the latest in a string of hoaxes, from "runaway bride" Jennifer Wilbanks of Georgia, who faked her own kidnapping, to Sarah Everson, a Missouri woman who collected donations by pretending to be pregnant with sextuplets. Some appear aimed at financial gain or avoiding prosecution — or marriage. Others are odder: John Mark Karr claimed to have killed JonBenét Ramsey until evidence showed otherwise.

"Some of these people aren't exactly brain surgeons," says Jay Siegel, director of the Forensic and Investigative Sciences Program at Indiana University. "There are a lot of reasons why people do these things," he says, including mental disorders such as Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy, in which parents make up symptoms, hurt or even kill their children, making it look like an accident.

"A lot of this is done for attention," Siegel says. "It's a form of exhibitionism without taking your clothes off." He says the desire for fame may be exacerbated by reality TV shows.

Michael Aamodt, who teaches forensic psychology at Radford University in Virginia, says some people panic when they get in trouble and make up elaborate stories.

"People, in general, are not very good liars," he says. "They don't really think about the getting-caught part."

In Alabama, Jones says, police concluded that Glass' story was false after interviewing her and others. He said Glass has no prior criminal record but Towles, who runs a barbecue restaurant, has a record of drug offenses.

Glass, who also has a 7-year-old daughter, told police Monday that the boy was sleeping in the back seat of a car that she left running when she went into a convenience store in Albertville, about 80 miles northeast of Birmingham.

Witnesses reported seeing a man get out of a pickup and into the car while someone else drove the truck.

State's Attorney's Office Under Review (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 6, 2006

Ivey Requested Justice Department Probe

A team of current and former state prosecutors from across the country is meeting this week with Prince George's County prosecutors, police, judges and defense attorneys to assess how well the state's attorney's office is performing and what it can do to improve.

The broad independent review is being conducted at the request of State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, who will begin his second term in January. Ivey, who was reelected without opposition in the November general election, said no event or case prompted the review.

In an interview, Ivey said he wanted to conduct such a review from the time he first assumed the office in December 2002 but was unable to because of budgetary constraints.

He said the review is being conducted at no cost to the state's attorney's office.

The team of four current and former prosecutors that will be reviewing the office was put together by the Bureau of Justice Assistance, which is part of the Justice Department.

The review team will be supported by two staff members from the bureau, said Joseph Trotter, an official with the bureau.

DOJ_NMG_0103004

Ivey said he told his staff, which includes about 70 prosecutors, about the review a month ago, shortly after he was reelected. Ivey said he urged his prosecutors and other staff to be honest with the assessors, who began conducting interviews Monday and are scheduled to complete them today.

"I told our people the only way this will work is if they're candid," Ivey said. The reviewers will interview prosecutors, supervisors and trial lawyers away from the Upper Marlboro office, he said.

Ivey said he wants the reviewers to determine whether policies need to be changed and to point out any problems with personnel. If prosecutors or staff members believe there is something Ivey can be doing better, he wants to know about it, Ivey said.

Ivey said he would like the reviewers to provide a list of recommendations, "a sheet I can work from."

Trotter said a written report would be available within a few weeks, perhaps by January.

During his tenure, Ivey has been credited with beefing up prosecutions of thefts and other economic crimes. Assistant State's Attorney Isabel Mercedes Cumming, head of the "fraud squad, " was named the national fraud examiner of the year by a financial crime analysts group last year.

Prince George's prosecutors also have been successful in obtaining convictions against at least four members of the violent MS-13 gang in recent years for offenses such as murder and attempted murder.

On the other hand, several prosecutions of homicides and other violent crimes have gone awry in recent months.

Last month, two Prince George's judges in separate cases dismissed murder charges against defendants because of what they considered flaws in the prosecution.

Since May, prosecutors have dropped murder charges against at least two other defendants because of problems with state witnesses or evidence.

La. Authorities: Seemingly Harmless Suspect In Serial Killings Disarmed Victims With Charm (SDUT/AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 6, 2006

HOUMA, La. – Short, overweight and suffering from a heart condition, Ronald J. Dominique hardly seemed a threat, much less a serial killer.

A near-broke nobody who lived with his sister before moving into a homeless shelter, he went willingly, leaning heavily on a cane, when officers came to get him last week.

Even with a meek persona, investigators said, Dominique bound and strangled or smothered 23 men and teenage boys in south Louisiana in what the FBI considered its most urgent serial killing case.

Dominique apparently was able to charm his victims into accompanying him, said Les Bonano, director of investigations for the state attorney general's office.

“He'd meet them on the street, walking or riding their bikes, and just start talking to them. He'd offer them a ride or talk them into sex and they'd go with him,” Bonano said Tuesday.

Dominique, 42, was arrested Friday at a homeless shelter in Houma and charged with two murders. On Monday, authorities filed nine more counts against him and said more charges were possible.

Dominique was being held without bond at the Terrebonne Parish jail pending a Jan. 17 arraignment. A message seeking comment was left with the parish public defender's office, which was assigned Tuesday to represent him.

Joseph Waitz, the Terrebonne district attorney, said he will seek the death penalty.

Once investigators began interrogating him, Dominique eagerly claimed credit for the killings, Terrebonne Sheriff Jerry Larpenter said.

“We'd been talking to him just a short period of time and he just started giving it up,” Larpenter said. “I don't know what prompted it. Maybe he just wanted to clear his conscience.”

Dominique is believed to have raped his victims before killing them, Larpenter said.

“He's nothing on the street, a nobody. But here he had power. Once he got those ropes on them, they were his,” he said.

Until the week of his arrest, Dominique was living with his sister in Bayou Blue, a rural area near Houma, a Cajun community of 32,000 surrounded by bayous and sugar cane fields, where many work in commercial fishing or the oil industry. His camper was parked behind a trailer covered by a broad, wood roof.

Dominique hit the shelter almost penniless. Phillip “Pappy” Breaux, who lives at the shelter, said Dominique told him he had enough money to pay for a room for five or six nights at $10 a night.

"If he hadn't been arrested he could have been here 20 years and nobody would have paid any attention to him," Breaux said. "He complained about his health some, but that was about it."

Investigators said Dominique was charged at least seven times and jailed twice over the years, mostly for minor offenses such as traffic violations, simple battery and disturbing the peace by offensive language.

But one case apparently planted the seed for his later crimes, according to Larpenter.

On Aug. 25, 1996, Dominique was arrested on a charge of forcible rape. He was booked into jail, but the case did not go to trial because the victim could not be found.

Larpenter said Dominique told investigators that brief brush with incarceration left him determined not to go back to jail.

"He said he killed them because he didn't want to get caught," Larpenter said. "But I would think he discovered somewhere on the way to killing 23 that it was not just because of that. I think he discovered he liked it."

FBI Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani said FBI profilers felt this was the most significant current serial killer case in the country in terms of the number of victims and its time span – the killings took place from 1997 to 2005.

"A serial killer like this hides in plain sight," Bernazzani said. "They do not disturb people. That's why they are so effective.'"

All the victims were homeless males, ranging from 16 to 46, all were strangled or asphyxiated and all the bodies were bound. Their bodies were dumped in remote spots in seven parishes.

The break in the case came when an ex-con told his parole agent about getting away from a man who wanted to tie him up for sex, Larpenter said.

Dominique voluntarily gave investigators a DNA sample, which connected him two Jefferson Parish murders, Sheriff Harry Lee said.

"He went along with it, let us take a swab," Lee said. "He was no trouble at all."

Katrina Struck District, Scandal Struck Dem (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, December 6, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — None of the nation's other 434 congressional districts has put up with as much adversity as the 2nd District of Louisiana, where entire neighborhoods have been razed after Hurricane Katrina 15 months ago.

Now weary voters in the district must decide whether to re-elect a member of Congress after the FBI found $90,000 in marked bills in his freezer.

Rep. William Jefferson, a Democrat, has denied wrongdoing, and he has not been charged with a crime. In an open primary election last month, he placed first with 30% of the vote. None of the 13 candidates got a majority, so he faces Democratic state Rep. Karen Carter in a runoff election Saturday.

Jefferson has been outraised financially and was stripped of his most powerful committee assignment by Democratic leaders, but few here count him out.

Some want to keep him in office just to keep an eye on him.

"He can hide better being a private citizen than a public official," says Glenn Trotter, 52, over lunch at Li'l Dizzy's Cafe. "New Orleans already has a stigma about it. The die has been cast in terms of what people think of us."

Saturday's vote will write the epilogue on the past two years' scandals in Congress. Since November 2005, Republican Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and Mark Foley have resigned because of wrongdoing or ethical questions. Others facing allegations lost re-election. If Carter wins, Jefferson will be the only Democrat to lose his seat this year for any reason.

Democratic Party officials are doing what they can to make that happen. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who will become the first female speaker of the House of Representatives next month, stripped Jefferson of his seat on the Ways and Means Committee. State party officials endorsed Carter in the runoff.

Jefferson is the target of a Justice Department investigation into a Kentucky businessman's dealings with Nigeria. The businessman and a former aide to Jefferson have pleaded guilty to bribery.

An FBI affidavit alleges that Jefferson took $100,000 from an investor who was working with the FBI to bribe a Nigerian official. The FBI found $90,000 of it later in a freezer in Jefferson's home on Capitol Hill.

The eight-term congressman has not talked about the case except to declare his innocence, and he turns down most requests for interviews. His spokeswoman, Melanie Roussell, points out that Jefferson "has not been charged with anything."

"He asks voters to consider him on his record," she says, claiming that Jefferson "has brought home billions" of dollars in federal aid since Katrina struck. "Now is not the time to send someone new, who doesn't know anyone and who can't negotiate our needs."

Carter says now is not the time to return Jefferson, under a cloud and without his seat on Ways and Means.

The 2nd District includes the hardest-hit areas of the Gulf Coast, such as the Lower Ninth Ward, where low-income homeowners lost everything. They need full representation, she says.

"We don't have a strong voice from this district, and we are the most devastated district," she tells people at a gathering in the Algiers neighborhood on the Mississippi River's west bank. "Our national image is at stake."

Carter, who like Jefferson is black, has strong backing among whites. Mary Lore, 81, says she was "appalled" by Jefferson's "flagrant" behavior and doesn't want to re-elect him while he faces possible indictment. "We don't need another question mark," she says.

Even Republicans, badly outnumbered in a district drawn to favor black Democrats, are enticed by Carter. "I've always voted against Jefferson. We disagree on everything," says Bill Bryan, 48, director of a local sports club.

Yet Carter has her own obstacles. After Katrina, she appeared in a Spike Lee documentary criticizing officials of neighboring Jefferson Parish for keeping Orleans Parish residents out. Her remarks haunt her as she campaigns in Jefferson Parish, which is about 30% of the district. She also is opposed by some who disagreed with education legislation she advocated.

Amy Lafont, 31, a parent active in school issues, says she'll vote for " 'Dollar Bill' Jefferson. He is a known quantity."

THE $90,000 QUESTION (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 6, 2006

Whom Will Voters Believe -- Jefferson Or The Feds?

Judith Woods and Dwight Garrett know all about the $90,000 FBI agents say they found in Rep. William Jefferson's freezer, but they are of different minds on how the federal probe of the New Orleans Democrat should influence voters in Saturday's runoff.

Garrett, 52, an insurance broker and adjuster and self-described community activist, admits he was "shocked" when he heard about the $90,000. But he said he's decided to stick with Jefferson because the government's case "apparently isn't very strong or they would have indicted him by now."

Jefferson, he said, wouldn't be the first African-American politician wrongly tainted with false charges.

"He's been our congressman for 16 years, and I think he's entitled to a presumption of innocence," said Garrett, who said the Justice Department has been overly aggressive by making Jefferson's congressional office the first ever raided by the FBI.

Woods, also 52 and a social worker, said she has voted for Jefferson in the past but can't conceive of what Jefferson has in mind when he promises an honorable explanation for the allegations against him. The Justice Department in an affidavit said FBI agents found $90,000 in marked $100 bills in the freezer of his Washington, D.C., home. Prosecutors secured guilty pleas from two former Jefferson associates, who testified that the congressman demanded payments for family-run businesses in return for his help in securing contracts in West Africa.

"My conclusion is that he's guilty of something," said Woods, who wonders how effective a congressman Jefferson can be while fighting the accusations.

Jefferson has denied wrongdoing, saying in a recent campaign ad that he has never accepted a bribe from anyone.

Still, perhaps more than any other issue, including the federal government's continued role in hurricane recovery efforts, how voters see the federal probe, which began March 15, 2005, will determine whether Jefferson is elected to a ninth term or is ousted by state Rep. Karen Carter, D-New Orleans.

Sympathy for Jefferson

Gay Cunningham, an Uptown resident, said she has decided to support Carter with a "heavy heart" because Jefferson has helped her efforts to raise money for the Louisiana State Museum dating to when he was in the Legislature.

Accused Mobster Requests Larger Cell (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, December 6, 2006

CHICAGO - A reputed leader of Chicago's organized crime family pleaded with a federal judge Tuesday for more space in jail while he awaits trial on charges of plotting 18 slayings going back three decades.

"I'm taking 15 medications and my back is killing me," Frank Calabrese Sr., 69, told U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel. He said overcrowding on his floor at the Metropolitan Correctional Center is so bad that he can't concentrate on court papers and study the charges against him.

A chronic back problem only makes matters worse, he said.

"All I want to do is be in a two-man room so I can study my case," said the portly, bearded defendant, clad in the bright orange jumpsuit of a federal prisoner.

To underscore Calabrese's woes, defense attorney Joseph Lopez asked permission from Zagel for his client to sit down during the hearing.

Calabrese is among 14 reputed mob figures charged in a racketeering indictment that alleges at least 18 slayings going as far back as 1970.

Zagel was holding a hearing on complaints by a number of the defendants charged in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets that their health and related problems are not being met in the MCC - a skyscraper federal jail a block from the Dirksen Federal Courthouse in downtown Chicago.

Other attorneys said their clients had urgent medical needs ranging from a new hearing aid to a fresh set of false teeth.

Zagel and federal prosecutors said that they would look into the matter.

Emotions Run High As Peete, Ford Keep Seats In Close Vote (MCA)

By Jacinthia Jones

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 6, 2006

December 6, 2006 At the end of the day, Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete remained in their seats on the Memphis City Council dais.

There was Ford, voting as if nothing had happened.

And Peete, who, after being absent most of the day, recused himself from voting only on planning and zoning issues.

Despite federal bribery charges against the two, the council failed to muster enough support Tuesday to ask them to resign or to censure them.

Ford and Peete were arrested last week on charges they took money in exchange for their influence on the council concerning development.

The resolution asking Ford and Peete to resign failed on a 6-6 vote during a morning executive session.

A separate motion to initiate censure proceedings on the pair failed by a 3-5 vote in the council's personnel, intergovernmental and annexation committee.

Peete did not attend committee meetings, but showed up for the full council meeting in the afternoon. Ford, however, attended meetings all day and voted against the censure motion and cast a "no" vote that doomed the resolution requesting he and Peete step down.

Council members did not publicly question the appropriateness of Ford's voting on the two measures.

During a break in the council meeting, reporters asked him why he was still voting. He replied: "I'm innocent, OK? I'm innocent."

Earlier he told The Commercial Appeal "This is about color."

"I'm a child of God, OK? I know what I have not done. Maybe this will open up the eyes of some people."

He took issue with comments by Councilman Jack Sammons during the executive session.

In pushing the resolution asking for the resignations, Sammons said the events involving his colleagues had caused him "much consternation."

"It's unfathomable to me that this could happen in this atmosphere of Tennessee Waltz."

Sammons' resolution "humbly, prayerfully and respectfully" requested that Peete and Ford resign and focus their energies on their legal defenses.

Now that Peete and Ford have given no indication they intend to do that, the council's hands are tied.

Council atty. Allan Wade, citing an attorney general's opinion, said there is no state law or constitutional provision that allows the General Assembly to prohibit one of its members from voting on matters with only an indictment, but no conviction. That also is the case with the council, he said.

The district attorney could remove any public official for misconduct, but Wade said that's unlikely with a federal investigation ongoing.

Those arguments seemed to sway Councilman E.C. Jones, who had previously called for the two to resign.

"I personally think we should just wait until this case has been heard, dropped, dismissed, found guilty, convicted or whatever, and we should just move on with our business," Jones said.

But Councilman Myron Lowery, who supported the resolution, disagreed. He summed up the issue as one of public trust versus the individual rights of council members.

"Our colleagues should be convicted or acquitted in a court of law and not at the City Council," Lowery said. "But at the same time, this body has to take a stand to tell the public that we are displeased with the information that we have received."

An emotional Barbara Swearengen Holt said she was disappointed the council would "sit here today and have them on trial."

The councilwoman railed against the resolution, saying, "I don't see anything humble about it, I don't see anything prayerful about it, and I don't see anything respectful about it."

After the vote, Sammons said he was "saddened" by the whole situation.

"I suspect the system will rectify this sword that we have in our heart," Sammons said. He added, "To throw the race card is to be anticipated."

Councilman Scott McCormick, who made the motion to initiate censure proceedings, said his votes for the measures were public statements.

"I think it's important for the council as a body to help restore the trust of the public to show that we take these allegations seriously and we're taking whatever action we can," McCormick said.

Council chairwoman TaJuan Stout Mitchell, who had called in additional police for the session, said she refused to condemn individuals "before someone has had his day in court."

MySpace.com Moves To Keep Sex Offenders Off Of Its Site (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 5 — MySpace.com, the social networking site, said Tuesday that it was developing technologies that would help combat the use of its site by sexual predators by cross-referencing its more than 130 million users against state databases of registered sex offenders.

The Web site, which is owned by the News Corporation, said that within 30 days it planned to deploy the technology, which will seek to identify known sex offenders not just by their names, but also by date of birth, height, weight and ZIP code.

If the automated system finds a potential match between a MySpace user and a registered sex offender, employees will try to verify the match or determine if it is a false positive. Users who are registered sex offenders, MySpace said, will be denied access to the site and, depending in the circumstances, be turned over to law enforcement.

The system, which MySpace executives said was the first of its kind, comes as the site has faced scrutiny and criticism by advocates of children's safety. Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, said the technology was a potentially useful step in slowing the incidence of sexual solicitation of minors.

"It's not a panacea, but it makes a whole lot of sense," Mr. Allen said.

According to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a nonprofit group, one in seven regular Internet users between the ages of 10 and 17 will be solicited online for sex. That figure has fallen from 2000, when it was one in five.

The perception, particularly among parents, has been that children are vulnerable on social networking sites like MySpace.com, which allow users to create profiles, share their interests and create a vast social network.

MySpace said that more than 80 percent of its users were 18 years or older.

In its announcement, MySpace said it had signed a deal to use technology created by the Sentinel Tech Holdings Corporation.

Forty-six states have public data bases that include 550,000 registered sex offenders. The technology will compare the names on the databases with the 135 million MySpace users.

Hemanshu Nigam, chief security officer for MySpace, said the company hoped the technology would work in real time, meaning that as people signed up — which they are doing at a rate of 320,000 a day — the system would automatically compare the names to the databases.

The system, by MySpace's admission, is not fool-proof. If registered sex offenders sign up but do not give their real names, physical attributes, locations or post their real picture, they could elude detection.

Similarly, there is a chance that people who are not sex offenders might be flagged by the system. Mr. Nigam said a team was in place to analyze potential matches and throw out false positives.

Kevin Bankston, a staff lawyer for the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a free speech and consumer advocacy group, said the technology was a response to growing worries about the extent of the problem of sexual solicitation of minors on the Internet.

Mr. Bankston said the incidents of such solicitation were falling but that fear was causing companies to take steps that could ultimately impinge civil liberties.

"My concern is MySpace is acting based on a level of pressure and fear that may be unreasonable," he said.

News From The San Joaquin Valley (AP)

AP, December 6, 2006

The University of California, Merced will begin a marketing campaign in February to lure off-campus students to its nine dormitories, university officials said.

There's room for more than 585 students, but only 371 live on campus this semester, said Leslie Santos, the University of Merced's director of student housing.

School officials had asked students to live off campus to make room for freshman, but enrollment was lower than predicted. To entice students to campus, administrators are giving students who don't have roommates the option to stay in double rooms for the single-occupancy rate, Santos said.

"From this point forward, it's our goal to offer continuing students the ability to live on campus," Santos said. "We pay gas, utilities, maintenance, grounds all of that stuff and the mortgage."

The university must fill its empty beds because dorm fees help pay the annual $1.7 million mortgage for student housing, Santos said.

CASTLE, Calif. (AP) - The federal penitentiary in Atwater will remain on lockdown as the FBI investigates the stabbing of a prison employee, a prison spokesman said.

The facility has been locked down since an inmate attacked an employee Nov. 28 with a homemade knife, U.S. Penitentiary Atwater Executive Assistant Jesse Gonzalez said.

The staff member was treated at a hospital for non-life threatening injuries and returned to work, Gonzalez said.

The 1,200 maximum security inmates will remain in their cells as investigators find out how the prisoner made the knife, said FBI Supervising Special Agent John Gliatta.

The inmate's name and information will not be released until he is charged in connection with the assault, prison officials said. The worker's identity and job title were not released because they are confidential.

WOODLAKE, Calif. (AP) - Two San Joaquin Valley phone-sex operators helped immigration agents nab a Canadian corrections officer on child pornography charges, authorities said.

Matthew Hughes, 26, of Toronto, was arrested by Toronto police and charged in Canada Friday with possession and distribution of child pornography and sexual interference with a person under 14, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement said.

The two female telephone sex operators tipped off police in Woodlake by reporting that Hughes, with whom they had been corresponding, had sent them a live Web camera broadcast in which he was assaulting a 7-year-old girl, ICE officials said.

Immigration authorities obtained subscriber information for the e-mail address and passed along photos of the corrections officer to Canadian police, officials said.

"Those who engage in the exploitation of children should no longer expect the anonymity of cyberspace or ordinary citizens to protect them," said Brian Poulsen, an ICE agent in Fresno.

Clever Spammers Stay 'One Step Ahead' Of Law (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, December 6, 2006

Viagra, gibberish, money-transfer requests, more Viagra.

Three years after the federal Can-Spam Act went into effect, unsolicited commercial e-mails are assaulting inboxes at record rates as spamming technology grows more sophisticated.

"I think the majority of the industry would say that spam levels are at the highest they've ever been," said Scott Chasin, chief technology officer at MX Logic Inc., a Colorado-based Internet security firm.

In September, unsolicited commercial e-mail messages accounted for more than 77 percent of all e-mail filtered by the company. Of that amount, only a fraction -- 0.27 percent -- was in compliance with federal anti-spamming law.
